5. The position of many ladies is unfavorable to this cause. We see wives much injured in health and beauty, and who are afflicted with scraggy, homely sons and daughters as a penalty for marrying smokers and chewers, who evince no anxiety to stop the ravages in their family circle. They are fastidious; they think it in bad taste to rebuke genteel husbands and sons for indulgence in this fashionable pleasure. But they do not think it in bad taste to live day and night in parlors and apartments all fumigated with this impurity! They are used to it. They are like the Irish girl, who was told not to marry a drunkard. She replied, "I will—I am used to it—it will seem more like home."—"De gustibus," etc.

6. The cowardice of the pulpit is an obstacle. It is an easy thing for a preacher to assault sin on the plains of Hindostan, or on plantations in Alabama; but it is not so easy to plunge into a pew only ten feet distant, and convince a fifty-thousand-dollar sinner that he is doing wrong before God in poisoning his posterity, and his fellow-men also, by using, raising or vending this pernicious article. We have no quarrel with ministers,—we are ministers ourselves,—but pulpits are muzzled; a few are free.

This evil is deadly, and well-nigh ubiquitous, and should be everywhere battled. But other causes, important and unimportant, on which we all have been drilled to satiety, [illegible] the way, and, in order to get a hearing, we are obliged to press in and demand it, and say of this enemy, as Nelson said of the Frenchman, "I will fight him wherever I can find him; wherever a Frenchman can anchor, my ship shall be there."

~~It is high time the battle with the~~ great Narcotic were fought, and when time-serving men obtrude upon us their notions, and choke up our way by subterfuges and excuses, we must say to them, as one French general said to another, "Away with your advice; move off your column; let mine come on and do its duty."

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(FROM NOTES BY J. F. COTTON.)

MR. GRANT. My friend says he depends upon old arguments to prove man's immortality. Paul says that immortality comes from the grave when this mortal shall have put on immortality. We do not wish to change snakes into devils, but we say that the serpent of Eden was made the first medium of communication from Satan to mankind. As to the assertion that man lives longer now than of old, it is not worth answering, when the contracting span of man's existence is made manifest from one generation to another. My friend has said that one assertion is as good as another. Granted, if either cannot be proved, but what we advance is substantiated by the best authority—the Bible.

"Preached to the spirits in prison." Let us read Thompson's translation of 1 Peter 3 18—20—"Brought to life by that spirit with which he went, and to the spirits which are (now) in prison, made proclamation at the time they were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God was waiting once for all in the days of Noe while the ark was building." Observe, Christ was put to death, and quickened by that spirit by the aid of which the preaching was made to the spirits in prison When? When Noah was building the ark, and not when they were in the dark prison-house of death. 1 Pet 4: 6.—"For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit." McKnight's translation makes this passage clearer. He renders "For this purpose the gospel has been preached even to the dead, that although they might be condemned indeed by men in the flesh, yet they might live eternally by God in the spirit." Again, Wakefield "For this indeed was the effect of preaching the gospel to the dead, that some will be punished as carnal men, but others lead a spiritual life unto God."

We are referred to 2 Cor 5 1.—"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens," etc. Wakefield renders it, "For we know that if this tent wherein we dwell, which is fixed on the ground, be taken to pieces, we have a divine building, a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens." Now then, if this house be destroyed, where shall we dwell? In that new Jerusalem which shall come down from heaven adorned like a bride. There is not a plurality of tabernacles; but one for all of the redeemed.

"Having a desire to depart." The word analuo, rendered "depart" in this passage, occurs in only one other place in the New Testament, which is in Lk. 12 36, and is there rendered return. In twenty manuscripts of the Septuagint, including the Oxford, it is used in Josh. 22 8, for the Hebrew word which invariably signifies to return. Paul was in a strait between two, whether it was better to wish to go on in his perilous ministry, or to go down into the grave, and wait to be released from the tomb and forever be present with the Lord, having a desire for the return of Christ which was far better than either.

"Souls under the altar." Whiting translates, "persons under the altar." John saw in his vision of the Apocalypse the whole martyrdom of the christians, and in the souls, or persons, under the altar, he beheld the multitude of those who fell through persecution "for the testimony which they held"; and his prophetic ear caught the cry which often went up to heaven, "How long, oh Lord, how long!" We are asked whom did the witch of Endor bring up to speak with Saul? Not Samuel, surely, unless she brought him sixty miles under ground from where the prophet was buried. But it was a demon, and a lying one, for he said, "To-morrow thou and thy sons shall be with me," when the records show that Saul was not dead till three days after, when the fugitive Amalekite found the wounded king lying upon the bloody heights of Gilboa, and at his own request dispatched him. As to men thinking or feeling after death, the Bible says, Ps. 104: 29 "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled, thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." Reason says that man cannot think without brains. Suppose he receives a blow on the head which stuns him, and another which beats out his brains, will he think better when they are scattered about on the ground? Thus far nothing has been brought forward sufficient to prove man's inherent immortality or his consciousness between death and the resurrection. Hence we conclude that Spiritualism is opposed to the Bible, philosophy [illegible]

Lord's doings—the Lord has done this—the Lord has come very near to you—the Lord has laid his afflicting hand upon you for your good,—this is a loud call to you from God; he has done it for some unseen good to us. Notwithstanding all this, people are gathering herbs for medicines, and riding to and fro for different physicians, and sometimes when they come they see it is too late. Now if I had been here three days ago, or yesterday, I could have saved life. Again, I have done all that I can do; and if you can't get help from some other source, you must die,—that is, the Lord will take you out of the world. This is the popular doctrine of the day. I am astonished that men of common sense should talk in this manner, and thus afflict the afflicted by accusing God of being the author of the above incidents and misfortunes, and heart-rending divisions and calamities which transpire in the world among the people, and at the same time use all the means in their power to hinder God from carrying on his work—if it be God's work.

Paul says Christ has abolished death—that is, in relation to himself; for death hath no more dominion over him. Death is not a creature or being, as some suppose, but is a reigning power; as darkness comes on when the light disappears, so death ensues when life ceases; death is the end of dying—the end of life. This power has been in the hands of men ever since man had a being; man brought it into the world. 1 Cor. 15 : 21.—"For since by man came death," etc. Men have executed it upon man when they pleased, in violation of God's law, from Cain until now, by using the powers which God ordained in them for his declarative glory.

Death is an enemy to every thing that exists; it shows no mercy. It was an enemy to Jesus Christ, from which he prayed to his Father to be delivered in the garden of Gethsemane; "nevertheless, thy will be done, not mine." 1 Cor. 15 : 26.—"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

For the Crisis.

Per Contra.—Does Death Kill?

My estimates of the argumentative difficulties or expenses of the materialist view are likely to meet objections, in the way of difficulties alleged against my own view, or expenses per contra, as the book-keepers say. I will examine one or two of them before I proceed.

Some one may ask, "If the soul is conscious when the body is dead, how do we know that it will not be eternally conscious after the second death? If the first death does not kill it, how do we know that the second death will kill it?"

Here are two questions. 1. Respecting the consciousness of the disembodied soul. 2. Respecting the immortality of the soul. I will answer them separately.

(1.) The reader will observe that I am not trying to show the consciousness of the disembodied soul, but have spoken of it as "inert;" i. e. inactive, and of course unconscious. I frequently compare it to the main-spring without the watch. Such a "disembodied" main-spring may be inherently elastic, yet utterly powerless; and it might remain so to all eternity, if it did not perish in "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds." Respecting the consciousness of the bodiless soul, either eternal or temporary, I have no dispute with the readers of the Crisis.

And yet, in the argument respecting eternal existence, or immortality, suppose I should grant, for argument's sake, that the wicked soul has some horrible dreams before the resurrection and the second death. What then? Would its immortality be a legitimate inference? I would like to see the person that would prove this. If any one bravely believes that the stroke of God in the second death will neither kill the soul nor stun it, because the fist of John C. Heenan may not do it, I would like to see the man of such courageous hope, for a rare specimen of fearlessness of the power of God.

But, waving this whole question about consciousness, as not in dispute, I pass to the second.

(2.) "If the first death does not kill the soul, who knows that the second death will do it?" I might answer by simply asking, Who knows that the second death will not do it? I know that it has been often said that the separate existence of the soul implies its immortality. This has been said by the asserters of eternal suffering, from Tertullian to Robert Landis. Dr. Post has said that "nothing is deadlier than death;" and has thus tried to infer that because the death of the body does not kill the soul, therefore, the death of the soul will not kill the soul. I simply commend the argument to those who think it worthy of attention. It seems to me that they who reason thus can prove anything, and by anything. Give them a little twilight, and they will prove that white is black, and that noon is midnight. In my book on "Christ our Life," I have collected some rare specimens of such argument, to prove the immortality of the soul from Matt. 10: 28, and other passages. Such logical curiosities ought certainly to be preserved in their proper cabinet.

But let us examine the question more particularly. The proposition urged as an objection to my view would read somehow thus: "From the existence of the wicked soul until the second death, its eternal existence beyond the second death legitimately follows." Now I ask, is that good reasoning? Look at it. Will any one adopt it as sound argument? Is it even plausible? And have I not fairly stated the case, adding no element which does not belong to it, and omitting none which is pertinent? May I not safely affirm that the existence of the wicked soul between death and judgment does not imply its immortality? I have already given examples of eminent christians who have believed as I do, in the separate existence of the soul, which yet may die in the second death. Let me recall one of these, Abp. Whately. All admit that he is a good reasoner, one of the highest logical authorities, whose work on logic is standard, and adopted in most of the schools. If we put the question to him he replies most decidedly, that from the existence of the soul until the final judgment, its immortality does not legitimately follow. The best authority, then, will allow my view of the nature of the soul, with no such expense as some of my friends fear. But I would not decide the case by authority; for in logic no one can see for another. Let us, then, try the reasoning again. The test of all reasoning is the syllogism. And an argument is commonly put in the syllogistic form by supplying the general proposition, or major premise. If we do this in the present instance, we shall have something like this:

> Whatever pertains to the being of man, and exists during an interval after the death of the body, will exist eternally after the interval is past. The souls of the wicked, who are "reserved unto judgment," exist during an interval until the second death. Therefore, their souls will never die.

My friends see at once that the conclusion is just as sound as the first proposition, or major premise, and no more so. If the conclusion is to stand as an objection against my view, the major premise, or some other proposition equally general, must be taken also, to support it. Until this is done, I think my view is liable to no inference of immortality out of Christ; and I may proceed at my leisure, with my general argument. There is more to be said, however, on this very question, Does death kill? And in my next, I may show that on logical grounds the view of my querist is not so safe against the difficulty he urges, as my own.

The Light Ship.

I feel that an explanation is required by the friends who are interested, why this tract has not already been printed. The chief reason is, that the protracted illness of my wife prevented me from attending to it. However, being providentially relieved from that embarrassment, I shall now put it through with all possible despatch. I need not expatiate upon the merits of endeavoring to scatter truth among our seamen, as all are prepared to admit that; but I would urge on the brethren, who feel it a duty to assist in the enterprise, to send in their mite.

Since my last I have received the following: From Eld. W. F. Carpenter, $1.00, A reader of the Crisis, $1.00, Wm. Dudley, $1.00, C. Cottle $2.00, A sister from Abington, $1.00, Some one from W. Troy, $1.00, One who feels deeply interested, $1.00, A Lover of truth, from Seneca Falls, $1.00, Otis Irish, $1.00, Mrs. E. Mann, 75 cts., J. T. Howland, 50 cts.

Yours faithfully, JNO. F. COTTON.

Reasons.

I wish you to purchase and read "Reasons for my Hope" by H. L. H.

1. Because it presents a good hope.
2. It gives good reasons for it.
3. It teaches Bible truth, and quotes it from the Bible.
4. It presents some facts not easily found by all, and which are interesting.
5. It is a good-humored book, and will not be likely to make men mad who read it.
6. It is a plain book; hence it can be easily understood.
7. It is a readable book, in large type, so that old eyes can see it.
8. It will not outlaw like a last year's almanac, so that your neighbor who reads it will have occasion to say your doctrine has all failed.
9. It can be lent without fear of its doing more hurt than good.
10. The author and publisher wants to sell the edition that he may pay for these and issue more for the public good.
11. Buy it for the sake of those who are too poor to buy, that such may have it free. Price, bound, 50 cts. Paper, 30cts. by mail, prepaid. Discount by quantity. Address orders to H. L. Hastings, Providence, R. I.

☞ I have read of a very strange speech that dropped from the lips of Epictetus, a heathen. "If it be thy will," says he, "O Lord, command me what thou wilt; send me whither thou wilt; I will not withdraw myself from anything that seems good to thee." Ah! how will this heathen rise in judgment at last against all those who are partial in their obedience—who, while they yield obedience to some commands, live in the habitual breach of other commands.

The World's Crisis.
BOSTON, JUNE 6, 1860.

The Destruction of the Wicked.

No. 1.

> "What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?"—1 Pet. 4: 17.
> "Whose end is destruction."—Phil. 3: 19.
> "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

In discussing this solemn subject, we shall endeavor to be guided by the most obvious meaning of the Scriptures, as applied to the future punishment of the finally impenitent. It will be our purpose to explain doubtful passages with those which are plain; showing the complete harmony of the Bible with itself, with reason, justice and mercy, in relation to the subject proposed for examination; assuming that the Scriptures do not teach opposites—both affirmative and negative—but when rightly understood, are either all in favor of the eternal "destruction of the wicked," or of their eternal misery.

I. In defining destruction, we adopt the language of Mr. Webster, as follows: "Destruction consists in the annihilation of the form of any thing; that form of parts which constitutes it what it is." Hence, when an object suffers destruction in the literal sense, the "form of parts" constituting that object no longer exists; consequently, when a thing is eternally destroyed, it can never exist again.

II. In harmony with the foregoing definition, we affirm that the ETERNAL DESTRUCTION of the wicked is REASONABLE.

1. It looks reasonable that the wicked should be destroyed, that sin might come to a perpetual end. It is certain that sin has no right to exist at all. It is an intruder in the universe; and it seems perfectly reasonable that God should put an end to sinful beings by destroying them, that he should not perpetuate eternally that which is worse than useless—a positive evil. It is reasonable that God should finally remove every unholy thing from the universe; and by consequence, introduce a time, when "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea," will be heard "saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."—Rev. 5: 13. This could not take place so long as an enemy remained alive.

2. It is reasonable that the wicked should be destroyed, because their existence can be of no benefit to themselves or the righteous. When a being has finally decided to remain in sin, and puts himself beyond all hope of reformation, sin must be an eternal blot upon the universe, or the sinner must be destroyed. So long as the cause remains, the effect must follow; hence it is reasonable that God should remove the floods of sin by drying up the fountains; or, in other words, by destroying the sinner, who is only a curse to himself and all good beings.

3. It is reasonable that a just and merciful Being, like our Heavenly Father, should put an end to the sufferings of those who can never be otherwise than miserable so long as they live. A merciful being never delights in witnessing suffering; and only administers it as corrective and disciplinary. The corrective punishment is in this life; hence, after the resurrection and judgment of those who hardened themselves against all reformatory discipline, in this world, it is reasonable that they should forfeit their lives for their rebellion against a holy government. Capital punishment is never disciplinary; consequently, suffering is not a legal element in its execution, but only an accompaniment resulting from the anticipated penalty. "The wages of sin is death," which is capital punishment; therefore, not corrective or disciplinary; consequently, as a merciful being can inflict pain only for correction, suffering will be endured by the wicked after judgment only as the result of their awful relation to the approaching penalty—death; otherwise, the suffering inflicted would be an act of cruelty, transcending the bounds of justice, mercy, and love; an act which can never be attributed to our Heavenly Father.

When capital punishment is to be inflicted, no law of civilized and christian lands allows any torture before the execution. In case it should be done, by some one possessed of a tyrant's heart, all good people, who love Jesus, would call it cruel.

Suppose we were traveling in a foreign land, where the habits of the people were unknown to us, and should find a crowd of men gathered, who were engaged torturing a man, not for the sake of discipline, or to reform him, but with the intention of continuing it till death ended his sufferings; we should not hesitate to say these are heathen, as none others would inflict torment when the penalty was death! Suppose that they had the power to keep the man alive eternally in the extreme of misery, and had commenced the exercise of that power, what would God, Christ, angels, and all good beings think of such an act? Would they tolerate it? A merciful man, appointed to inflict capital punishment—death—would not institute a series of torments first, but would destroy the offender at once, as the Lord did the Sodomites; taking heed to the instruction, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful."—Luke 6 : 36.

Hence, we arrive at the conclusion again, that it is reasonable that God should destroy the wicked, and thus end sin and misery, instead of perpetuating both eternally, when neither have any right to exist at all in the universe of God.

III. In harmony with the foregoing, we affirm that the TERMS employed to express the destiny of the wicked render their perpetuity IMPOSSIBLE.

The following is a list of the terms used to represent the future punishment of the wicked: "perdition," "perish," "cut off," "devoured," "consume," "shall not be," "unquenchable fire," "into smoke shall they consume away," "destroy," "burn them up," "destruction," "be as though they had not been," "second death."

If the existence of the wicked is to cease at some future time, after the judgment, how could that fact be expressed without using some of the foregoing terms? What stronger or plainer words have we in the English or any other language, to denote a total cessation of being, than those employed to represent the end of the wicked? How is it possible for a being to be preserved entire, conscious and active as ever, after all these terms have been actively applied to his personal identity? Let it be remembered that the accountable being, he who sins, is the one to receive the penalty defined by the foregoing terms. If the body is only the "house" in which the man lives, then that is not guilty, and hence is not punished. The penalty falls on the sinner in the house, and is defined to be "DEATH." It cannot be moral death, for that is his crime, or rather, the state of the individual, which makes it necessary to inflict the punishment denoted by the terms perish, consume, burn up, destruction, be no more, second death, etc. If the sinner does not die, but lives to sin eternally, how can "the wickedness of the sinner come to an end?" If "the soul that sinneth" cannot die, why are we told that "the soul that sinneth it shall die?" The apostle James says, "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth DEATH." This shows that sin will not be "finished" so long as a sinner remains alive. If the soul cannot die, why does James say, "Let him know that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death"?

Death is defined to be "the extinction of life." It is the end of dying. The second death,"—"the wages of sin"—is not "a death that never, never dies," but one that never lives. Whenever any one of the foregoing terms employed to represent the punishment of the wicked is executed, it would result in the death of the sinner; and is the evidence any less conclusive that the wicked "shall be as though they had not been," because there are applied to them some twenty of the strongest words which any language affords to denote the termination of their existence?

We see no legitimate way to avoid the conclusion, "That the terms employed to express the destiny of the wicked render their perpetuity impossible."

Diary Notes.

Thursday, May 24th. Early this morning we left our kind friends at Castleton in the steam carriage for Albany. Here we met Bro. Wendell, and Bro. Geo. Storrs, and had a pleasant interview. Bro. Wendell is now ready to go and preach the everlasting gospel, having closed up all business relations. May the blessing of God be upon his labors in a most signal manner. The young ministers need the special sympathy of the churches where they labor, lest they be discouraged. Do not sit as critics upon them, but stay up their hands with earnest prayer and "brotherly kindness" in deed and word. There is a great want of faithful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, and we think one reason why there are not more among us, as a people, is because the churches are too fastidious or dainty about their preaching, and consequently do not encourage young preachers. They want old, experienced men. It should be remembered, if there are no recruits, soon we shall be without men to preach the word. But it must not be expected that when men commence the ministry that they can do as well as after they have had experience; but they would accomplish much more if it were not for the cold, unbrotherly, indifferent treatment often received.

Let the young preacher remember that this is a part of his salary,—that he is faring better than his beloved, self-denying, self-sacrificing Master, and be determined never to quit the field—to conquer, or die at his post. We want no cowards in our ranks, but earnest, devoted men of God, who dare rebuke sin wherever it is found, if they are beheaded in prison like John the Baptist, or burnt at the stake, like Latimer and Ridley. Men that will make no compromise with sin any where, but who will rebuke it as soon in the rich as the poor; men who will stand up for the right, if they are compelled to do it alone; men who will be peace-makers, gentle as the tender nurse, and yet as bold as a lion in the defence of the truth; men who think more of the prosperity of the cause of Christ, than of sustaining some new notion, or hobby that may have sprung up in their imagination; men who go into the work to please the Lord. We trust Bro. Wendell will be found a man possessing these qualifications. Let others follow his example, and help sound the last alarm to a guilty world.

We left Albany at 11 o'clock, A. M. for Danbury, Ct., arriving about half past five o'clock. At 7 o'clock, we repaired to the river side and buried Brother St. John in baptism. He formerly preached the popular theology, but is now rejoicing in the truth that we can get eternal life only through Christ. The Bible is now to him a new and consistent book—all seems harmonious. The little church in Danbury is doing well. A goodly number assembled at Concert Hall to hear concerning the great truths of the Bible. There is an increasing interest in D. to know the right way. We hope to see a good work there before six months are passed.

Friday, 25th. Went to Brookfield, took dinner with Bro. and Sister Fenn, who are pressing for the kingdom; thence to Bridgeport, and found a hearty welcome at Bro. B. Browne's. The enemy of all righteousness is troubling the church in B. They need help. Yet, let us remember that trials only work out the dross. We apprehend none will have too many.

Saturday, 26th. At 5 1-2 o'clock this morning, Sr. Browne was buried by baptism in the waters of old ocean. It was a pleasant scene. The morning was calm and lovely, and within we felt a corresponding peace.

At a few minutes past 10 o'clock, the New York and Boston Express train came along and hurried us away to Hartford. At 2 o'clock, we started for River Point, R. I., arriving about 5 o'clock. We had a profitable meeting in the evening, at which we met Bro. Bellows, whose faithful labors have been much blessed in various places.

Lord's day, 27th. At 9 1-2 o'clock, we met for a love-feast, and had an interesting and encouraging season. They have just completed a convenient meeting-house, that will seat over three hundred people; and we this day assembled for its dedication. We felt the presence of the Lord in our midst, by the sweet influences of his Holy Spirit. The house was very much crowded, and some forty or fifty were obliged to stand up. The truth appeared to produce a very happy effect upon many present. The light is spreading in this place. Bro. Bellows is their pastor, but preaches in other places a part of the time.

Monday 28th. Bro. Champlin called on us this morning, in good spirits, and ready to push the battle to the gates of the enemy.

At 9 o'clock, we left for home, and arrived in the city at mid-day, greeted our friends and sat down again to work; feeling like saying with the poet, "Here is no rest." But thank the Lord, "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God."

Editorial Notices.

OVERSIGHT.—The article in last week's paper, on first page, subject, "Spring," should have been credited to Eld. O. R. Fassett.

We have just received a new work on the subject of Spiritualism, entitled, "Spiritualism Exposed in the Light of Divine Revelation, with an Examination of the Position of A. J. Davis and Mr. Dods." By Mary D. Wellcome. Price, single copy 10 cents, postage one cent. For sale at the Crisis office, or by the authoress, at Richmond, Me.

From a hasty examination, we think this work a good one to put into the hands of those who are in danger of embracing the great and crowning delusion of this age,—Spiritualism.

"Christ our Life. The Scriptural Argument for Immortality through Christ alone." By C. F. Hudson. Price 50 cents; bound in paper covers, 30 cts. For sale at the Crisis office.

This work, from the able pen of the author of "Debt and Grace," is a valuable addition to the christian literature of the age. It is just the thing for a thinking man.

Editorial.

The leading editorial in this number, on "the destruction of the wicked," is one of the articles we recently published, by request, in the Household Magazine, an excellent religious Monthly, published at No. 5 Beekman street, New York, and sent to some thirty thousand subscribers. We purpose to republish the entire series as given in the Magazine.

While speaking of editorial matter, there is another point on which we would say a word. As all are not familiar with newspaper usages, we are sometimes asked, "Did you write that article?" We would say to those who wish to know what part of the matter is written by the Editor, that it is understood in all papers that his writing begins with the column which has the name of the paper for a general heading, under which is the place and date of publication. In our paper the editorial matter always begins on the second page, in the column headed with the words, "The World's Crisis," and continues till you come to some article having the name of some writer either at the commencement or close. Editors do not append their names to their own articles, on account of the understanding already specified.

American Anti-Tobacco Society.

It was our privilege to attend the first annual meeting of the "American Anti-Tobacco Society," held at Park Street Church, Boston, May 30th. It was a crowded meeting of much interest. Bro. Trask, the President of the Society, is one of the live men of this age, whose eyes are fully opened to the evils arising from the use of tobacco, as well as the other sins of the land, and it was truly refreshing to see the interest that others are beginning to feel on the subject. We think no one is a consistent temperance man who uses the filthy weed in any form. If the minds of the people were fully awake to the extent of the social, physical, and moral evils arising from the use of tobacco, we feel confident there would be many happy reforms, notwithstanding the tobacco habit is one of the hardest to break. My christian brother, do abandon the use of it forever. Abandon it for the sake of neatness and convenience. Abandon it for the sake of your children, and let no one learn the disgusting habit from your example; abandon it for the sake of your health, your happiness, and for the sake of christianity. Save its cost and give to the poor. Do it now. Will you? Say, by the grace of God, I will NEVER use it again.

The following is a part of the report as presented by the President, before the intelligent audience assembled at the first meeting of the American Anti-Tobacco Society, May 30th, 1860. Please read what follows.

REPORT OF THE DOINGS OF THE
American Anti-Tobacco Society,
FOR TEN YEARS.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—A few friends have urged me to call you together to listen to a statement of the doings of the American Anti-Tobacco Society, for the ten years of its existence, and to give you an opportunity to adopt measures to arrest an evil of our times of great magnitude.

Other societies spread before you, as officers, a proud array of the great and good, whose presence dignifies their operations, and commands public homage and applause. This society is not rich in names; still we are happy to present a BOARD OF OFFICERS so united in purpose, so efficient in action, so reliable, and so well-looking, considering the "wear and tear" of this decade of hard service. The President of this society is George Trask. The Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer and Auditor, is the Rev. George Trask. The Honorary Body Corporate and Incorporate is the same unwearied individual, the "Anti-Tobacco Apostle." Fearing that rival societies, envious of our honors, may charge us with egotism, we would remind them that Dr. Timothy Dwight has said that wegotism is as bad as egotism.

The object of this society is to break up a death-like, prevalent stupidity in relation to the evils of tobacco, and "by light and love" create a public conscience, which, we trust in God, will lead to the removal of so great a curse. Other societies wield the battle-axe of reform against local evils; this evil is all-pervasive; this demoralizes nations, christian and heathen.

OBSTACLES.—This society encounters many obstacles.

1. The incorrigibility of the habit it assails. A man can give up his pastimes, his bottle, his pastor, and his politics, with less ado than his quid or pipe. If any devotee of the weed disputes this, let him try it.

2. The insidious manner in which this narcotic does mischief. It is not a bold foe; it does not, like alcohol, butcher a man's wife and children, or with fell purpose burn down a city square. It does seven-eighths of its mischief so clandestinely that seven-eighths of its victims know nothing about it! A pestilence which walketh in darkness! It curses the race with scores of diseases which go under a misnomer.

3. This cause encounters scorn and derision. It has been laughed at by superficial men, in the church and out of it, from Maine to Georgia, from Plymouth Rock to California. We have needed temples of brass—we have needed faith in God like Abraham's, to brave this tide of sarcasm and nonsense. Thank God, we have had it.

4. Saints as well as sinners use tobacco; and though a child can see that to waste time, money, health, and life, by its use, is a sin, still, so long as professors, "in good and regular standing," are invested in tobacco smoke as in clouds of incense, it is hard to convince them, or convince sots outside the church that there is any sin about it. But it is as clear as demonstration if the common use of this poison is not a sin, nothing is sin, and he is a fool who battles it.

5. The position of many ladies is unfavorable to this cause. We see wives much injured in health and beauty, and who are afflicted with scraggy, homely sons and daughters as a penalty for marrying smokers and chewers, who evince no anxiety to stop the ravages in their family circle. They are fastidious; they think it in bad taste to rebuke genteel husbands and sons for indulgence in this fashionable pleasure. But they do not think it in bad taste to live day and night in parlors and apartments all fumigated with this impurity! They are used to it. They are like the Irish girl, who was told not to marry a drunkard. She replied, "I will—I am used to it—it will seem more like home."—"De gustibus," etc.

6. The cowardice of the pulpit is an obstacle. It is an easy thing for a preacher to assault sin on the plains of Hindostan, or on plantations in Alabama; but it is not so easy to plunge into a pew only ten feet distant, and convince a fifty-thousand-dollar sinner that he is doing wrong before God in poisoning his posterity, and his fellow-men also, by using, raising or vending this pernicious article. We have no quarrel with ministers,—we are ministers ourselves,—but pulpits are muzzled; a few are free.

This evil is deadly, and well-nigh ubiquitous, and should be everywhere battled. But other causes, important, and unimportant, on which we all have been drilled to satiety, time out of mind, stand in the way, and, in order to get a hearing, we are obliged to press in and demand it, and say of this enemy, as Nelson said of the Frenchman, "I will fight him wherever I can find him; wherever a Frenchman can anchor, my ship shall be there." It is high time the battle with the great Narcotic were fought, and when time-serving men obtrude upon us their notions, and choke up our way by subterfuges and excuses, we must say to them, as one (French general) said to another, "Away with your advice; move off your column; let mine come on and do its duty."

For the Crisis.

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(FROM NOTES BY J. F. COTTON.)

MR. GRANT. My friend says he depends upon old arguments to prove man's immortality. Paul says that immortality comes from the grave when this mortal shall have put on immortality. We do not wish to change snakes into devils, but we say that the serpent of Eden was made the first medium of communication from Satan to mankind. As to the assertion that man lives longer now than of old, it is not worth answering, when the contracting span of man's existence is made manifest from one generation to another. My friend has said that one assertion is as good as another. Granted, if either cannot be proved; but what we advance is substantiated by the best authority—the Bible.

"Preached to the spirits in prison." Let us read Thompson's translation of 1 Peter 3 : 18—20.—"Brought to life by that spirit with which he went, and to the spirits which are (now) in prison, made proclamation at the time they were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God was waiting once for all in the days of Noe while the ark was building." Observe, Christ was put to death, and quickened by that spirit by the aid of which the preaching was made to the spirits in prison. When? When Noah was building the ark, and not when they were in the dark prison-house of death. 1 Pet. 4 : 6.—"For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit." McKnight's translation makes this passage clearer. He renders "For this purpose the gospel has been preached even to the dead, that although they might be condemned indeed by men in the flesh, yet they might live eternally by God in the spirit." Again, Wakefield "For this indeed was the effect of preaching the gospel to the dead, that some will be punished as carnal men, but others lead a spiritual life unto God."

We are referred to 2 Cor. 5 : 1.—"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens," etc. Wakefield renders it, "For we know that if this tent wherein we dwell, which is fixed on the ground, be taken to pieces, we have a divine building, a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens." Now then, if this house be destroyed, where shall we dwell? In that new Jerusalem which shall come down from heaven adorned like a bride. There is not a plurality of tabernacles; but one for all of the redeemed.

"Having a desire to depart." The word analuo, rendered "depart" in this passage, occurs in only one other place in the New Testament, which is in Lk. 12 : 36, and is there rendered return. In twenty manuscripts of the Septuagint, including the Oxford, it is used in Josh. 22 : 8, for the Hebrew word which invariably signifies to return. Paul was in a strait between two, whether it was better to wish to go on in his perilous ministry, or to go down into the grave, and wait to be released from the tomb and forever be present with the Lord, having a desire for the return of Christ which was far better than either.

"Souls under the altar." Whiting translates, "persons under the altar." John saw in his vision of the Apocalypse the whole martyrdom of the christians, and in the souls, or persons, under the altar, he beheld the multitude of those who fell through persecution "for the testimony which they held"; and his prophetic ear caught the cry which often went up to heaven, "How long, oh Lord, how long!" We are asked whom did the witch of Endor bring up to speak with Saul? Not Samuel, surely, unless she brought him sixty miles under ground from where the prophet was buried. But it was a demon, and a lying one, for he said, "To-morrow thou and thy sons shall be with me," when the records show that Saul was not dead till three days after, when the fugitive Amalekite found the wounded king lying upon the bloody heights of Gilboa, and at his own request dispatched him. As to men thinking or feeling after death, the Bible says, Ps. 104 : 29, "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." Reason says that man cannot think without brains. Suppose he receives a blow on the head which stuns him, and another which beats out his brains, will he think better when they are scattered about on the ground? Thus far nothing has been brought forward sufficient to prove man's inherent immortality or his consciousness between death and the resurrection. Hence we conclude that Spiritualism is opposed to the Bible, philosophy who bear out their great leader's stupendous falsehood that "man shall not surely die." [Time.]

As our time has expired we submit to the audience the remarks of the evening.

(According to the rules of the debate here ended the arguments on the first question, viz., "Is human immortality taught by the Bible, science, and philosophy, or proved by Spiritualism?" Affirmative by Mr. Loveland.)

THIRD EVENING.

Eld. Himes, the moderator, opened the meeting with prayer, after which he read the second question, viz:

"Is immortality a gift of God dependent upon the character of the receiver?" Affirmative by Eld. Grant, who opened the debate as follows:

Mr. Grant. Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: The question open before us is one of such deep interest and importance that we need not fear to overrate it. If the affirmative of this question be sustained, the foundation of hero-worship, prayers to saints, purgatory, Swedenborganism, Shakerism, and Spiritualism is removed. If the reverse then, is there strong argument in favor of these several doctrines. If the affirmative be sustained, Bible, philosophy and common sense are harmonious. As my friend and I differ, one, at least, must be wrong; for two truths cannot clash. I take the Bible for my greatest proof, as I affirm that every truth contained in Revelation is in perfect harmony with all true philosophy and science. The immortality of all men is the fundamental argument of the Spiritualist's faith. At a conference held in Ill., 1857, it was resolved, "that Spiritualism, according to the modern acceptation of the term embraces all who believe in the immortality of the soul." Says one who represents himself to be the spirit of J. C. Calhoun, "Spiritualism is to draw all mankind into harmony, and to convince men of the immortality of the soul"; so that when we remark that the immortality of all men is the fundamental argument of their faith we are sustained by their own testimony.

We shall see if the Bible substantiates this doctrine of universal immortality. Bishop Tillotson remarks, "The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than revealed in the Bible." Hengstenberg says, "The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, as well as the name, are alike unknown in the entire Bible." Such assertions from two such Bible scholars are to be depended on. But we wish this evening to ascertain beyond doubt if all have immortality, or whether the acquisition of it is conditional, and what are the conditions upon which man receives it. We think we have shown that a mere desire for it, so far from proving that it is inherent, proves that we have not got it, as we never desire that which is in our possession. If we support the affirmative of this question, we show that part of the human race is to be destroyed; consequently, all cannot have that which renders destruction impossible. The rich man and Lazarus, whether parable or history, in this case proves nothing, as the scene is laid between death and the judgment, and does not touch upon the subject of man's immortality. Both died. The place in which we find the rich man, hades, is defined to be a place where there is no knowledge. The word occurs eleven times in the New Testament, and sixty-five times in the Old Testament, but hades is never once alluded to as a place of punishment. And in the corresponding sheol there is no device, no thought; for all that are therein are dead. In Rev. 20:13, we read, "And the sea gave up the dead that were in it; and death and hell (hades) delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works." It is after the resurrection comes the judgment, and after sentence comes reward or punishment. With the exception of this one passage in Luke 16:25, "but now he is comforted and thou art tormented," there is not a single intimation of suffering prior to that day which decides forever the destiny of mankind. But the ablest of commentators have looked upon the recital as a parable, symbolic of a political grave, which has nothing to do with the subject of future punishment.

The possibility of destroying all that pertains to man is shown in the following passage. Matt. 10:28,—"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell," (gehenna). We shall show our opponent that our argument is not bare assertion. Isa. 10:18,—"And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body: and they shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth." Ezek. 18:4,—"Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die." This soul must be mortal then, and these passages prove that a portion of the human family will be destroyed, consequently immortality is not inherent in man. Ps. 145:20.—"The Lord preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy." What is the meaning of "destroy?" If this building were destroyed by fire it would no longer exist as a building, although the matter of which it was composed was not annihilated. The words rendered "destroy" in the fore- [illegible] pick. In Num. 33:52, we read the stern command which was given to the Israelites in regard to the Canaanites, "And ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their moulten images, and quite pluck down all their high places." Ps. 37:38.—"But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off." This does not look like immortality to all. As we have no other means of knowing anything of futurity, save by the word of God, we therefore appeal to the Bible. Ps. 92:7—"When the wicked spring as the grass; and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed forever." The word rendered forever—ad—is defined, "perpetual time, eternity."—Gesenius. The word occurs in Isa. 9:6; 57:15 and Ps. 45:6. Isa. 9:6.—"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulders: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Isa. 57:15.—"For thus saith the high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity." Ps. 45:6.—"Thy throne, oh God, is forever and ever." Those who reject the Bible, reject those proofs which harmonize with the justice and love of God. One more passage, Prov. 13:13.—"Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed; but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded."

And here we would remark that in none of the passages quoted does the word "destroy" mean suffering. We make this observation for the benefit of those who believe in eternal torments. All signify that ruin which shall fall upon those who do not fear Him who can destroy both soul and body in hell. This is what is alluded to in Jer. 17:18, as "double destruction;" and in Prov. 29:1, as "destruction without remedy." If there were a restitution after destruction there would be a remedy. And it is not a few who are rushing to this fearful doom, although our opponent affirms that man progresses and is growing better. Our Savior said, "Wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." He also tells us of a strait gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few shall find. Thus we see, if we admit this testimony, that there is a way to destruction as well as to life. [Time.]

Mr. Loveland. Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentleman: I have promised attention to all the arguments which my brother advances in leading this part of our debate. I have done so, and yet I cannot find that he has met any of my arguments by which I substantiated the inherent, natural immortality of man. Some he has not even deigned to notice. The natural man discerneth not the things of the Spirit. The immortality of man is not a gift. It is nowhere spoken of as such in the Bible. He has a dual nature, a natural body and a spiritual body, which shall be reunited in joint immortality, as Paul admits, at the resurrection. There is no proof of the existence of superhuman devils. If I prove the existence of spirits in a sphere of spiritual existence, all my opponent's arguments fall to the ground. After admitting that a man ever lives again after his body dies, our position is sustained.

In reference to the rich man and Lazarus, I would again inquire, what was it that was tormented, distinct from the body? Answer me that. Is the tabernacle spoken of in 2 Cor. which is to last forever to be upon this earth, which according to my opponent's theory is soon to be dashed to pieces? Perhaps Peter may throw some light upon this tabernacle. 2 Pet. 1:13, 14.—"Yea, I think it meet as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by way of remembrance. Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me." Now I should like to know what Peter expected soon to put off. He knew that his death was approaching, and that the worn-out tent, his body, which should soon be rent and mangled would shortly be laid aside. I would also ask again, what is it that could be absent from the body and present with the Lord? What was it which desired to depart and be with Christ? Until this objection is answered and overcome, my brother cannot advance a step. On the contrary, see how his position proves the dual nature of man which shows a soul and body to be destroyed.

"Preaching to the spirits in prison." My opponent says this was done while Noah was building the ark; but Peter says differently. I believe that Christ did the preaching without employing Noah. It does not require a great amount of learning, although it would seem so, to bring forward those translations which my brother puts forward to prove that it was the same powerful spirit that raised Christ from the dead that preached through Noah to the spirits in prison.

Most certainly, Christ went to the other world at his death. "Thou shalt not leave him in hell nor suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." What was that spirit which Jesus yielded up to his Father? Was it merely a breath? different from any other breath which he had drawn in the thirty-three years of his life?

"The souls under the altar." John is symbolic here. He says, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God and for the testimony which they held." We are told that these were those slain in subsequent persecution. If there is nothing to man except the body, when the body is killed, what is it cries, "How long, oh Lord, holy and just?" Then there are those in white robes who have come up out of great tribulation, who are praising and glorifying God by singing the "new song." The amended translations do not touch it, and we prefer to take the Revelator's testimony as literal. [Time.]

Correspondence.

From Bro. L. Boutell.

Bro. Grant:—I have spent the three last Sundays with the people here, and we are having blessed good times. For a long time spiritual desolation has been prevailing here. They have occasionally had good preaching, but very little or no improvement has been derived from it. Roots of bitterness have sprung up, and been permitted to grow, and instead of watching for the good of one another, it has been the reverse. The meetings grew dull and thin till there were but few left to weep between the porch and the altar. But recently, through the abundant grace of our Lord Jesus, who has been pleased to hear prayer, the Holy Spirit is operating on the hearts of the children of men, and by the "foolishness of preaching" some are being convicted, convinced, and by faith saved. We have meetings almost every day, and some have been brought from darkness to light and their tongues tuned with the new song, even praise to our God.

The meetings are very good and growing better. Conviction, and the feeling need of salvation through Christ, is sensibly prevalent in the congregation, and in view of the speedy termination of the day of mercy, these are solemn and golden hours. The poor wayward and backslidden seem to be the hardest to reach, but by the grace of God we design to keep up the steam till they are softened, limbered, and straightened so as to be worked into the spiritual building. Yesterday was a very interesting day here. The chapel was crowded to hearken to the "lively oracles," and after meeting, we repaired to the water side, where Bro. Wm. Mitchell planted three cheerful disciples in the likeness of Christ's death and resurrection. The scene was made more affecting to see our widowed sister of seventy-four years, with willing steps, following her Master and receiving baptism. Her feet are on the rock. Surely the Lord is abundant in mercy, slow to anger, full of compassion. Others have come out fully on the Lord's side, rejoicing in hope and will follow in baptism soon. Praise ye the Lord. In the evening we had the communion and Lord's supper to show forth his death till he come.

The indications here are encouraging. Bro. J. W. White has been with us and is full of courage in the commencement of his ministry. Salvation by faith is our daily theme, neither have we forgotten the soon coming glory; bless God, we are full of hope, comfort, joy and peace in tribulation. L. Boutell.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Yarmouth, Me., May 19th, 1860, at the residence of Eld. R. R. York, Sister Phebe West, aged seventy-three years.

The subject of this notice was the mother of Sister York, and had for some years, since the death of her husband, shared the care and sympathy of an affectionate daughter in the last days of her pilgrimage. Sister W. had not made the profession of her faith in Christ so public as many others, yet in the last years of her life she has given good evidence to her relatives and acquaintances that her sympathies were with Christ and his followers, and her interest in their prosperity. For some years she was an invalid, and not able to attend meetings, but was glad to have others enjoy such privileges. We trust she will meet all the saints in the soon coming kingdom. During her last illness she was very patient in all her distress, not murmuring at all, and at last breathed out her life calmly, without a struggle or a groan.

She leaves two sons and five daughters to mourn the death of a dear mother, but not without hope; soon Jesus will come and raise his followers to immortality and eternal life. Five of the family were present at the funeral, which was attended by the writer on the 21st. Many friends were in attendance. I. C. Wellcome.

Died, at Chicopee Falls, Mass., May 22d, Stillman Munger (my father), aged seventy-seven years and four months.

He died on the birthday of my mother, who is seventy-six, the mother of eleven children, grandmother of forty-two, and great-grandmother of twelve children. Among all her relatives, she never sat clad in mourning at a funeral before, but she is a poor mourning widow now, the first mourner of twenty-seven who followed father to the grave. Many of the friends could not attend. He was the patriarch of the largest group of mourners I ever saw in this town. He had no enemies, but many friends. Although his funeral was in the business time of the year, on a week day and in a factory village, it was judged that over three hundred attended, who sat patiently to listen to a discourse by Bro. Gage, the Methodist minister, from 2 Cor. 5:1.

The resurrection of the dead as the only time for our reward has been my father's belief for six years. He died in peace, and in full hope of a speedy resurrection unto life. The poor old man has suffered as much under the curse of getting bread for himself and family by the sweat of his brow, as any man I know of, having a large family to support by hard labor. His last will and advice was listened to with much interest by us all. After dividing his little stock of clothing, he left three articles of tools to be distributed among us as we saw fit—an axe, a hoe, and a wood saw—not one article apiece to remember a father by. But he will not be forgotten by us. He said to us that he had done all in his power for us, and must leave soon. His last words were, "All 's well."

The honors of this world look small to us as a family. The glory of the kingdom to come is our hope, when we shall meet our friend again, clad in immortality. Hiram Munger.

Married.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Herald says: I have certain information that a formidable armament is in course of preparation to proceed to Turkish waters. I have also reason to believe that the French squadron will be accompanied by a couple of Russian line-of-battle-ships and two or three frigates.

AUSTRIA.

In consequence of Garibaldi's departure for Sicily, the Austrian government has resolved to send a flotilla to cruise off the coasts of the island. All war-steamers which were stationed in our port have been united under the command of the Commodore Willersdorf, and have set sail for Sicily.

SICILY AND GARIBALDI.

The Paris correspondent of the "Times" says the telegraphic dispatches received from Naples are to the effect that the utmost consternation prevailed in that city; that increased means to protect the French residents had been called for; that fugitives continued to arrive in Sicily, that manifestations of a rather tumultuous description had taken place, that the troops had become dispirited, and some are refused to march, that the police agents had fired on the groups, and killed or wounded several, and that every thing presaged a great insurrection.

The "Times" of the 18th has the following summary of the most that is yet known respecting Garibaldi's expedition:

"Garibaldi has landed with his followers on the Sicilian coast at Marsala, a place famous for its wine. It was previously known that the ships Piemonte and Lombardo, in which his forces were, after leaving Genoa, had touched at Talamona, on the Roman frontier, and that Garibaldi had issued a characteristic proclamation against the Neapolitan Bourbon, the Pope, and the Austrians. The telegram from Turin states that four men were killed in landing, and it adds that other supplies of arms, which came from the Levant, for the use of the insurgents, had previously arrived in the Southern coast of Sicily. The forces under Garibaldi amount to about 2000.

The Paris "Pays" says that after having landed his volunteers, Garibaldi, by means of arrangements previously concerted, succeeded in concentrating the insurrection. We are assured that he has already made himself master of all the most important places on the island. It would appear from other very recent information that a part of Garibaldi's expedition has landed in Calabria, and that the insurrection, almost triumphant in Sicily, now threatens Naples and the Neapolitan provinces in the peninsula. The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Post says: It is positively stated in dispatches that the insurrection in Sicily has assumed large proportions. The situation of affairs is complicated by the march of a corps of Garibaldians, on their way from Tuscany toward Naples, through the Roman States.

The Paris correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated the 16th, says:

The dispatches received to-day from Italy have created a sort of bewilderment at the Bourse which is almost in a panic. No one knows what to believe or whom to believe. We gather, however, without vouching for the certainty, that Garibaldi, or Garibaldi's followers are triumphant in Sicily, except in the two points of Messina and Palermo, in one of which are 12,000 Neapolitan troops; in the other 15,000. Others affirm that Garibaldi is not in Sicily, but in the Umbria, and that it is his name alone which has done wonders in the island, while he in person is revolutionizing the terra firma.

[From Liverpool the 23d.]

SICILY.

Official Neapolitan statements were current at the departure of the Arabia that Garibaldi's forces were completely routed at Palermo, which are now flatly contradicted. The Neapolitan troops were completely defeated.

Garibaldi's troops had invested Moreilla, which commands Palermo.

The latest rumors state that Garibaldi had obtained a decided victory at Moreilla.

The Neapolitan government has very little to say, but their last bulletin has it that two columns were pursuing the dispersed troops of Garibaldi.

The insurgents were gaining strength daily.

CHINA.

A private dispatch from China says that the Chinese government absolutely refuses the ultimatum of England and France, and that war is the only alternative.

Terrible Tornado.—Chicago, June 4.—A terrible tornado occurred in Eastern Iowa and Northwestern Illinois last night, involving more destruction in life and property in Clinton, Iowa, than any thing of the kind before. The towns of Camanche, Iowa and Albany, Ill., have been completely demolished. In the former town thirty-two dead bodies have already been recovered, and there are still a number under the ruins.

Notices, &c.

Campmeeting.

It will be remembered that at the last Westford campmeeting it was voted, if time should continue till another August, that another meeting should be had in the same place; and a committee was chosen to carry the same into effect. I write this notice thus early to apprise the rest of the committee of their duty, and that we may harmoniously make all necessary arrangements for the success of the meeting; also, that any suggestions relative to so important a meeting should be made in due season. Bro. Munger informs me, the Wilbraham meeting will commence the 20th of August. Shall ours be before it, or after?

Moses Cohant, Lowell,
Ezra Heath, Lynn,
M. M. Young, East Boston,
Samuel Ayres, Worcester,
Committee.

Any suggestions gladly received by the committee. Direct to me at Groton, Mass. L. Boutell.

La Porte Quarterly Meeting.

The next quarterly meeting of the LaPorte district will commence Friday evening, June 29th, and continue over the Lord's day. All interested are invited to attend.

By order of the Church,
B. P. Morgan.

Notice.

We have engaged Eld. Walter Pratt to supply the desk in Portsmouth, N. H., for the present. The preaching brethren will please direct all letters to him relative to appointments until further notice.
R. F. Berry, Clerk.

☞ A grove meeting will be held in Plainfield, on land owned by Bro. Edmond Beals, commencing Thursday, June 28th, continuing over the Sabbath. Bro. H. Pratt is expected to attend, and we would be glad to have Sr. E. S. Fenn come and labor also.
David Thayer, for the Church.

Grove Meeting.

There will be a Grove Meeting, the Lord willing, at Pine Swamp, Sharon, Ct., about three miles from West Cornwall Depot, on the Housatonic R. R., to commence the 21st of June, and continue over Sunday. Provision will be made to accommodate brethren and sisters from abroad. Come in the name of the Lord. We pray the Lord to send such preaching brethren as are adapted to the wants of the people there.

In behalf of the brethren,
S. B. Munn.

Grove Meetings in Wisconsin.

A grove meeting will be held at Springville, Badaxe Co., Wis., commencing Friday, at 2 P. M., June 1st. Call on Bro. Wm. A. Morse for further information. Several ministers are expected.

Also one at Ironton, Sauk Co., Wis., commencing Friday, June 7th, at 2 P. M. A number of preachers will attend. Call on Eld. G. W. Turner for particulars.

Also one at Fairfield, Sauk Co., Wis., commencing Friday, June 14th, at 2 P. M. Inquire for Eld. G. W. Barnes.

Also one at West Point, Columbia Co., Wis., commencing at 2 P. M., Friday, June 21st. Call on Bro. Ira Polley.

Also one at Kingston, Sauk Co., Wis., commencing June 28th, at 2 P. M. Inquire for Bro. Parley Bush.

All these meetings will continue over the Lord's day. Several ministers will be present.
Wm. Sheldon.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

[illegible]

who bear out their great leader's stupendous falsehood that "man shall not surely die." [Time.]

As our time has expired we submit to the audience the remarks of the evening.

(According to the rules of the debate here ended the arguments on the first question, viz., "Is human immortality taught by the Bible, science, and philosophy, or proved by Spiritualism?" Affirmative by Mr. Loveland.)

THIRD EVENING.

Eld. Himes, the moderator, opened the meeting with prayer, after which he read the second question, viz:

"Is immortality a gift of God dependent upon the character of the receiver?" Affirmative by Eld. Grant, who opened the debate as follows:

Mr. Grant. Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: The question open before us is one of such deep interest and importance that we need not fear to overrate it. If the affirmative of this question be sustained, the foundation of hero-worship, prayers to saints, purgatory, Swedenborganism, Shakerism, and Spiritualism is removed. If the reverse then, is there strong argument in favor of these several doctrines. If the affirmative be sustained, Bible, philosophy and common sense are harmonious. As my friend and I differ, one, at least, must be wrong; for two truths cannot clash. I take the Bible for my greatest proof, as I affirm that every truth contained in Revelation is in perfect harmony with all true philosophy and science. The immortality of all men is the fundamental argument of the Spiritualist's faith. At a conference held in Ill., 1857, it was resolved, "that Spiritualism, according to the modern acceptation of the term embraces all who believe in the immortality of the soul." Says one who represents himself to be the spirit of J. C. Calhoun, "Spiritualism is to draw all mankind into harmony, and to convince men of the immortality of the soul"; so that when we remark that the immortality of all men is the fundamental argument of their faith we are sustained by their own testimony.

We shall see if the Bible substantiates this doctrine of universal immortality. Bishop Tillotson remarks, "The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than revealed in the Bible." Hengstenberg says, "The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, as well as the name, are alike unknown in the entire Bible." Such assertions from two such Bible scholars are to be depended on. But we wish this evening to ascertain beyond doubt if all have immortality, or whether the acquisition of it is conditional, and what are the conditions upon which man receives it. We think we have shown that a mere desire for it, so far from proving that it is inherent, proves that we have not got it, as we never desire that which is in our possession. If we support the affirmative of this question, we show that part of the human race is to be destroyed; consequently, all cannot have that which renders destruction impossible. The rich man and Lazarus, whether parable or history, in this case proves nothing, as the scene is laid between death and the judgment, and does not touch upon the subject of man's immortality. Both died. The place in which we find the rich man, hades, is defined to be a place where there is no knowledge. The word occurs eleven times in the New Testament, and sixty-five times in the Old Testament, but hades is never once alluded to as a place of punishment. And in the corresponding sheol there is no device, no thought; for all that are therein are dead. In Rev. 20: 13, we read, "And the sea gave up the dead that were in it; and death and hell (hades) delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works." It is after the resurrection comes the judgment, and after sentence comes reward or punishment. With the exception of this one passage in Luke 16: 25, "but now he is comforted and thou art tormented," there is not a single intimation of suffering prior to that day which decides forever the destiny of mankind. But the ablest of commentators have looked upon the recital as a parable, symbolic of a political grave, which has nothing to do with the subject of future punishment.

The possibility of destroying all that pertains to man is shown in the following passage. Matt. 10: 28,—"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell," (gehenna). We shall show our opponent that our argument is not bare assertion. Isa. 10: 18,—"And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body: and they shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth." Ezek. 18: 4,—"Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die." This soul must be mortal then, and these passages prove that a portion of the human family will be destroyed, consequently immortality is not inherent in man. Ps. 145: 20,—"The Lord preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy." What is the meaning of "destroy?" If this building were destroyed by fire it would no longer exist as a building, although the matter of which it was composed was not annihilated. The words rendered "destroy" in the fore[illegible] [illegible] Pick. In Num. 33: 52, we read the stern command which was given to the Israelites in regard to the Canaanites, "And ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places." Ps. 37: 38,—"But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off." This does not look like immortality to all. As we have no other means of knowing anything of futurity, save by the word of God, we therefore appeal to the Bible. Ps. 92: 7—"When the wicked spring as the grass; and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed forever." The word rendered forever—ad—is defined, "perpetual time, eternity." —Gesenius. The word occurs in Isa. 9: 6; 57: 15 and Ps. 45: 6. Isa. 9: 6.—"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulders: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Isa. 57: 15.—"For thus saith the high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity." Ps. 45: 6.—"Thy throne, oh God, is forever and ever." Those who reject the Bible, reject those proofs which harmonize with the justice and love of God. One more passage, Prov. 13: 13.—"Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed; but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded."

And here we would remark that in none of the passages quoted does the word "destroy" mean suffering. We make this observation for the benefit of those who believe in eternal torments. All signify that ruin which shall fall upon those who do not fear Him who can destroy both soul and body in hell. This is what is alluded to in Jer. 17: 18, as "double destruction;" and in Prov. 29: 1, as "destruction without remedy." If there were a restitution after destruction there would be a remedy. And it is not a few who are rushing to this fearful doom, although our opponent affirms that man progresses and is growing better. Our Savior said, "Wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." He also tells us of a strait gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few shall find. Thus we see, if we admit this testimony, that there is a way to destruction as well as to life. [Time.]

Mr. Loveland. Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentleman: I have promised attention to all the arguments which my brother advances in leading this part of our debate. I have done so, and yet I cannot find that he has met any of my arguments by which I substantiated the inherent, natural immortality of man. Some he has not even designed to notice. The natural man discerneth not the things of the Spirit. The immortality of man is not a gift. It is no where spoken of as such in the Bible. He has a dual nature, a natural body and a spiritual body, which shall be reunited in joint immortality, as Paul admits, at the resurrection. There is no proof of the existence of superhuman devils. If I prove the existence of spirits in a sphere of spiritual existence, all my opponent's arguments fall to the ground. After admitting that a man ever lives again after his body dies, our position is sustained.

In reference to the rich man and Lazarus, I would again inquire, what was it that was tormented, distinct from the body? Answer me that. Is the tabernacle spoken of in 2 Cor. which is to last forever to be upon this earth, which according to my opponent's theory is soon to be dashed to pieces? Perhaps Peter may throw some light upon this tabernacle. 2 Pet. 1: 13, 14.—"Yea, I think it meet as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by way of remembrance. Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me." Now I should like to know what Peter expected soon to put off. He knew that his death was approaching, and that the worn-out tent, his body, which should soon be rent and mangled would shortly be laid aside. I would also ask again, what is it that could be absent from the body and present with the Lord? What was it which desired to depart and be with Christ? Until this objection is answered and overcome, my brother cannot advance a step. On the contrary, see how his position proves the dual nature of man which shows a soul and body to be destroyed.

"Preaching to the spirits in prison." My opponent says this was done while Noah was building the ark; but Peter says differently. I believe that Christ did the preaching without employing Noah. It does not require a great amount of learning, although it would seem so, to bring forward those translations which my brother puts forward to prove that it was the same powerful spirit that raised Christ from the dead that preached through Noah to the spirits in prison.

Most certainly, Christ went to the other world at his death. "Thou shalt not leave him in hell nor suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." What was that spirit which Jesus yielded up to his Father? Was it merely a breath? different from any other breath which he had drawn in the thirty-three years of his life?

"The souls under the altar." John is emphatic here. He says, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God and for the testimony which they held." We are told that these were those slain in subsequent persecution. If there is nothing to man except the body, when the body is killed, what is it cries, "How long, oh Lord, holy and just?" Then there are those in white robes who have come up out of great tribulation, who are praising and glorifying God by singing the "new song." The amended translations do not touch it, and we prefer to take the Revelator's testimony as literal. [Time.]

Correspondence.

From Bro. L. Boutell.

Bro. Grant:—I have spent the three last Sundays with the people here, and we are having blessed good times. For a long time spiritual desolation has been prevailing here. They have occasionally had good preaching, but very little or no improvement has been derived from it. Roots of bitterness have sprung up, and been permitted to grow, and instead of watching for the good of one another, it has been the reverse. The meetings grew dull and thin till there were but few left to weep between the porch and the altar. But recently, through the abundant grace of our Lord Jesus, who has been pleased to hear prayer, the Holy Spirit is operating on the hearts of the children of men, and by the "foolishness of preaching" some are being convicted, convinced, and by faith saved. We have meetings almost every day, and some have been brought from darkness to light and their tongues tuned with the new song, even praise to our God.

The meetings are very good and growing better. Conviction, and the feeling need of salvation through Christ, is sensibly prevalent in the congregation, and in view of the speedy termination of the day of mercy, these are solemn and golden hours. The poor wayward and backslidden seem to be the hardest to reach, but by the grace of God we design to keep up the steam till they are softened, limbered, and straightened so as to be worked into the spiritual building. Yesterday was a very interesting day here. The chapel was crowded to hearken to the "lively oracles," and after meeting, we repaired to the water side, where Bro. Wm. Mitchell planted three cheerful disciples in the likeness of Christ's death and resurrection. The scene was made more affecting to see our widowed sister of seventy-four years, with willing steps, following her Master and receiving baptism. Her feet are on the rock. Surely the Lord is abundant in mercy, slow to anger, full of compassion. Others have come out fully on the Lord's side, rejoicing in hope and will follow in baptism soon. Praise ye the Lord. In the evening we had the communion and Lord's supper to show forth his death till he come.

The indications here are encouraging. Bro. J. W. White has been with us and is full of courage in the commencement of his ministry. Salvation by faith is our daily theme, neither have we forgotten the soon coming glory; bless God, we are full of hope, comfort, joy and peace in tribulation. L. Boutell.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Yarmouth, Me., May 19th, 1860, at the residence of Eld. B. R. York, Sister Phebe West, aged seventy-three years.

The subject of this notice was the mother of Sister York, and had for some years, since the death of her husband, shared the care and sympathy of an affectionate daughter in the last days of her pilgrimage. Sister W had not made the profession of her faith in Christ so public as many others, yet in the last years of her life she has given good evidence to her relatives and acquaintances that her sympathies were with Christ and his followers, and her interest in their prosperity. For some years she was an invalid, and not able to attend meetings; but was glad to have others enjoy such privileges. We trust she will meet all the saints in the soon coming kingdom. During her last illness she was very patient in all her distress, not murmuring at all, and at last breathed out her life calmly, without a struggle or a groan.

She leaves two sons and five daughters to mourn the death of a dear mother, but not without hope; soon Jesus will come and raise his followers to immortality and eternal life. Five of the family were present at the funeral, which was attended by the writer on the 21st. Many friends were in attendance.

I. C. Wellcome.

Died, at Chicopee Falls, Mass., May 22d, Stillman Munger (my father), aged seventy-seven years and four months.

He died on the birthday of my mother, who is seventy-six, the mother of eleven children, grandmother of forty-two, and great-grandmother of twelve children. Among all her relatives, she never sat clad in mourning at a funeral before, but she is a poor mourning widow now, the first mourner of twenty-seven who followed father to the grave. Many of the friends could not attend. He was the patriarch of the largest group of mourners I ever saw in this town. He had no enemies, but many friends. Although his funeral was in the business time of the year, on a week day and in a factory village, it was judged that over three hundred attended, who sat patiently to listen to a discourse by Bro. Gage, the Methodist minister, from 2 Cor. 5: 1.

The resurrection of the dead as the only time for our reward has been my father's belief for six years. He died in peace, and in full hope of a speedy resurrection unto life. The poor old man has suffered as much under the curse of getting bread for himself and family by the sweat of his brow, as any man I know of, having a large family to support by hard labor. His last will and advice was listened to with much interest by us all. After dividing his little stock of clothing, he left three articles of tools to be distributed among us as we saw fit—an axe, a hoe, and a wood saw—not one article apiece to remember a father by. But he will not be forgotten by us. He said to us that he had done all in his power for us, and must leave soon. His last words were, "All 's well."

The honors of this world look small to us as a family. The glory of the kingdom to come is our hope, when we shall meet our friend again, clad in immortality.

Hiram Munger.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Herald says I have certain information that a formidable armament is in course of preparation to proceed to Turkish waters. I have also reason to believe that the French squadron will be accompanied by a couple of Russian line-of-battle-ships and two or three frigates.

AUSTRIA.

In consequence of Garibaldi's departure for Sicily, the Austrian government has resolved to send a flotilla to cruise off the coasts of the island. All war-steamers which were stationed in our port have been united under the command of the Commodore Willersdorf, and have set sail for Sicily.

SICILY AND GARIBALDI.

The Paris correspondent of the "Times" says the telegraphic dispatches received from Naples are to the effect that the utmost consternation prevailed in that city; that increased means to protect the French residents had been called for; that fugitives continued to arrive in Sicily; that manifestations of a rather tumultuous description had taken place, that the troops had become dispirited, and some say refused to march, that the police agents had fired on the groups, and killed or wounded several, and that every thing presaged a great insurrection.

The "Times" of the 18th has the following summary of the most that is yet known respecting Garibaldi's expedition.

"Garibaldi has landed with his followers on the Sicilian coast at Marsala, a place famous for its wine. It was previously known that the ships Piemonte and Lombardo, in which his forces were, after leaving Genoa, had touched at Talomona, on the Roman frontier, and that Garibaldi had issued a characteristic proclamation against the Neapolitan Bourbon, the Pope, and the Austrians. The telegram from Turin states that four men were killed in landing, and it adds that other supplies of arms, which came from the Levant, for the use of the insurgents, had previously arrived in the Southern coast of Sicily. The forces under Garibaldi amount to about 2000.

The Paris "Pays" says that after having landed his volunteers, Garibaldi, by means of arrangements previously concerted, succeeded in concentrating the insurrection. We are assured that he has already made himself master of all the most important places on the island. It would appear from other very recent information that a part of Garibaldi's expedition has landed in Calabria, and that the insurrection, almost triumphant in Sicily, now threatens Naples and the Neapolitan provinces in the peninsula. The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Post says: It is positively stated in dispatches that the insurrection in Sicily has assumed large proportions. The situation of affairs is complicated by the march of a corps of Garibaldians, on their way from Tuscany toward Naples, through the Roman States.

The Paris correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated the 16th, says

The dispatches received to-day from Italy have created a sort of bewilderment at the Bourse which is almost in a panic. No one knows what to believe or whom to believe. We gather, however, without vouching for the certainty, that Garibaldi, or Garibaldi's followers are triumphant in Sicily, except in the two points of Messina and Palermo, in one of which are 12,000 Neapolitan troops; in the other 15,000. Others affirm that Garibaldi is not in Sicily, but in the Umbria, and that it is his name alone which has done wonders in the island, while he in person is revolutionizing the terra firma.

SICILY.

Official Neapolitan statements were current at the departure of the Arabia that Garibaldi's forces were completely routed at Palermo, which are now flatly contradicted. The Neapolitan troops were completely defeated.

Garibaldi's troops had invested Moreilla, which commands Palermo.

The latest rumors state that Garibaldi had obtained a decided victory at Moreilla.

The Neapolitan government has very little to say, but their last bulletin has it that two columns were pursuing the dispersed troops of Garibaldi.

The insurgents were gaining strength daily.

CHINA.

A private dispatch from China says that the Chinese government absolutely refuses the ultimatum of England and France, and that war is the only alternative.

Terrible Tornado.—Chicago, June 4.—A terrible tornado occurred in Eastern Iowa and Northwestern Illinois last night, involving more destruction in life and property in Clinton, Iowa, than any thing of the kind before.

The towns of Camanche, Iowa and Albany, Ill., have been completely demolished. In the former town thirty-two dead bodies have already been recovered, and there are still a number under the ruins.

Notices, &c.

Campmeeting.

It will be remembered that at the last Westford campmeeting it was voted, if time should continue till another August, that another meeting should be had in the same place; and a committee was chosen to carry the same into effect. I write this notice thus early to apprise the rest of the committee of their duty, and that we may harmoniously make all necessary arrangements for the success of the meeting; also, that any suggestions relative to so important a meeting should be made in due season. Bro. Munger informs me, the Wilbraham meeting will commence the 20th of August. Shall ours be before it, or after?

Moses Conant, Lowell, } Committee.
Ezra Hearth, Lynn,
M. M. Young, East Boston,
Samuel Ayres, Worcester,

Any suggestions gladly received by the committee. Direct to me at Groton, Mass. [illegible]

La Porte Quarterly Meeting.

The next quarterly meeting of the LaPorte district will commence Friday evening, June 29th, and continue over the Lord's day. All interested are invited to attend.

By order of the Church,
B. P. Morgan.

Notice.

We have engaged Eld. Walter Pratt to supply the desk in Portsmouth, N. H., for the present. The preaching brethren will please direct all letters to him relative to appointments until further notice.

R. F. Berry, Clerk.

☞ A grove meeting will be held in Plainfield, on land owned by Bro. Edmond Beals, commencing Thursday, June 28th, continuing over the Sabbath. Bro. H. Pratt is expected to attend, and we would be glad to have Sr. R. S. Fenn come and labor also.

David Thayer, for the Church.

Grove Meeting.

There will be a Grove Meeting, the Lord willing, at Pine Swamp, Sharon, Ct., about three miles from West Cornwall Depot, on the Housatonic R. R., to commence the 21st of June, and continue over Sunday. Provision will be made to accommodate brethren and sisters from abroad. Come in the name of the Lord. We pray the Lord to send such preaching brethren as are adapted to the wants of the people there.

In behalf of the brethren,
S. B. Munn.

Also one at Kingston, Sauk Co., Wis., commencing June 28th, at 2 P. M. Inquire for Bro. Parley Bush.

All these meetings will continue over the Lord's day. Several ministers will be present.

Wm. Sheldon.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Bre. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

The Resurrection.

Our friends are falling 'round us,
We sigh to see them go,—
Experience has taught us
We'll meet no more below.

Philosophy has reasoned,
(And Hope its tidings bring,)
The flowers that fade in autumn
Shall bloom again in spring.

The garden shrubs that perish,
The laws of nature save;
So those our bosoms cherish
May live beyond the grave.

The vine that binds the forest,
By storms autumnal broke,
Again, with 'livened tendrils,
Shall cling around the oak.

So those whom death hath severed,
A spring-time may release,
Where love may claim affection,
In a land of joy and peace.

Yet on these thoughts, if mortal,
Might ceaseless war be waged;
But Heaven's truth has promised,
The word of God is pledged,—

That those who sleep in Jesus,
(In that auspicious day)
God shall himself bring with him,
Though long appear the stay.

I've friends that sleep in Jesus—
And what a hope is this!
That God will bring them with him,
To the realms of perfect bliss;

And we caught up together—
According to his word—
Shall hail our friends in triumph,
Forever with the Lord!

For the Crisis.

Thoughts on Rev. 7: 9.

"I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands."

These words of the apostle John came to my mind as I met with Bro. Pratt and wife at the social meeting on Friday evening for the first time, and we enjoyed a blessed season together. My mind was carried forward to the time when, if faithful, we shall enjoy the presence of all the saints of every nation, kindred and people that have served God upon earth, and are made fit for the enjoyment of the everlasting kingdom. We are also informed that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things God hath prepared for those that love him. How thankful I feel to God for his revealed will in the gospel of his Son, which enlightened our minds amid the gross darkness which surrounds us at the present time.

We are informed from the Holy Scriptures, which alone give certainty to the doubting mind, that the blessed society in the kingdom of God consists of the good of all nations, who are clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness with a meek and humble spirit. No contention will be known in that peaceful abode. Names and sects will not be heard among the redeemed, for they consist of all kindreds, and people, and tongues. They will only be known as the disciples of Jesus; and all such as possess his spirit and nature will be gathered into his fold. We shall there rejoin friends for whom we have mourned here. With every sorrow which rends the heart, with every blight which comes over our earthly hopes, with every separation we mourn, a consoling hope is ours; the blessed gospel of Jesus Christ soothes all our sorrows. He has brought immortality to light by his resurrection from the grave.

We are encouraged to believe that there will be mutual knowledge of each other in the world to come, and we shall form a sacred friendship with those who have escaped unpolluted from the present state of imperfections of sin and sorrow. O let it be our greatest concern, by the aid of God's grace, to be prepared to join the blessed multitude. May we listen to the commands of the Savior, and although trials, crosses and disappointments perplex our way, let us strive to cultivate that enduring character through all the changes of this life, and aim to perform faithfully all duties enjoined upon us, knowing that our Savior will pronounce the sentence "Well done" on such only as have kept his commandments.

May it be our greatest aim so to live here, that when the great Life-giver shall come we may be of that happy multitude which shall stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, having palms in their hands, where is fulness of joy, and where are pleasures forevermore.

The land, the land is nearing, where joys are ever new,
The everlasting kingdom, the city is in view;
With prophets, saints and angels, God's shining retinue.
Blow, blow, then, gentle breezes, the land I long to see,
And hear the mighty trumpet proclaim the jubilee;
O come, thou mighty Conqueror, bring immortality!

The Turkish Empire.

An intelligent English writer, who is a very close observer of the signs of the times says:

"The fall of the Turkish empire seems likely to take place within a few months more. The most sinister rumors are circulating throughout Europe, and are taken up and repeated by all the populations of European Turkey. A secret alliance is said to have been formed between France, Russia, and Austria, for the dismemberment of the Ottoman empire. Austria is to receive compensation for the loss of Italy by the acquisition of an equivalent territory on the eastern shores of the Gulf of Venice. By such an arrangement Austria will be bound to France in spite of the recent war between the two countries. And Russia will equally be attached to France through the clear conviction that without French co-operation the dismemberment of Turkey will be impossible. However the three Powers may hate one another, self-interest alone will be sufficient to create a temporary alliance. Every one must have observed the incessant stream of foreigners which has lately poured into this country; but have you observed that they are all in the Russian interest? Whether native Russians, or Germans, or Dutch, our Royal or Imperial visitors are all intimately connected with Russia. They are, in fact, Russian agents, sent over for the purpose of allaying our suspicions by the appearance of intimacy and good-will. Sent over, also, as political spies, to discover the feelings of the nation upon subjects of foreign politics; and no doubt to gain our consent, or our co-operation, in the dismemberment of the Turkish empire. In fact, we have been inundated with Russianizing visitors, even of the highest rank; and Russia never does anything without a special purpose. And the English aristocracy have showed the most undeserved attention to persons who have visited this country for no other purpose but that of treachery and mischief. As for French visitors we have had but few, because the nearness and intimacy of the two countries render such agency superfluous.

Before the Russian war of 1854, it is well known that we were honored by an influx of Russianizing agents, of the highest rank. The same thing has occurred in 1859 and 1860. It is the omen of another war, or rather another aggression upon Turkey. France, Austria, and Russia, or France and Russia, are certainly combined for the partition of Turkey. They have not omitted a single preliminary. Denmark and Sweden have formed a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France, by which the Baltic may be closed, and Germany kept in awe. The war in Morocco has given Spain a complete predominence over the Moors; and Spain herself is the humble servant of Napoleon the Third. "Close up the Straits!" will be the orders, bye and bye, telegraphed from the Tuileries; and the Mediterranean will be locked up. Spain, in herself possesses the whole NORTH coast of the Straits—Gibraltar excepted. She has now obtained so firm a footing in Morocco, that she can at any time demand as much as she pleases of the SOUTH coast of the Straits; and then, by throwing up earthworks, the navigation will be almost wholly in her power. Gibraltar will be NEUTRALIZED, and the Mediterranean will be in the hands of France and Russia. The French fleets issuing from Toulon, and the Russian fleet from the Black Sea, will rule the Mediterranean from end to end, and dominate over the whole sea-board of the Roman world. Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Sardinia, and Austria—all in strict alliance with France, will contribute their respective squadrons, and England will be left single-handed in the contest. To trust the friendship of the United States would be as wise as to trust an avowed enemy; for Canada, Jamaica, and Cuba, are irresistible temptations. The plot has been skilfully contrived, and ably carried out. The Moorish war and the treaty with Denmark were masterpieces. They have completed the circumvallation of Europe; and the British empire itself is invested in form. French fleets are seen off the coasts of China, Australia, and North America; nor is there any part of the globe free from French influence. Even Abyssinia has contributed to Napoleon the Third a superb harbor on the Red Sea!

Thus prepared for hostilities at all points, the allied Sovereigns will direct their forces against Turkey. Ever since March, 1854, the "Vials" have warned the British public of the inevitable result of the Crimean war. The disruption of the old alliance between England and Russia, and the formation of a new alliance between Russia and France. It was the alliance of the Great Powers which destroyed Napoleon the First. Neither England nor any other single Power could have broken up the empire of Napoleon. Nay, more: No two powers united could have done it. All Europe together was compelled to league against Napoleon the First before he could be vanquished. Napoleon never, for one moment, united Europe against England, as we boastingly assert, but it was England that joined Europe in alliance against France, before France could be over-matched. Napoleon the Third knows well the immense force of his warlike empire. He laughs at the idea of any one Power in the world being an impediment in his way. He defies, even, any two Powers in the world. But five or six against one he considers rather too great odds! He has, therefore, acted with consummate dexterity. By the Crimean war he has detached Russia both from Austria and from England. He has broken up forever that conspiracy of tyranny called "The Holy Alliance." "What is that to thee?" says the modern JEHU, "turn thee behind me!" and Russia turns behind him. By the Italian war he humbles Austria, and fills her with hatred against England, by whom she was cruelly deserted in her hour of need. "Turn thee behind me," cries the modern Jehu, again; and Austria turns behind him. His next object will be the humiliation of Prussia on the Rhine. "Turn thee behind me," will he say once more; and Prussia will turn behind him. Thus this Jehu of the 19th century, who driveth not furiously, but wisely, faces, one by one, all his enemies—defeats and awes them, in succession—and then turns them behind him, to be no longer his opponents, but his allies. One by one he has taken them in hand, while the others stood stupidly looking on. One by one he has reduced them to submission, and converted them into allies. A deep and deadly slumber has crept over the age. Soft dreams of luxury and peace flit across the brow of nations, and hover before their delighted eyes. While each in turn is bound and gagged by the strong man, his companions revel in their affluence of dreams, and stretch out their listless limbs until they themselves are seized upon and fettered. Had you listened to the warning of the "Vials," and resisted aggression at once, our present dangers could never have existed. Six years ago this warning was given, and it was repeated last year, before the Italian war!

Nor do we, humanly speaking, condemn Napoleon in the least; he is only imitating our good example. He is only doing in the West what we ourselves have been doing in the East: that is to say,—annexing other peoples' territories under some plausible pretext. And surely a man who follows the example of Protestant England can never do what is wrong. We have gained India by destroying a million lives, and yet we are the model nation of Christendom. He has gained Savoy and Nice, and the full command of Italy, at the expense of a few thousand lives; and can WE presume to censure him? Oh! Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! have we alone the monopoly of crime?

This digression may be excused; it was impossible to resist the opportunity. But if we return to the former subject, we see endless machinations carrying on in Turkey. We believe that the partition of that empire has been resolved upon, and will soon be attempted—perhaps this very year. Constantinople being too great a prize to be conceded to any first-rate Power, will probably be NEUTRALIZED, and left in the hands of the Sultan, or given over to some minor state. We observe the Duke de Brabant is looking about him at Constantinople, at this moment, and his father, the King of Belgium, has always been remarkable for "good luck!" Should Turkey be broken up, the restoration of the Jews will almost immediately follow, under the patronage of France; and Napoleon the Third will become predominant in Syria and in Palestine. In such a case he would be strictly in the position of the King of the North, in the 11th chapter of Daniel; for Daniel's King of the North means the King of the north of Palestine, not the King of the north of Europe. The Power which shall get possession of EGYPT will be in the position of Daniel's King of the South; for "the south," in Daniel, means the south of Palestine, not the south of Europe, or the world. At the same time, the Turkish empire would be dried up, and everything would assume (to say the least) the aspect of the "Last Days."

For the Crisis.

For the Rich.

The Lord says it is hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Some suppose that it is quite impossible for a rich man to be a christian. But this, we think, is not valid; still such a class is rare—few and far between. Some think, too, that the rich are necessarily proud, but some poor people have the spirit of pride, and only need the means to manifest it to the world.

I think a christian has no right to be rich. "But if God bestows wealth upon him, is he to blame?" Yes; to blame for not selling what he hath to feed the poor. After his conversion all belongs to God, and should be used to his glory by advancing his cause.

Some try to be "humble" merely in dress, while the gold lies out of sight, or in the bank. These seem to think of carrying a load through the world, of lands, of cattle and houses. It wears upon them, does them no good, because not in circulation. Well, it is not impossible for such to enter the kingdom, any more than for a camel to enter the needle's eye. I read in some book that this term was applied to a small gate of ancient cities, where the camel could pass only by kneeling down. So with the rich; let them bow humbly as little children, so that their burden of wealth may not be higher or broader than the open gate, and then they can go through. But when a man puts on airs higher than a beaver hat, struts and swells with importance, and tries to carry half of every thing with him, he is larger than the needle's eye, and "can't come in." O I'm glad that the plan of salvation tends to equalize men. Let us all be small, so that the "narrow way" will be large enough for us to walk in.

Friendship.

Of all the virtues in our world,
None seems so good as thee;
Thy banner fair is wide unfurled,
Thy blessings give to me.

How desolate would earth appear
Without thy lovely aid;
All, all would be a desert drear,
All charms of life would fade.

Thou art the band that ever binds
The words of sacred love;
Thou art the same in diverse times,
As lovely as the dove.

In heaven's unbroken choir
Thy golden wreath is seen,
By thee the angels tune the lyre,
And holy cherubs sing.

Within my heart thy fuel burns,
May God increase the flame;
May every heart thy virtues learn,
And ever there remain.

"Thy ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all thy paths are peace,"
Thy ways are ways of perfectness,
Oh! may they never cease.

Selections.

Poor Jack.

At a meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a speaker related the following:

A drunkard was one day staggering in drink on the brink of the sea. His little son by him, three years of age, being very hungry, solicited him for something to eat. The miserable father, conscious of his poverty, and of the criminal cause of it, in a kind of rage occasioned by his intemperance and despair, hurled the little child into the sea, and made off with himself. The poor little sufferer, finding a floating plank by his side on the water, clung to it. The wind soon wafted him and the plank into the sea. A British man-of-war passing by, discovered the plank and child; a sailor, at the risk of his own life, plunged into the sea, and brought him on board. He could inform them little more than that his name was Jack. They gave him the name of Poor Jack. He grew up on board of the man-of war, behaved well, and gained the love of all the officers and men. He became an officer of the sick and wounded department. During an action of the late war, an aged man came under his care in a dying state. He was all attention to the dying stranger, but could not save his life.

The aged stranger was dying, and thus addressed this kind young officer: "For the great attention you have shown me, I give you this only treasure that I am possessor of," (presenting him with a Bible bearing the stamp of the British and Foreign Bible Society.) "It was given me by a lady, and has been the means of my conversion; and has been a great comfort to me. Read it, and it will lead you in the way you should go." He went on to confess the wickedness and profligacy of his life before the reception of his Bible; and, among other enormities, how he once cast a little son, three years old, into the sea, because he cried to him for needful food!

The young officer inquired of him the time and place, and found here was his own history. Reader, judge, if you can, of his feelings, to recognize in the dying old man his father, dying a penitent under his care! and judge of the feelings of the dying penitent, to find that the same young stranger was his son—the very son whom he had plunged into the sea, and had no idea but that he immediately perished! A description of their mutual feelings will not be attempted. The man soon expired in the arms of his son. The latter left the service and became a pious preacher of the gospel.

On closing this story, the minister in the meeting of the Bible Society bowed to the chairman and said, "Sir, I am little Jack."

Sweet Conversation—Heavenly.

How, when, by what means? By prayer? Nothing like it. Nothing sweetens conversation like prayer. Friends, do you wish your conversation pleasant, cheerful, animating, edifying, profitable? Pray, bow the knee, ask God to order your speech aright, to give grace and wisdom. Does a christian friend call, enter your domicil to spend a moment, commence the interview with prayer. Seek God's blessing that "the words of your mouth, and the meditations of your heart may be acceptable in his sight." Acknowledge God in all things. Nothing tends so directly to give conversation a pleasant, happy, edifying, profitable direction as wisdom from above, received in answer to prayer.

"Were half the breath thus vainly spent,
To heaven in supplication sent;
Your cheerful song would oftener be—
Hear what the Lord hath done for me!"

—Golden Rule.

The Art of Being Polite.

First and foremost, don't try to be polite. It will spoil all.

If you keep overwhelming your guests with ostentatious entreaties to make them at home, they will very soon begin to wish they were there. Let them find out that you are happy to see them by your actions, not by your words.

Always remember to let bashful people alone at first; it is the only way to set them at their ease. Trying to draw them out, has sometimes the contrary effect of driving them out—of the house.

Leading the conversation is a dangerous experiment. Better follow in its wake; and if you want to endear yourself to talkers, learn to listen well. Never make a fuss about any thing—never talk about yourself—and always preserve perfect composure, no matter what solecisms or blunders others may commit. Remember that it is a very foolish proceeding to lament that you cannot offer to your guests a better house, furniture, or viands. It is fair to presume that their visit is to you—not to these surroundings. Give people a pleasant impression of themselves, and they will be pretty sure to go away with a pleasant impression of your qualities. On just such slender wheels as these the whole fabric of society turns. It is our business then to keep them in perfect revolving order. —Life Illustrated.

Pray for your Pastor.

In the journal of a departed saint I find mentioned with grateful acknowledgment the following fact:—

She had been accustomed to meet a christian friend for prayer every Saturday afternoon. Feeling that their pastor's sermons, though superior and elegant in style, were not spiritual, did not present Christ, these two sisters in the church agreed to make it their especial subject of prayer that Christ in all his fulness might be preached. They did so for three weeks secretly, when on going to church they were delighted to hear given out the text, "Looking unto Jesus." A revival of religion followed the presentation of the cross. If your pastor does not feed you, pray for him.—Ex.

Anger, Injury and Revenge.

If you are angry with him who reproves your sin, you secretly confess your anger to be unjust: he that is angry with the just reprover, kindles the fire of the just Avenger.

When I have an injury done me, I never set the beacon on fire; nor am I troubled! I consider who did it; if my kinsman, he did it ignorantly; if my friend, he did it against his will; if my enemy, it is no more than I expected; I ever put a fair construction upon anything that happens to me.

He that is naturally revengeful, keeps his wounds open, which otherwise would close of themselves. Pardon is a glorious kind of revenge; I think myself sufficiently revenged of my enemy if I pardon him.—Ex.

The Inspiration of the Bible.

When De Tocqueville was here, he asked to see a Sabbath school. He was struck with seeing a Bible in the hands of almost every child. "Is this common?" said he to his friend. "What a mighty influence it must have upon the nation!"

Think of the unnumbered Sabbath school pupils in all christian lands, each with a Bible in their hand. More striking still is the thought of all christians in all lands, sitting each in their private room, every morning before they go into the world, to read this one book. What must the book be to furnish the minds and hearts of spiritual people with exhaustless supplies of thought and emotion? Not so Shakespeare, nor even Bunyan, copying so closely from the Bible, cannot fill such a place. "Do not read Bunyan to me any more," said a distinguished missionary lady, near her end, to her husband; "Bunyan tires me, but I can hear you read the Bible without fatigue."

Why has not Josephus' History of the Jews equal power with this book, when relating the very same things? Because inspiration has flowed into the very thoughts and language of the Bible.—Dr. Adams.

Look on the Bright Side.

Hearts that are bowed by sorrow and woe,
Have ye ne'er by reflection been calmed?
In deepest adversity, do ye not know
How brighter the light of affection will glow—
How your memory your grief has embalmed?

Affection—an angel in robes spotless white,
Who loves the afflicted to cheer;
Who clears up the darkness and mist of the night,
Turning sorrow and sadness and shadows to light
That before had been threat'ning and drear.

But the brightest of sides to all sorrow—though dim
Seems the taper of hope in the heart—
Is implicit reliance, dependence on Him
Who is able and willing to fill to the brim
Our cup of rejoicing, to banish our smart,
Deprive life of its troubles, and death of his dart.

Useful Knowledge.

What is the cause of lightning?

Lightning is the result of electrical discharges from the clouds.

What is thunder?

Thunder is the noise which succeeds the rush of the electrical fluid through the air.

When does lightning occur?

When clouds, charged with the opposite electricities approach, the forces rush to each other, and combine in a state of equilibrium.

Why does lightning attend this movement of the sources of electricity?

Because the atmosphere, being unable to convey the great changes of electricity as they rush towards each other, acts as an insulator, and the lightning is caused by the violence of the electricity in forcing its passage. When the conducting power is equal to the force of the electricity it passes invisibly, noiselessly and harmlessly whenever it finds a sufficient source of conduction.

Why does lightning sometimes appear forked?

Because, being resisted in its progress by the air, the electricity divides into two or more points, flies from point to point, and seeks a passage in different directions.

Does lightning ever pass upward from the earth to the clouds?

Yes, when the earth is charged with a different electricity to that which is in the clouds.

Why is it dangerous to stand near a tree during an electric storm?

Because the tree is a better conductor than air, and electricity would probably strike the tree and pass to the person standing near.

Why is it dangerous to sit near a fire-place?

Because the chimney, being a tall object and the smoke a good conductor, would probably attract the electricity and convey it to the body of a person sitting near the fire.

Why is it dangerous to be near water during a thunder storm?

Because water is a good conductor and the vapor arising from it might attract the electricity.

Are iron houses dangerous?

No; they are very safe, because their entire surface is a good conductor and would convey the electricity harmlessly to the earth.

Are iron bedsteads dangerous?

No; they are safe, because the iron frame, completely surrounding the body, and having a great capacity for conduction, would keep electricity away from the body.

Why is it safe to be in bed during a thunder storm?

Because feathers, hair, wool, cotton, etc., especially when dry, are good insulators or non-conductors.

What is the safest situation to be in during a storm?

In the centre of a room, isolated as far as possible from surrounding objects; sitting on a chair and avoiding handling any of the conducting substances. The windows and doors should be closed to prevent drafts of air.

In the open air, what is the safest situation?

To keep aloof as far as possible from elevated structures; regard the rain as a protection against the lightning stroke, for wet clothes would supply so good a conductor, that a large amount of electricity would pass over a man's body through wet clothes and he would be quite unconscious of it.

Hygiene.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

For the Crisis.

Health.

Friends, some of you are unwell. Some have sick or feeble friends. Some have humors, scrofula, piles, dyspepsia, bronchitis, headaches, and all sorts of misery in general, besides feeling half dead with languor much of the time. You would pay any price to be well, joyous and free.

Why don't you get well? "I don't know how; I have spent my living on physicians—taken the contents of saddle-bags and apothecaries' shops, guzzled patent medicine by the gallon, got more hurt than good, and now if I could get the medicine out of me, and feel no worse than when I began to take it, I would give a great deal."

Yes, and probably your villanous habits of eating and drinking, and wearing and overworking, and other excesses, have been helping you down hill all the time.

Well, you are alive yet? "Yes, and likely to live in misery for a long time; folks that are always grunting never die."

Now, then, if you have got vitality enough left to live, if you had a chance, I will tell you of a good place to make the trial. It is at "Our Home," Dansville, Livingston Co., N. Y. There you can find rest for body and mind, pleasant exercise, amusement; warm, tepid and cool baths, judiciously administered; healthy food, and other things that help sick folks to get health and well ones to keep it. I am here myself; came to stop as long as I can conveniently; it does me good. Perhaps it would you.

If you are dead, just ready to bury, don't come. They don't undertake to raise the dead here. If you want medicine, they won't give it to you. They don't cure folks by putting medicine into them, but, by getting disease and poison out of them, and leaving them free to get well themselves. Don't come expecting that ten days' treatment will cure twenty years' sickness, and forty years' outrageous violation of the laws of being. They don't do that way. No poisons are administered. Air, light, water, food, friction, etc., are the remedies.

There are some sixty patients here now, nine-tenths of whom seem to be doing well; many are old, hard cases, and some were thought doubtful or incurable by the physicians when they came. The best way for you would be to write, describing disease, symptoms, constitution, previous treatment, age, etc., and then wait for an answer. Direct to James C. Jackson, M. D., or Harriet M. Austin, M. D., Dansville, N. Y.

The terms are $5 for examination, and from $7 to $10 per week for board, lodging and treatment; prices vary according to the room occupied.

Dansville is forty miles south of Rochester, via. Genesee Valley R. R., about one hundred miles south east from Buffalo, on Buffalo, Corning and New York R. R. About 330 miles from New York via. New York and Erie R. R. The depot is at WAYLAND, six miles from Dansville by stage. This is all I have to say on the subject now.

Directions to Restore the Apparently Drowned.

A correspondent, writing to us last week, asked us to lay before the public Dr. Marshall Hall's Directions with the above object, which are frequently referred to as universally known, whereas such is far from being the case. The following are the leading principles of the instructions, as published in a compendious form by the Royal National Life-Boat Institution:—

1. Treat the patient instantly, on the spot, in the open air, exposing the face and chest, to the breeze, (except in severe weather.)

TO CLEAR THE THROAT—

2. Place the patient gently, face downwards, with one wrist under the forehead, in which position all fluids will escape by the mouth, and the tongue itself will fall forwards, leaving the entrance into the windpipe free. Assist this operation by wiping and cleansing the mouth. If there be breathing, wait and watch; if there be no breathing, or if it fail, then—

TO EXCITE RESPIRATION—

3. Turn the patient well and instantly on the side, and—

4. Excite the nostrils with snuff, hartshorn, volatile salts, or the throat with a feather, etc., and dash cold water on the face, previously rubbed warm. If there be no success, lose not a moment, but instantly,

TO IMITATE RESPIRATION—

5. Replace the patient on the face, raising and supporting the chest well on a folded coat or other article of dress.

6. Turn the body very gently on the side and a little beyond, and then briskly on the face, alternately; repeating these measures deliberately, efficiently, and perseveringly about fifteen times in the minute, or every four seconds, occasionally varying the side—[by placing the patient on the chest, it is compressed by the weight of the body, and expiration takes place; when turned on the side, this pressure is removed, and inspiration occurs.]

7. On each occasion that the body is replaced on the face, make uniform but efficient pressure immediately before turning the body on the side—[the first measure increases the expiration; the second commences inspiration.] The result is, respiration, or natural breathing; and if not too late, life.

8. After respiration has been restored, promote the warmth of the body by the application of hot flannels, bottles or bladders of hot water, heated bricks, etc., to the pit of the stomach, the arm-pits, between the thighs, and to the soles of the feet.

TO INDUCE CIRCULATION AND WARMTH—

9. During the whole time do not cease to rub the limbs upwards, with firm grasping pressure and with energy, using handkerchiefs, flannels, etc. By this measure the blood is propelled along the veins towards the heart.

10. Let the limbs be thus warmed and dried, and then clothed, the bystanders supplying the requisite garments.

CAUTIONS.

1. Send quickly for medical assistance, and for dry clothing. 2. Avoid all rough usage and turning the body on the back. 3. Under no circumstances hold up the body by the feet. 4. Nor roll the body on casks. 5. Nor rub the body with salt or spirits. 6. Nor inject tobacco-smoke or infusion of tobacco. 7. Avoid the continuous warm-bath. 8. Be particularly careful to prevent persons crowding around the body.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

On the restoration of life, a teaspoonful of warm water should be given; and then, if the power of swallowing have returned, small quantities of wine, or brandy and water warm, or coffee. The patient should be kept in bed, and a disposition to sleep encouraged. The treatment recommended should be persevered in for a considerable time, as it is an erroneous opinion that persons are irrecoverable because life does not soon make its appearance, cases having been successfully treated after persevering several hours.

AN ITEM FOR SMOKERS.—Life Illustrated contains the following in relation to the statement that tin-foil, used for wrapping tobacco, has dangerous poisonous qualities:—

"There is infinitely more poison in one paper of tobacco than in the tin-foil that surrounds a hundred. If anybody doubts this let them hold a sheet of white paper over the smoke that curls up from burning tobacco, and after a pipefull or a cigar has been devoured, scrape the condensed smoke from the paper, and put a very small amount on the tongue of a cat, and they will see her die by 'strokes of paralysis' in fifteen minutes."

REMARKABLE CURE OF LOCKJAW.—The N. Y. Observer says that a young lady run a rusty nail into her foot recently. The injury produced lockjaw of such a malignant character that her physicians pronounced her recovery hopeless. An old nurse then took her in hand, and applied pounded beet roots to her foot, removing them as often as they became dry. The result was a most complete and astonishing cure. Such a simple remedy should be borne in mind.

To Cure Hoarseness.

Take the whites of two eggs, and beat them with two spoonfuls of white sugar; grate in a little nutmeg; then add a pint of luke-warm water. Stir well, and drink often. Repeat the prescription if necessary, and it will cure the most obstinate cases of hoarseness in a short time.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year............$2.00
For a single copy 6 months............1.00
For a single copy 3 months............50
Five copies to one address for 6 months...[illegible]
Ten copies to one address for 6 months...[illegible]
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months...15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months...[illegible]

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 10 cts., which will bring the [illegible] within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of [illegible], they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters, write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to ELD. MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.

The postage on the Crisis, if prepaid, quarterly or yearly, at the office where it is received, will be 13 cents a year in any part of Massachusetts, and 26 cents a year to any other part of the United States.

CANADA SUBSCRIBERS have to PREPAY the postage on their papers, 26 cents a year, in addition to the above; [illegible]

The Resurrection.

Our friends are falling 'round us,
We sigh to see them go,—
Experience has taught us
We'll meet no more below.

Philosophy has reasoned,
(And Hope its tidings bring,)
The flowers that fade in autumn
Shall bloom again in spring.

The garden shrubs that perish,
The laws of nature save;
So those our bosoms cherish
May live beyond the grave.

The vine that binds the forest,
By storms autumnal broke,
Again, with 'livened tendrils,
Shall cling around the oak.

So those whom death hath severed,
A spring-time may release,
Where love may claim affection,
In a land of joy and peace.

Yet on these thoughts, if mortal,
Might ceaseless war be waged;
But Heaven's truth has promised,
The word of God is pledged,—

That those who sleep in Jesus,
(In that auspicious day)
God shall himself bring with him,
Though long appear the stay.

I've friends that sleep in Jesus—
And what a hope is this!
That God will bring them with him,
To the realms of perfect bliss;

And we caught up together—
According to his word—
Shall hail our friends in triumph,
Forever with the Lord!

Thoughts on Rev. 7: 9.

"I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands."

These words of the apostle John came to my mind as I met with Bro. Pratt and wife at the social meeting on Friday evening for the first time, and we enjoyed a blessed season together. My mind was carried forward to the time when, if faithful, we shall enjoy the presence of all the saints of every nation, kindred and people that have served God upon earth, and are made fit for the enjoyment of the everlasting kingdom. We are also informed that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things God hath prepared for those that love him. How thankful I feel to God for his revealed will in the gospel of his Son, which enlightened our minds amid the gross darkness which surrounds us at the present time.

We are informed from the Holy Scriptures, which alone give certainty to the doubting mind, that the blessed society in the kingdom of God consists of the good of all nations, who are clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness with a meek and humble spirit. No contention will be known in that peaceful abode. Names and sects will not be heard among the redeemed, for they consist of all kindreds, and people, and tongues. They will only be known as the disciples of Jesus; and all such as possess his spirit and nature will be gathered into his fold. We shall there rejoin friends for whom we have mourned here. With every sorrow which rends the heart, with every blight which comes over our earthly hopes, with every separation we mourn, a consoling hope is ours; the blessed gospel of Jesus Christ soothes all our sorrows. He has brought immortality to light by his resurrection from the grave.

We are encouraged to believe that there will be mutual knowledge of each other in the world to come, and we shall form a sacred friendship with those who have escaped unpolluted from the present state of imperfections of sin and sorrow. O let it be our greatest concern, by the aid of God's grace, to be prepared to join the blessed multitude. May we listen to the commands of the Savior, and although trials, crosses and disappointments perplex our way, let us strive to cultivate that enduring character through all the changes of this life, and aim to perform faithfully all duties enjoined upon us, knowing that our Savior will pronounce the sentence "Well done" on such only as have kept his commandments.

May it be our greatest aim so to live here, that when the great Life-giver shall come we may be of that happy multitude which shall stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, having palms in their hands, where is fulness of joy, and where are pleasures forevermore.

The land, the land is nearing, where joys are ever new,
The everlasting kingdom, the city is in view;
With prophets, saints and angels, God's shining retinue.
Blow, blow, then, gentle breezes, the land I long to see,
And hear the mighty trumpet proclaim the jubilee;
O come, thou mighty Conqueror, bring immortality!

The Turkish Empire.

An intelligent English writer, who is a very close observer of the signs of the times says:

"The fall of the Turkish empire seems likely to take place within a few months more. The most sinister rumors are circulating throughout Europe, and are taken up and repeated by all the populations of European Turkey. A secret alliance is said to have been formed between France, Russia, and Austria, for the dismemberment of the Ottoman empire. Austria is to receive compensation for the loss of Italy by the acquisition of an equivalent territory on the eastern shores of the Gulf of Venice. By such an arrangement Austria will be bound to France in spite of the recent war between the two countries. And Russia will equally be attached to France through the clear conviction that without French co-operation the dismemberment of Turkey will be impossible. However the three Powers may hate one another, self-interest alone will be sufficient to create a temporary alliance. Every one must have observed the incessant stream of foreigners which has lately poured into this country; but have you observed that they are all in the Russian interest? Whether native Russians, or Germans, or Dutch, our Royal or Imperial visitors are all intimately connected with Russia. They are, in fact, Russian agents, sent over for the purpose of allaying our suspicions by the appearance of intimacy and good-will. Sent over, also, as political spies, to discover the feelings of the nation upon subjects of foreign politics; and no doubt to gain our consent, or our co-operation, in the dismemberment of the Turkish empire. In fact, we have been inundated with Russianizing visitors, even of the highest rank; and Russia never does anything without a special purpose. And the English aristocracy have showed the most undeserved attention to persons who have visited this country for no other purpose but that of treachery and mischief. As for French visitors we have had but few, because the nearness and intimacy of the two countries render such agency superfluous.

Before the Russian war of 1854, it is well known that we were honored by an influx of Russianizing agents, of the highest rank. The same thing has occurred in 1859 and 1860. It is the omen of another war, or rather another aggression upon Turkey. France, Austria, and Russia, or France and Russia, are certainly combined for the partition of Turkey. They have not omitted a single preliminary. Denmark and Sweden have formed a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France, by which the Baltic may be closed, and Germany kept in awe. The war in Morocco has given Spain a complete predominence over the Moors; and Spain herself is the humble servant of Napoleon the Third. "Close up the Straits!" will be the orders, bye and bye, telegraphed from the Tuileries; and the Mediterranean will be locked up. Spain, in herself possesses the whole NORTH coast of the Straits—Gibraltar excepted. She has now obtained so firm a footing in Morocco, that she can at any time demand as much as she pleases of the SOUTH coast of the Straits; and then, by throwing up earthworks, the navigation will be almost wholly in her power. Gibraltar will be NEUTRALIZED, and the Mediterranean will be in the hands of France and Russia. The French fleets issuing from Toulon, and the Russian fleet from the Black Sea, will rule the Mediterranean from end to end, and dominate over the whole sea-board of the Roman world. Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Sardinia, and Austria—all in strict alliance with France, will contribute their respective squadrons, and England will be left single-handed in the contest. To trust the friendship of the United States would be as wise as to trust an avowed enemy; for Canada, Jamaica, and Cuba, are irresistible temptations. The plot has been skilfully contrived, and ably carried out. The Moorish war and the treaty with Denmark were masterpieces. They have completed the circumvallation of Europe; and the British empire itself is invested in form. French fleets are seen off the coasts of China, Australia, and North America; nor is there any part of the globe free from French influence. Even Abyssinia has contributed to Napoleon the Third a superb harbor on the Red Sea!

Thus prepared for hostilities at all points, the allied Sovereigns will direct their forces against Turkey. Ever since March, 1854, the "Vials" have warned the British public of the inevitable result of the Crimean war. The disruption of the old alliance between England and Russia, and the formation of a new alliance between Russia and France. It was the alliance of the Great Powers which destroyed Napoleon the First. Neither England nor any other single Power could have broken up the empire of Napoleon. Nay, more: No two powers united could have done it. All Europe together was compelled to league against Napoleon the First before he could be vanquished. Napoleon never, for one moment, united Europe against England, as we boastingly assert, but it was England that joined Europe in alliance against France, before France could be over-matched. Napoleon the Third knows well the immense force of his warlike empire. He laughs at the idea of any one Power in the world being an impediment in his way. He defies, even, any TWO Powers in the world. But five or six against one he considers rather too great odds! He has, therefore, acted with consummate dexterity. By the Crimean war he has detached Russia both from Austria and from England. He has broken up forever that conspiracy of tyranny called "The Holy Alliance." "What is that to thee?" says the modern JEHU, "turn thee behind me!" and Russia turns behind him. By the Italian war he humbles Austria, and fills her with hatred against England, by whom she was cruelly deserted in her hour of need. "Turn thee behind me," cries the modern Jehu, again; and Austria turns behind him. His next object will be the humiliation of Prussia on the Rhine. "Turn thee behind me," will he say once more; and Prussia will turn behind him. Thus this Jehu of the 19th century, who driveth not furiously, but wisely, faces, one by one, all his enemies—defeats and awes them, in succession—and then turns them behind him, to be no longer his opponents, but his allies. One by one he has taken them in hand, while the others stood stupidly looking on. One by one he has reduced them to submission, and converted them into allies. A deep and deadly slumber has crept over the age. Soft dreams of luxury and peace flit across the brow of nations, and hover before their delighted eyes. While each in turn is bound and gagged by the strong man, his companions revel in their affluence of dreams, and stretch out their listless limbs until they themselves are seized upon and fettered. Had you listened to the warning of the "Vials," and resisted aggression at once, our present dangers could never have existed. Six years ago this warning was given, and it was repeated last year, before the Italian war!

Nor do we, humanly speaking, condemn Napoleon in the least; he is only imitating OUR good example. He is only doing in the West what we ourselves have been doing in the East: that is to say,—annexing other peoples' territories under some plausible pretext. And surely a man who follows the example of Protestant England can never do what is wrong. We have gained India by destroying a million lives, and yet we are the model nation of Christendom. He has gained Savoy and Nice, and the full command of Italy, at the expense of a few thousand lives; and can WE presume to censure him? Oh! Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! have we alone the monopoly of crime?

This digression may be excused; it was impossible to resist the opportunity. But if we return to the former subject, we see endless machinations carrying on in Turkey. We believe that the partition of that empire has been resolved upon, and will soon be attempted—perhaps this very year. Constantinople being too great a prize to be conceded to any first-rate Power, will probably be NEUTRALIZED, and left in the hands of the Sultan, or given over to some minor state. We observe the Duke de Brabant is looking about him at Constantinople, at this moment, and his father, the King of Belgium, has always been remarkable for "good luck!" Should Turkey be broken up, the restoration of the Jews will almost immediately follow, under the patronage of France; and Napoleon the Third will become predominant in Syria and in Palestine. In such a case he would be strictly in the position of the King of the North, in the 11th chapter of Daniel, for Daniel's King of the North means the King of the north of Palestine, not the King of the north of Europe. The Power which shall get possession of EGYPT will be in the position of Daniel's King of the South; for "the south," in Daniel, means the south of Palestine, not the south of Europe, or the world. At the same time, the Turkish empire would be dried up, and everything would assume (to say the least) the aspect of the "Last Days."

For the Crisis.

For the Rich.

The Lord says it is hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Some suppose that it is quite impossible for a rich man to be a christian. But this, we think, is not valid; still such a class is rare—few and far between. Some think, too, that the rich are necessarily proud, but some poor people have the spirit of pride, and only need the means to manifest it to the world.

I think a christian has no right to be rich. "But if God bestows wealth upon him, is he to blame?" Yes; to blame for not selling what he hath to feed the poor. After his conversion all belongs to God, and should be used to his glory by advancing his cause.

Some try to be "humble" merely in dress, while the gold lies out of sight, or in the bank. These seem to think of carrying a load through the world, of lands, of cattle and houses. It wears upon them, does them no good, because not in circulation. Well, it is not impossible for such to enter the kingdom, any more than for a camel to enter the needle's eye. I read in some book that this term was applied to a small gate of ancient cities, where the camel could pass only by kneeling down. So with the rich; let them bow humbly as little children, so that their burden of wealth may not be higher or broader than the open gate, and then they can go through. But when a man puts on airs higher than a beaver hat, struts and swells with importance, and tries to carry half of every thing with him, he is larger than the needle's eye, and "can't come in." O I'm glad that the plan of salvation tends to equalize men. Let us all be small, so that the "narrow way" will be large enough for us to walk in.

Friendship.

Of all the virtues in our world,
None seems so good as thee;
Thy banner fair is wide unfurled,
Thy blessings give to me.

How desolate would earth appear
Without thy lovely aid;
All, all would be a desert drear,
All charms of life would fade.

Thou art the band that ever binds
The words of sacred love;
Thou art the same in diverse times,
As lovely as the dove.

In heaven's unbroken choir
Thy golden wreath is seen,
By thee the angels tune the lyre,
And holy cherubs sing.

Within my heart thy fuel burns,
May God increase the flame;
May every heart thy virtues learn,
And ever there remain.

"Thy ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all thy paths are peace,"
Thy ways are ways of perfectness,
Oh! may they never cease.

Selections.

Poor Jack.

At a meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a speaker related the following:

A drunkard was one day staggering in drink on the brink of the sea. His little son by him, three years of age, being very hungry, solicited him for something to eat. The miserable father, conscious of his poverty, and of the criminal cause of it, in a kind of rage occasioned by his intemperance and despair, hurled the little child into the sea, and made off with himself. The poor little sufferer, finding a floating plank by his side on the water, clung to it. The wind soon wafted him and the plank into the sea. A British man-of-war passing by, discovered the plank and child; a sailor, at the risk of his own life, plunged into the sea, and brought him on board. He could inform them little more than that his name was Jack. They gave him the name of Poor Jack. He grew up on board of the man-of war, behaved well, and gained the love of all the officers and men. He became an officer of the sick and wounded department. During an action of the late war, an aged man came under his care in a dying state. He was all attention to the dying stranger, but could not save his life.

The aged stranger was dying, and thus addressed this kind young officer: "For the great attention you have shown me, I give you this only treasure that I am possessor of," (presenting him with a Bible bearing the stamp of the British and Foreign Bible Society.) "It was given me by a lady, and has been the means of my conversion; and has been a great comfort to me. Read it, and it will lead you in the way you should go." He went on to confess the wickedness and profligacy of his life before the reception of his Bible; and, among other enormities, how he once cast a little son, three years old, into the sea, because he cried to him for needful food!

The young officer inquired of him the time and place, and found here was his own history. Reader, judge, if you can, of his feelings, to recognize in the dying old man his father, dying a penitent under his care! and judge of the feelings of the dying penitent, to find that the same young stranger was his son—the very son whom he had plunged into the sea, and had no idea but that he immediately perished! A description of their mutual feelings will not be attempted. The man soon expired in the arms of his son. The latter left the service and became a pious preacher of the gospel.

On closing this story, the minister in the meeting of the Bible Society bowed to the chairman and said, "Sir, I am little Jack."

Sweet Conversation—Heavenly.

How, when, by what means? By prayer? Nothing like it. Nothing sweetens conversation like prayer. Friends, do you wish your conversation pleasant, cheerful, animating, edifying, profitable? Pray, bow the knee, ask God to order your speech aright, to give grace and wisdom. Does a christian friend call, enter your domicil to spend a moment, commence the interview with prayer. Seek God's blessing that "the words of your mouth, and the meditations of your heart may be acceptable in his sight." Acknowledge God in all things. Nothing tends so directly to give conversation a pleasant, happy, edifying, profitable direction as wisdom from above, received in answer to prayer.

"Were half the breath thus vainly spent,
To heaven in supplication sent;
Your cheerful song would oftener be—
Hear what the Lord hath done for me!"

—Golden Rule.

The Art of Being Polite.

First and foremost, don't try to be polite. It will spoil all.

If you keep overwhelming your guests with ostentatious entreaties to make them at home, they will very soon begin to wish they were there. Let them find out that you are happy to see them by your actions, not by your words.

Always remember to let bashful people alone at first; it is the only way to set them at their ease. Trying to draw them out, has sometimes the contrary effect of driving them out—of the house.

Leading the conversation is a dangerous experiment. Better follow in its wake; and if you want to endear yourself to talkers, learn to listen well. Never make a fuss about any thing—never talk about yourself—and always preserve perfect composure, no matter what solecisms or blunders others may commit. Remember that it is a very foolish proceeding to lament that you cannot offer to your guests a better house, furniture, or viands. It is fair to presume that their visit is to you—not to these surroundings. Give people a pleasant impression of themselves, and they will be pretty sure to go away with a pleasant impression of your qualities. On just such slender wheels as these the whole fabric of society turns. It is our business then to keep them in perfect revolving order.—Life Illustrated.

Pray for your Pastor.

In the journal of a departed saint I find mentioned with grateful acknowledgment the following fact:—

She had been accustomed to meet a christian friend for prayer every Saturday afternoon. Feeling that their pastor's sermons, though superior and elegant in style, were not spiritual, did not present Christ, these two sisters in the church agreed to make it their especial subject of prayer that Christ in all his fulness might be preached. They did so for three weeks secretly, when on going to church they were delighted to hear given out the text, "Looking unto Jesus." A revival of religion followed the presentation of the cross. If your pastor does not feed you, pray for him.—Ex.

Anger, Injury and Revenge.

If you are angry with him who reproves your sin, you secretly confess your anger to be unjust: he that is angry with the just reprover, kindles the fire of the just Avenger.

When I have an injury done me, I never set the beacon on fire; nor am I troubled! I consider who did it; if my kinsman, he did it ignorantly; if my friend, he did it against his will; if my enemy, it is no more than I expected; I ever put a fair construction upon anything that happens to me.

He that is naturally revengeful, keeps his wounds open, which otherwise would close of themselves. Pardon is a glorious kind of revenge; I think myself sufficiently revenged of my enemy if I pardon him.—Ex.

The Inspiration of the Bible.

When De Tocqueville was here, he asked to see a Sabbath school. He was struck with seeing a Bible in the hands of almost every child. "Is this common?" said he to his friend. "What a mighty influence it must have upon the nation!"

Think of the unnumbered Sabbath school pupils in all christian lands, each with a Bible in their hand. More striking still is the thought of all christians in all lands, sitting each in their private room, every morning before they go into the world, to read this one book. What must the book be to furnish the minds and hearts of spiritual people with exhaustless supplies of thought and emotion? Not so Shakspeare, nor even Bunyan, copying so closely from the Bible, cannot fill such a place. "Do not read Bunyan to me any more," said a distinguished missionary lady, near her end, to her husband; "Bunyan tires me, but I can hear you read the Bible without fatigue."

Why has not Josephus' History of the Jews equal power with this book, when relating the very same things? Because inspiration has flowed into the very thoughts and language of the Bible.—Dr. Adams.

Look on the Bright Side.

Hearts that are bowed by sorrow and woe,
Have ye ne'er by reflection been calmed?
In deepest adversity, do ye not know
How brighter the light of affection will glow—
How your memory your grief has embalmed?

Affection—an angel in robes spotless white,
Who loves the afflicted to cheer;
Who clears up the darkness and mist of the night,
Turning sorrow and sadness and shadows to light
That before had been threat'ning and drear.

But the brightest of sides to all sorrow—though dim
Seems the taper of hope in the heart—
Is implicit reliance, dependence on Him
Who is able and willing to fill to the brim
Our cup of rejoicing, to banish our smart,
Deprive life of its troubles, and death of his dart.

Useful Knowledge.

What is the cause of lightning?

Lightning is the result of electrical discharges from the clouds.

What is thunder?

Thunder is the noise which succeeds the rush of the electrical fluid through the air.

When does lightning occur?

When clouds, charged with the opposite electricities approach, the forces rush to each other, and combine in a state of equilibrium.

Why does lightning attend this movement of the sources of electricity?

Because the atmosphere, being unable to convey the great changes of electricity as they rush towards each other, acts as an insulator, and the lightning is caused by the violence of the electricity in forcing its passage. When the conducting power is equal to the force of the electricity it passes invisibly, noiselessly and harmlessly whenever it finds a sufficient source of conduction.

Why does lightning sometimes appear forked?

Because, being resisted in its progress by the air, the electricity divides into two or more points, flies from point to point, and seeks a passage in different directions.

Does lightning ever pass upward from the earth to the clouds?

Yes, when the earth is charged with a different electricity to that which is in the clouds.

Why is it dangerous to stand near a tree during an electric storm?

Because the tree is a better conductor than air, and electricity would probably strike the tree and pass to the person standing near.

Why is it dangerous to sit near a fire-place?

Because the chimney, being a tall object and the smoke a good conductor, would probably attract the electricity and convey it to the body of a person sitting near the fire.

Why is it dangerous to be near water during a thunder storm?

Because water is a good conductor and the vapor arising from it might attract the electricity.

Are iron houses dangerous?

No; they are very safe, because their entire surface is a good conductor and would convey the electricity harmlessly to the earth.

Are iron bedsteads dangerous?

No; they are safe, because the iron frame, completely surrounding the body, and having a great capacity for conduction, would keep electricity away from the body.

Why is it safe to be in bed during a thunder storm?

Because feathers, hair, wool, cotton, etc., especially when dry, are good insulators or non-conductors.

What is the safest situation to be in during a storm?

In the centre of a room, isolated as far as possible from surrounding objects; sitting on a chair and avoiding handling any of the conducting substances. The windows and doors should be closed to prevent drafts of air.

In the open air, what is the safest situation?

To keep aloof as far as possible from elevated structures; regard the rain as a protection against the lightning stroke, for wet clothes would supply so good a conductor, that a large amount of electricity would pass over a man's body through wet clothes and he would be quite unconscious of it.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Health.

Friends, some of you are unwell. Some have sick or feeble friends. Some have humors, scrofula, piles, dyspepsia, bronchitis, headaches, and all sorts of misery in general, besides feeling half dead with languor much of the time. You would pay any price to be well, joyous and free.

Why don't you get well? "I don't know how; I have spent my living on physicians—taken the contents of saddle-bags and apothecaries' shops, guzzled patent medicine by the gallon, got more hurt than good, and now if I could get the medicine out of me, and feel no worse than when I began to take it, I would give a great deal."

Yes, and probably your villanous habits of eating and drinking, and wearing and overworking, and other excesses, have been helping you down hill all the time.

Well, you are alive yet? "Yes, and likely to live in misery for a long time; folks that are always grunting never die."

Now, then, if you have got vitality enough left to live, if you had a chance, I will tell you of a good place to make the trial. It is at "Our Home," Dansville, Livingston Co., N. Y. There you can find rest for body and mind, pleasant exercise, amusement; warm, tepid and cool baths, judiciously administered; healthy food, and other things that help sick folks to get health and well ones to keep it. I am here myself; came to stop as long as I can conveniently; it does me good. Perhaps it would you.

If you are dead, just ready to bury, don't come. They don't undertake to raise the dead here. If you want medicine, they won't give it to you. They don't cure folks by putting medicine into them, but, by getting disease and poison out of them, and leaving them free to get well themselves. Don't come expecting that ten days' treatment will cure twenty years' sickness, and forty years' outrageous violation of the laws of being. They don't do that way. No poisons are administered. Air, light, water, food, friction, etc., are the remedies.

There are some sixty patients here now, nine-tenths of whom seem to be doing well; many are old, hard cases, and some were thought doubtful or incurable by the physicians when they came. The best way for you would be to write, describing disease, symptoms, constitution, previous treatment, age, etc., and then wait for an answer. Direct to James C. Jackson, M. D., or Harriet M. Austin, M. D., Dansville, N. Y.

The terms are $5 for examination, and from $7 to $10 per week for board, lodging and treatment; prices, vary according to the room occupied.

Dansville is forty miles south of Rochester, via. Genesee Valley R. R., about one hundred miles south east from Buffalo, on Buffalo, Corning and New York R. R. About 330 miles from New York via. New York and Erie R. R. The depot is at WAYLAND, six miles from Dansville by stage. This is all I have to say on the subject now.

Directions to Restore the Apparently Drowned.

A correspondent, writing to us last week, asked us to lay before the public Dr. Marshall Hall's Directions with the above object, which are frequently referred to as universally known, whereas such is far from being the case. The following are the leading principles of the instructions, as published in a compendious form by the Royal National Life-Boat Institution:—

1. Treat the patient instantly, on the spot, in the open air, exposing the face and chest, to the breeze, (except in severe weather.)

TO CLEAR THE THROAT—

2. Place the patient gently, face downwards, with one wrist under the forehead, in which position all fluids will escape from the mouth, and the tongue itself will fall forwards, leaving the entrance into the windpipe free. Assist this operation by wiping and cleansing the mouth. If there be breathing, wait and watch; if there be no breathing, or if it fail, then—

TO EXCITE RESPIRATION—

3. Turn the patient well and instantly on the side, and—

4. Excite the nostrils with snuff, hartshorn, volatile salts, or the throat with a feather, etc., and dash cold water on the face, previously rubbed warm. If there be no success, lose not a moment, but instantly,

TO IMITATE RESPIRATION—

5. Replace the patient on the face, raising and supporting the chest well on a folded coat or other article of dress.

6. Turn the body very gently on the side and a little beyond, and then briskly on the face, alternately; repeating these measures deliberately, efficiently, and perseveringly about fifteen times in the minute, or every four seconds, occasionally varying the side—[by placing the patient on the chest, it is compressed by the weight of the body, and expiration takes place; when turned on the side, this pressure is removed, and inspiration occurs.]

7. On each occasion that the body is replaced on the face, make uniform but efficient pressure immediately before turning the body on the side—[the first measure increases the expiration; the second commences inspiration.] The result is, respiration, or natural breathing; and if not too late, life.

8. After respiration has been restored, promote the warmth of the body by the application of hot flannels, bottles or bladders of hot water, heated bricks, etc., to the pit of the stomach, the arm-pits, between the thighs, and to the soles of the feet.

TO INDUCE CIRCULATION AND WARMTH—

9. During the whole time do not cease to rub the limbs upwards, with firm grasping pressure and with energy, using handkerchiefs, flannels, etc. By this measure the blood is propelled along the veins towards the heart.

10. Let the limbs be thus warmed and dried, and then clothed, the bystanders supplying the requisite garments.

CAUTIONS.

1. Send quickly for medical assistance, and for dry clothing. 2. Avoid all rough usage and turning the body on the back. 3. Under no circumstances hold up the body by the feet. 4. Nor roll the body on casks. 5. Nor rub the body with salt or spirits. 6. Nor inject tobacco-smoke or infusion of tobacco. 7. Avoid the continuous warm-bath. 8. Be particularly careful to prevent persons crowding around the body.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

On the restoration of life, a teaspoonful of warm water should be given; and then, if the power of swallowing have returned, small quantities of wine, or brandy and water warm, or coffee. The patient should be kept in bed, and a disposition to sleep encouraged. The treatment recommended should be persevered in for a considerable time, as it is an erroneous opinion that persons are irrecoverable because life does not soon make its appearance, cases having been successfully treated after persevering several hours.

AN ITEM FOR SMOKERS.—Life Illustrated contains the following in relation to the statement that tin-foil, used for wrapping tobacco, has dangerous poisonous qualities:—

"There is infinitely more poison in one paper of tobacco than in the tin-foil that surrounds a hundred. If anybody doubts this let them hold a sheet of white paper over the smoke that curls up from burning tobacco, and after a pipefull or a cigar has been devoured, scrape the condensed smoke from the paper, and put a very small amount on the tongue of a cat, and they will see her die by 'strokes of paralysis' in fifteen minutes."

REMARKABLE CURE OF LOCKJAW.—The N. Y. Observer says that a young lady run a rusty nail into her foot recently. The injury produced lockjaw of such a malignant character that her physicians pronounced her recovery hopeless. An old nurse then took her in hand, and applied pounded beet roots to her foot, removing them as often as they became dry. The result was a most complete and astonishing cure. Such a simple remedy should be borne in mind.

To Cure Hoarseness.

Take the whites of two eggs, and beat them with two spoonfuls of white sugar; grate in a little nutmeg; then add a pint of luke-warm water. Stir well, and drink often. Repeat the prescription if necessary, and it will cure the most obstinate cases of hoarseness in a short time.

The Promise Claimed.

"Two or three."

Savior of men, if two or three
Met in thy name on earth shall be,
There in the midst of them thou art,
To bless and comfort every heart.

Savior, if two on earth agree
To ask for blessings given through thee,
Thy promise, firm as earth and heaven,
Declares those blessings shall be given.

Savior, no human name hath led
Us who are here thy courts to tread;
Gathered by none of mortal fame,
We meet alone in Jesus' name.

Jesus, thy blessing on us shed
Like holy oil on every head;
Make us to know the love of God,
By thine own spirit shed abroad.

Accept our songs, our prayers receive,
Help us thy gospel to believe;
Savior, thy promises we claim,
We meet, we pray, in Jesus' name.

Richard Rothe.

I have spoken of Dr. Rothe of Germany, as the most eminent of those who hold immortality through Christ alone. I wish to give some passages from his writings on this subject, and will introduce them with some account of the man himself.

A word about the name. In the German th has the sound of t, and e is pronounced like our long a. So we will call our friend Dr. Rota, but write the name as above.

A writer in the last number of the Bibliotheca Sacra (the Andover Quarterly,) gives an account of the great work of Rothe, on Theological Ethics, which he introduces with the following account of the man: "Dr. Richard Rothe is universally regarded, in Germany, as one of the most richly gifted theologians the nation has ever produced. Widely known as having been connected with the Theological Seminary at Wittenberg, the University at Bonn, and the University at Heidelberg; eminently distinguished for the originality of his views and the extent of his learning as displayed in his volume on "The Beginnings of the Christian Church;" and, moreover, introduced to the English and American public, in words of the highest encomium and heartiest commendation, by the Chevalier Bunsen in his celebrated work on "God and Mankind," we have thought that it might be doing a good service to present our readers a sketch of the philosophical principles and chief topics of interest contained in his most elaborate work, The Theological Ethics; a work which, from its size and peculiar phraseology, we may scarcely ever hope to see translated.

"As a theologian, Dr. Rothe is eminently progressive. He believes in development and growth. He is too historic to cut loose from the past; but he looks backward only to gain impulse to move on.

"'Sunt quibus unum opus est, intactae Palladis urbem,
Carmine perpetuo celebrare.'
[There are those whose only work is to celebrate the city of chaste Minerva (Athens) with perpetual song.]

but Dr. Rothe is not one of them. He reveres the past, but he believes also in a future. In the work before us he attempts, while preserving the essence of the Christian faith as contained in the New Testament, to reconstruct its formula in accordance with the scientific requirements of the present age."

In other words, he seeks "to justify the ways of God to man." And it is perhaps the noblest effort of the human mind to show that what God reveals and declares is reasonable, proper, and just, according to the highest advances made by the intellect of man. What use have we for reason at all, if it is not to try to see things in their reasonable nature, and as God himself looks at them?

Dr. Schaff, in his work on Germany, devotes a chapter to Dr. Rothe. Having named several evangelical divines, ending with Rothe, he says: "The last, however, is an altogether original genius, to whom may be applied what Cardinal Cajetan said of Estius: 'Habet profundos oculos et mirabiles speculationes in capite suo.'" [He has deep, piercing eyes, and wonderful speculations, in his head.] (Page 249.) In the chapter referred to he says of Rothe: "He is exceedingly popular as a teacher, and enjoys the respect and admiration of all who know him personally as a most excellent man and humble christian." We must assign to Rothe the very first place among the speculative divines of the present day. He surpasses even Nitzsch, Mueller, Dorner, Martensen and Baur in vigorous grasp and independence of thought, and is hardly inferior in this respect to Schleiermacher. But like him, he is too original in his views to form a school in the strict sense of the term. He will always occupy an isolated position, and be a pilgrim and stranger in the surrounding world. Of this he is himself painfully conscious, but cannot help it. His province is rather to stir up and stimulate the youthful mind, and to open new paths for theological speculation.

"His principal production is the System of Theological Ethics, or Moral Theology, in three volumes, 1845—48. We regard it as the greatest work on speculative divinity which has appeared since Schleiermacher's Dogmatics—full of power, boldness, and originality. It is truly a work of art as well as of science, and the several stones of the ethical system are reared up here into a magnificent Gothic cathedral by the skill of a master architect."

Boldness.

Much has been said about boldness, and yet among christians it is mistaken for something else. If a brother or sister happens to speak a bit louder than brother Modern Nicety admires, he or she is put right down as unendurably bold. But take this same brother in an auction room, and he would speak louder than all for a box of cigars, or a chest of tea. And that sister, whose head will ache every time Bro. Plain tells us to be faithful, how loud she talks at the auction, too. Whisper for Jesus (and that not very often,) but "cry aloud and spare not" for a cheap set of jewelry.

Well, when I consider the shortness of time, and the certainty of death for the ungodly,—of the surprises awaiting those who are at ease in Zion, I feel bound to go forward, and press the battle with the enemy.

For my part, I have kept still quite long enough. It is full time for us to be bold. We have been ashamed of the cross longer than profitable, and now let us be bold. Without the right sort of boldness, we can not be brave. Who can admire the coward? Shame on that individual who will dodge duty on this principle.

Only look at our prospects,—see how vast an estate is ours, even the earth, upon which universal kings have been mere squatters, for it is all ours. Think of this, and then tell me if we have not a right to be bold,—to carry a high head. In view of so soon inheriting these things, the Bible commands us to "lift up our heads." I will lift up my head above ground, for a witness to truth. Think of all our enemies, how mighty, because of boldness. Shall we crouch like shamed dogs, and let them conquer? Shall we sit shivering and trembling, instead of standing up for Jesus?

O! I love truth too dearly to be ashamed of it. I know the bad effects of this mock modesty. No soldier is useful unless bold; and when individuals begin to lack this trait, they commence backsliding.

Now, brothers and sisters, let us try and be as active in serving our Master as the devil's children are for him. Recollect that the apostle who denied Christ three times was compelled to confess his love for him three times. Then let us try to own Jesus as often as we have disowned him. And if we have been bold in denouncing Him by word, let us be equally so in confessing Him.

Do we duly consider the position we occupy, here in latter-day perils, when infidelity abounds? I often think of the sentence used by "my dear Pastor,"—"The Prophets are dead," and it remains for our voices to finish the song, commencing where they closed. Then be not afraid to stand upright, and boldly say, Jesus is coming, for he will not tarry.

Irrepressible Conflict among the Nations.

"And the nations were angry."—Rev. 11: 18.
"Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near."—Joel 3: 9.

We are living in a wonderful age—an age full of stirring events. Events loom up before us from the disturbed bosom of angry nations, like the peerless thunder-heads of an approaching storm. They seem to chase each other like the rolling waves of the mighty ocean under the great force of a pressing wind-storm. The poet's verse seems to be in course of fulfillment now, which sketches passing events in the following poetic genius:

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling,
To be living is sublime.
Hark! the waking up of nations,
Gog and Magog, to the fray;
Hark! what soundeth? is creation
Groaning for its latter day?"

The great events now occurring surprise and stultify politicians and statesmen, and, why? because they are not prepared for them; they were not looking for them. They have been overtaken unawares, and consequently "wonder with great astonishment and fear, at those things that are coming upon the earth." But the patient student of prophecy and the signs of the times is posted in relation to these things, and, therefore, is prepared for the crisis. Having read and studied "what is noted in the Scriptures of truth," he is looking for revolutions, wars and tumults in this age of strife and contending forces.

But the events through which we are, and have been, passing for the last twelve years, are only introductory to those that are to follow in their train. They are only premonitory symptoms of the "irrepressible conflict" among the nations of the earth, which is now almost impending. It is true, during those twelve years, war and its kindred evils have spread death and devastation throughout the civilized world, and are a fulfillment of certain Scripture predictions. Just trace back to 1848 as a starting point, and what do we see? A revolution in Europe—a political shock that shook every throne on the old continent; and about the same time the American States were engaged in a war with Mexico. Only a brief repose—about sufficient time for the nations to catch breath—and a war between England, France and Russia, over poor Turkey, in fury and wrath, flashes forth destroying thousands of human beings and millions of dollars' worth of property, and filling the world with cries and moans of orphans and widows.

No sooner was the Anglo-French and Russian war at an end, than a difficulty with China followed in its horrid train of woe and death. This trouble repressed, and an insurrection in India occurs, causing England another struggle to suppress it, leaving the dreadful tales of Delhi, Lucknow, etc., as a sufficient commentary upon its chilling deeds of misery and death. That political trouble no more than fairly passed and we are brought down to the French-Austro-Italian war of 1859, convulsing again the political air of all continental Europe. Nor is the trouble settled at this writing.

An Italian insurrection is liable to occur at any moment, relighting the torch of war throughout the entire continent of the old world. Then there is the financial crisis reaching all the great commercial centres of the civilized world, which occurred in 1857, and from which the business world has not fairly recovered now!

Add to this picture what is termed by some, "The Irrepressible conflict," in our own country, between slavery and freedom, and it presents to our minds, to say the least, startling proportions. Does it not look like a fulfillment of those prophetic predictions set at the head of this article? "And the nations were angry"—"Prepare war, wake up the mighty men," etc.; such men as Louis Napoleon, Francis Joseph, Garibaldi and the Pope of Rome. May it not be possible that we have entered under the blighting influence of vial seventh, noted in St. John's visions? When this vial is poured out what is the result? Read—"And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings." This I shall interpret as symbolical language, figuring forth those great, political commotions, not unaccompanied with physical disasters in various places, that have occurred within the last twelve years. Are not the terms "voices, thunders and lightnings," fit symbols to represent revolution, insurrection and war? And these are only premonitory symptoms of what is to come, for adds the prophet—"And there was a great earthquake," or as I shall interpret it, a great political overturn, "such as was not since men were upon the earth so mighty and so great," in which papal Rome, "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," will come tumbling down, because the divine penman continues, "And the GREAT CITY was divided into three parts, . . . and GREAT BABYLON came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath."—Rev. 16: 17—19.

In connection with the downfall of the Papacy, without doubt, other powers will be demolished, for in connection with the above it is said, "And the cities of the nations fell." But in that great conflict Papal Rome is a special subject of divine wrath, and the causes that are brought to bear upon her "in the last indignation" are delineated in Rev. 17 chap. It is there clearly stated that the beast "that was, and is not, and yet is," will be the grand leader in the onset against the Papal power, to which beast the ten kings will give their support, or as the prophet says, "These"—the ten kings, see chap. 17: 12—"have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast." (Verse 13.) Again, "And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." (Verse 16.) That will be a final end of that power over which the saints will shout, "Alleluia: salvation, and glory, and honor and power, unto the Lord our God; for He hath judged the great whore," etc.—Rev. 19: 12.

Another fit symbol to represent the utter destruction of "the mother of harlots" is brought to view in Rev. 18: 21, under the figure of a mighty angel taking up a "stone like a great mill-stone, and cast it into the sea, saying, thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down and shall be found no more at all." This destruction of the Papal hierarchy, then, is under the seventh vial of God's wrath, which it is my conviction, though I am not positive, is now being discharged, and some of its effects we have already realized in the unparalleled disturbances in politics, morals and religion all over the globe. The effects of this vial seem to be general in their devastation; and it will be observed by the diligent student of prophecy, that the vial in question is "poured out" in a different locality than either of the preceding ones, viz., "INTO THE AIR." Now air is a general element—just as universal as is animal existence, because man nor animals can live without this vital element. Thus vial seventh being poured out into the air, represents the universality of its wrathful mission upon the nations of the earth. The "three unclean spirits," (Rev. 16: 13, 14,) had preceded this vial filling the political and moral "air" with poisonous breath and vitiation, which, when the seventh vial was turned into that deadly miasma and charged "air," caused those results we have witnessed and will be the exciting cause of those that will soon follow, which will be more appalling in their nature than any we have experienced since 1848.

The six vials preceding the seventh were more localized in their results than the one under consideration. The fifth vial was poured out on "the seat of the beast"—a particular locality; and vial sixth was poured out "upon the great River Euphrates," or the Ottoman Empire. But the seventh vial is discharged "into the air" with the announcement from the throne, "It is done," as though we might look for great events and revolutions among the nations—a sufficient hint that the "Irrepressible Conflict" is rapidly approaching, and that the conflict of ages is about to be decided in the "battle of that great day of God Almighty." It is the mission of the "three unclean spirits" to gather the nations to the conflict, and these spirits have about, if not quite, finished their work, and the seventh vial being discharged "into the air" will give intensity and life to the influence of those demon-spirits, and the guilty nations will be madly pushed on to the last drama of the age. Let us watch!

Night and Morning.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."—Ps. 30: 5.

Precious promise, truly, especially when we consider the near approach of morn. Long, long has been the night of weeping. But, weeping ones, do we welcome that joyful day? Have we in the midst of weeping trusted that God who is able to deliver? Are we among those who have covenanted with God by sacrifice; among the self-denying, cross-bearing, hardness-enduring ones; among the real burden-bearers, those who serve not self, but God and his people; among the crucified to the world, to sin; among those who have left all to accept Christ and the gospel? O! our Father, give strength to answer these questions honestly.

If we are among the class brought to view, we may rejoice exceedingly; for the night of weeping is about to close; the morning comes, and with it joy, not temporary, but permanent—an eternal day of joy. No longer the struggling saint weeps over earth's miseries impossible to assuage; no longer weeps over the fallen of Israel; no longer weeps by the grave of a loved one; no longer weeps over self's shortcomings, or lack of strength in the cause. No, weeping will be forever ended.

O! ye ministers of the cross, only a little more weeping between the porch and altar, and you will doubtless come again, bearing precious sheaves with you; only a little more weariness and pain, and your bodies will no longer be susceptible of pain; a weary, aching head, a painful lung, a broken spirit, will soon be forgotten, or never more endured. Bear faithfully your responsibility; a little while, and you will be released from it and receive the reward. O what a reward!

But while we anticipate the morn, with sadness we remember that some weep who trust not God, neither call upon him to deliver. What can I say to such! Lone weeper, the morning's dawn has no charm for you. Your tears cease not, but become more hot and briny; your anguish more intense, until your eyes close in a long, dreamless sleep, from which you can never awake to the joys of the ransomed overcomers, unless you call upon God and accept Jesus as your Savior.

I pity you! God pities you. Jesus pities you, and so much that he volunteered to die that you might be saved. You can as easily be saved and join in an anthem of praise to the Lamb with the redeemed, as to be lost and mingle your cry with the weeping of the sinful and disobedient. Will you not obey the gospel—though in the world there is conflict, peace in believing overbalances. That you may not participate in the agonies of the second death, is the prayer of one who sympathizes with Jesus.

A Few Historical Facts

ON THE ORIGIN OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Zoroaster is the most ancient of any whom we have upon record of all the heathen nations that taught the immortality of the soul.—Vol. I, p. 205.

Pausanius. Chaldean and Indian magi have been the first who asserted the immortality of the soul.—Herodotus, p. 3.

Thales, B. C. 640, said that water was the principal of all things, and God was that intelligence by whom all things are formed on of water.—Rollin, Vol. II, p. 560.

Pythagoras, B. C. 564, it is generally agreed among the ancients, was the first of all the Greeks who taught it.—Prid. Con., Vol. 1, p. 205.

He believed that God was a soul diffused into all beings of nature, and from which human souls are derived. He disbelieved in the transmigration of souls. The souls of men and those of beasts are the same substance, particles of God himself; that souls come out of fire, as God is fire.—Id., Vol. II, p. 667.

Socrates, B. C. 471, is styled the prince of philosophers. He is considered the founder of moral philosophy in Greece. He believed the soul to be immortal, and supposed himself a being separate from his body. Crito asked in what manner he wished to be buried; As you please, said Socrates, if you can lay hold of me, and I do not escape out of your hands. I can never persuade Crito, said he, that Socrates is he who converses with you—for he imagines that I am he who is going to see death in a little while. He confounds me with my carcass. If death were the final dissolution of being, the wicked would be great gainers by it. But as the soul is immortal it must receive eternal happiness or misery. But the good are received on high into a pure region which they inhabit, where they live without their bodies through all eternity.

The historian says, that Socrates had a demon or familiar spirit that was with him through life.

Plato, B. C. 428, taught one God, the author of all things; that the soul is immortal, (if good) united to God. After this life there is a reward for the good, and punishment for the wicked. He had also taken the transmigration of souls from Pythagoras, but given it a construction of his own. Souls are God. They go two ways after death; the wicked to the place of torment, the pure and innocent to the august assembly of the gods.

Josephus.—You Greeks believe that the soul is created, and yet is made immortal by God, according to the doctrine of Plato. —Dissertation on Hades.

Jews.—It is indeed known that the immortality of the soul was not known to the Jews, but by commerce which they had with the Assyrians during the time of their captivity.—Herodotus, p. 3.

The Essenes believed that souls were immortal, and continued forever, and that they came out of the most subtle air, and were united to their bodies as to prisons. . . . . The Greeks seem to have followed the same notion, when they allotted the islands of the blessed to their brave men, whom they call heroes and demigods; and to the souls of the wicked, the region of the ungodly in hades, where their fables relate that certain persons are punished; which is built on the first supposition that the soul is immortal.—Josephus.

The Pharisees believed that souls had an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there would be rewards or punishments according as they had lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that the latter were to be detained in an everlasting prison, but the former would have power to revive and live again. They say that all souls are incorruptible; that the souls of the good are only removed into other bodies, but the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment.—Josephus.

Origen.—What was worst of all, these several tenets of a chimerical philosophy were imprudently incorporated into the christian system. He was at the head of this speculative tribe. This great man enchanted by the charms of the Platonic philosophy, set it up as the test of all religion, and imagined that the reasons of each doctrine were to be found in that favorite philosophy, and their nature and extent to be determined by it. Its first promoters argued from that known doctrine of the Platonian school, which also was adopted by Origen and his disciples, that the divine nature was diffused through all human souls; or, in other words, that the faculties of reason from which the health and vigor of the mind proceed, were an emanation of God unto the human soul, and comprehended the principles and elements of all truth, humane and divine.—Mosheim.

Soul.—That immaterial, active substance, or principle in man, whereby he perceives, remembers, reasons, and wills. It is rather to be described as to its operations, than to be defined as to its essence. Various indeed have been the opinions of philosophers concerning its substance. The Epicureans thought it a subtle air, composed of atoms, or primitive corpuscles. The stoics maintained it was a portion of heavenly light.

The Cartesians made thinking the essence of the soul. The rational soul is simple, uncompounded and immaterial, not composed of matter and form.—Buck's Theological Dic.

Benson.—The soul is—"The spiritual and immaterial part of you; this will still survive in all its vigor, while its tabernacle lies in ruins."—Methodist's Commentary, Matt. 10: 28.

Wesley.—"For what is Immaterial fire? The same as immaterial water or earth! Both the one and the other is absolute nonsense, a contradiction in terms. Either, therefore, we must affirm it to be material, or we deny its existence.—Sermons, Vol. II. p. 150.

Instruction for Children; Intended for the use of the Methodist's Societies, No. 18. "How did God make man?" His body out of dust; his soul out of NOTHING." p. 7. If God lives and dwells in your soul, then he makes it like himself." p. 14.

"His sov'reign power our bodies made,
Our souls are his immortal breath,
And when his creatures sinned, he bled
To save us from eternal death.

Where are the dead?—in heaven or hell
Their disembodied spirits dwell;
Their perished forms, in bonds of clay,
Reserved until the judgment day."

[pp. 9 and 203, M. E. Hymn Book, Revised Edition.

So Christ died to save God's immortal breath from eternal death. We will venture to affirm that the whole doctrine of the immortality of the soul is a delusive fable, vainly imagined, and the foundation of every spiritual delusion, heathenism, endless misery, purgatory, invocation of saints, Quakerism, Shakerism, Swedenborgianism, and the last deception of the Devil, Spiritualism.—*Ad. For the Crisis.

Notes by the Way.

At Rock Grove City I continued the meetings until I preached over thirteen discourses. One united with the church. Quite a number who had formerly belonged to a Baptist church in that place, but now had their minds turned towards Universalism, had their faith shaken, and some acknowledged it—could not stand the light on the destruction of the wicked. I think that a foundation is laid for doing good in this place.

I left and came to Marble Rock, the 8th of Dec., and commenced meetings. The people were waiting with great anxiety to hear. We had a very large congregation. There was some opposition from a preacher in the place, which turned out to the glory of God. I continued until the 20th, when the brethren, twelve in number, came together and adopted gospel order. Thirteen were baptized, and on the 29th six more.

The meeting continued with interest, and on New Year's evening quite a number surrounded the table to commemorate the Lord's death. It was a solemn time to all, as few ever saw it taken in the night before.

Tuesday, Jan. 3d, three more were buried with Christ in baptism, making twelve in all. The following was a solemn evening. I do not now remember of being in a place where there were so many tears shed from both saint and sinner as at this, our last meeting. It was hard parting. I had preached twenty-three sermons in that place, had formed an attachment to them and they to me. I left this church of twenty-two members with Bro. Hiscox, their pastor, trusting that the word sown will still bring forth more fruit to the glory of God.

Jan. 4th I came to Waverly, and stopped with Eld. Wm. Lucas, and filled his appointment that evening. The next night I came to Eld. P. W. Hough's, Fairbanks, Iowa. I suffered with the cold that day. I left there and rode through the snow storms, for I wanted to get home; but it was so hard wheeling I could not succeed. At last I got home, and found my wife and child and friends well. I was glad to get home in safety. I shall wait for the Lord to direct. Where I shall be found next I cannot tell. Remember me, brethren, in your prayers. Farewell.

For the Crisis.

Why so Sad?

Troubled, doubting, benighted, despairing, fainting, sin-sick soul! Why so sad? Why those looks of melancholy o'ershadowing your brow? Why does not your eye beam with the animated brightness of hope? Why does sorrow fill your heart as the scenes of future destiny roll up before you? Can you not flee to a pavilion of safety? Can you not escape the judgments that threateningly o'erhang your pathway? Is the arm of the Almighty shortened? Is his power to save decreased? You answer, No! Why then still linger in the gall of bitterness? If you will come to him he will take your feet from the "horrible pit" and plant them upon the Rock of eternal ages, and put a new song into your mouth, even praise to our God. Then why not come? Do you contend that your faith is too weak? "Ask," says the blessed Word, "and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."—Luke 2: 9. Are your sins many? You have the promise in Christ, they shall all be washed away.

Are you thickly beset with the alluring influences of sin? Your sufficiency must be of God if you overcome them at all. The promise is certain—"As thy days, so shall thy strength be."—Deut. 33: 25. Do foes press hard around you? The Lord shall hide you in the secret of his presence from the pride of man, and shall keep you secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.—Ps. 31: 20. Are you poor and despised? Christ has chosen the poor of this world who are rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom, where they shall inherit "all things." Are you ambitious? Seek for glory, honor, immortality, and you shall have praise of God. Are you homeless and forsaken? Like the Patriarchal "pilgrims and strangers," seek for a "better country," and for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. Drive away your sad doubtings. Fling yourself unreservedly upon the mercy of Jesus. He will receive you just as you are. He will not receive you in any other way. In him you may have hope. In him have peace, joy, unspeakable that is full of glory.

"There is rest for the weary."

But do you say that your temptations will be strong? If you are faithful, these light afflictions which are but for a moment work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Are your nights of trial and sorrow long and tedious? Quickly fly unto God thy Maker who giveth songs in the night, and seek for that balmy clime where there shall be no more night and the inhabitants "need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign for ever and ever." Will you leave all and come to Christ, and come now? If you will, the sweet promise unfolds itself to you that the servant who agreed to work in the vineyard at the last hour of labor received a full compensation with the rest of the laborers, and soon you may have a recompense of reward. Soon you may see your Redeemer. Soon you may have placed upon your brow the precious crown of life. Soon you may be clothed upon with immortality. Soon you may stand upon the "highlands of glory." Soon you may join the innumerable choir of the redeemed ones in singing the rapturous song of Moses and the Lamb. Soon you may bid adieu to the dark rolling surges of life's fitful river. Sad sighs will be exchanged for gushing strains of rapture. Soon tears will be exchanged for the smile of unspeakable gladness. Soon the requiems of sadness will be lost in the everlasting hymnings of heavenly praise. Soon you may walk the shining pathways of the City of God. Soon you may stand beneath the golden portals and jasper battlements and lofty domes and cloudless heavens of that Eden home. Soon you may walk beside life's crystal river. Soon you may meet with the loved ones who are now sleeping in the lonely, cold graveyard. Soon you may meet with the angels and join the swelling anthems of everlasting praise.

These promises—the soon realization of which many christian hearts are longing for—may be yours, trembling one, by coming to Christ. You may respond that if there is such an "eternal weight of glory" you wish you were one. So Balaam wished, when from Balak's altar he looked down upon the children of Israel slumbering in the peaceful vallies of Moab and cried out in a strain of rapture, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Balaam's wishing did not save him. It will not save you. Hast thou sublime thoughts? Let them speak to the world in still sublimer actions. Action is what God requires. Bestir thyself!

> "Up! it is Jehovah's rally,
> God's own arm hath need of thine."

Come to God by works meet for repentance and living faith. Come to him through Jesus Christ. He declares, I am the way and the life. Come to Christ by the cross. If need be, you must leave father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, children, houses, lands, reputation; earthly pursuits of honor or pleasure, to be a disciple of Christ. The cross is the christian's pathway to glory. Says Paul, "But God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Paul gloried in it. You may. Not glory, because you can bear the cross better than somebody else. Not because you are humbler than your brother is. That is pride. But glory because you are accounted worthy to suffer for the name of Jesus. The simple idea is to rejoice, believing that if you are accounted worthy to suffer with Christ you will also reign with him.

Then come to the one who is able to save you, and come now. Christ invites you. Angels invite you. All true christians invite you. The glorious scenes of coming destiny and the heavenly kingdom invite you. Then come. Come now. Come, poor, rich, despised, famished, thirsty, broken-hearted, and whosoever will, let him come and partake of the waters of LIFE freely.

Loss of Ocean Steamers.

Going back to the memorable loss of the "President," in 1841, the principal disasters to British and American steamers, mostly running on trans-Atlantic routes, may be summed up as follows:

	Lives lost.	Value of vessel and cargo.
President, British,	180	$1,200,000
Arctic, American,	300	1,800,000
Pacific, American,	240	2,000,000
San Francisco, American,	160	400,000
Central America, American,	387	2,500,000
Independence, American,	140	100,000
Yankee Blade, American,	75	250,000
City of Glasgow, British,	430	850,000
Union, American,	none	500,000
Humboldt, American,	none	1,600,000
Franklin, American,	none	1,900,000
City of Philadelphia, British,	none	800,000
Tempest, British,	150	300,000
Lyonnais, French,	160	250,000
Austria, German,	456	850,000
Canadian, British,	none	400,000
Argo, British,	none	100,000
Indian, British,	27	125,000
Northerner, American,	33	75,000
Hungarian, British, (about)	120	270,000
Total	2807	$15,920,000

Showing that a fleet of twenty fine steamers, many of them first-class, have been totally lost within the period named. The President, Pacific, City of Glasgow, and Tempest, were never heard from; the Arctic, San Francisco, and Central America, foundered; the Independence, Yankee Blade, and Northerner, were wrecked on the Pacific, and the Canadian, Humboldt, Franklin, Argo, and Hungarian, on the Atlantic coast; the Lyonnais was sunk by collision, and the Austria was burnt. Not enumerated in this list are two-thirds as many more, generally of a class much inferior, which were lost in the California trade. The casual reader may derive a more distinct impression in regard to the appalling loss of life here recorded, but there are many homes where no fresh recital is needed to recall the memory of the loved and lost.—Journal of Commerce.

Hindoo Literature.—Dr. Scudder states that the Hindoo holy books date as far back as fourteen hundred years before Christ. The immensity of their compilations of almost every imaginable subject, is marvelous. They write with great rapidity; even with their raw materials he had known school-boys to report a sermon as fast as the missionary could deliver it. Their language is very melodious; some of their poetry rhymes at both ends of the lines.

The World's Crisis.
BOSTON, JUNE 13, 1860.

The Destruction of the Wicked.

No. 2.

"What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?"—1 Pet. 4: 17.
"Whose end is destruction."—Phil. 3: 19.
"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

IV. We affirm that the conditionality of the purpose for which the atonement was instituted involves the total cessation of the wicked.

We find the purpose of the Lord, and the condition of salvation for those who hear the gospel, expressed in such language as the following: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16

Here we find "perish" contrasted with "everlasting life." Apoleetai, rendered perish in this passage, is from apollumi, which is defined by Donnegan "to destroy totally," "to die." Mr. Webster says, "the word destroy means to demolish, to pull down, as, to destroy a house; to ruin; to annihilate a thing by demolishing or burning; as, to destroy a city; to ruin; to bring to naught; to annihilate; to devour; to consume; in general, to put an end to; to annihilate a thing, or the form in which it exists."

The Scripture just quoted shows that all would have perished if there had been no Savior provided. The question arises, what would have been their condition when in the state where it would be proper to say of them, they are perished? The antithetical term in the text is life; hence, we conclude that perish in this passage is used in its legitimate sense, meaning the opposite of life, which is death. This point is clearly set forth by the apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. 15: 18, where he says, "They also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished," if there is "no resurrection of the dead." He cannot mean that christians have gone into torment "if the dead rise not," but as an old translation of this verse reads, they "are totally lost out of creation; they have ceased to exist as men.

In 1 John 4: 9, we read, "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him." Will all live through him? He says of some, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life."—John 5: 40. It should be observed that the only words qualifying the life promised to the faithful, through Christ, are such as represent its duration; as, everlasting and eternal; but we never find such words as blessed or happy used to qualify the future life, thereby indicating that there is another class just as truly alive, but existing in misery. Says Paul, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ."—Rom. 6: 23.

Through the whole Bible we find life promised to the righteous, and death threatened to the sinner, as the end of his wicked career.

John says in his first letter, "He that believeth in the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believed not the record that God gave of his Son." What is the record? "And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." 1 John 5: 10–11.

Observe, the life is not yet in us; but, as Paul says, "Your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. 3: 3–4.

As our eternal life is hid with Christ, the life-giver, and some will not come to him to obtain it, it follows as a necessary consequence that they must die.

After Adam's transgression, he was driven from the garden of Eden, "lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever." He lost life by his disobedience. Christ came and proposed to give eternal life to as many as will obey him. Hence he says in Rev. 2: 7, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

Then it follows that such will live forever; but those who do not overcome, like Adam, are driven from the tree of life, and die.

Paul tells us in Rom. 2: 7, that we must "seek for glory and honor and immortality," "by patient continuance in well doing." We feel confident he would not exhort us to seek for immortality if we have it already. As it is to be obtained by "patient continuance in well doing," it cannot be obtained by any opposite course, as pursued by the wicked.

It seems clear that eternal life is a gift bestowed only upon the righteous, through Christ, and this life is received when Christ who is our life shall appear "the second time," "without sin, unto salvation." "Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." "Then this mortal shall have put on immortality;" but the wicked "shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—2 Pet. 2: 12. They die "the second death," and never live again. "Then this is finished," and the wicked are "no more." Their "end is destruction."

Hence we come to the conclusion, "that the conditionality of the purpose for which atonement was instituted involves the total cessation of the wicked."

In continuation of the examination of the subject of future punishment, we propose to discuss the following proposition:

V. The positive testimony of the Bible that the wicked shall finally and eternally cease to be, demonstrates the certainty of the total extinction of their being.

In answer to the question, "What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" we are told that their "end is destruction." When we inquire for the meaning of destruction, Mr. Webster answers, "destruction consists in the annihilation of the form of any thing; that form of parts which constitutes it what it is." It follows, then, that when the terms destroy and destruction are applied to an object or being, they never mean to preserve or keep alive. In Ps. 145: 20 we read, "The Lord preserveth all them that love him; but all the wicked will he destroy." Here we have preservation for all that love God, and future destruction for "all the wicked." Neither class is preserved from the first death, but we are informed that he "that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."—Rev. 2: 11. It is not their hopes, their happiness, their wickedness, but the wicked who will be destroyed. In this world the righteous are not preserved from pain nor sorrow, nor temptation, nor poverty, nor death; hence, we conclude that the preservation of the one is at the time of the destruction of the other, which is in the future world, after the judgment.

We say after the judgment, because the Scriptures affirm most unequivocally that punishment is not before it. Says Peter, "The Lord knoweth how . . . to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment, to be punished." 2 Pet. 2: 9. As they are reserved till a specified time for punishment, the legitimate conclusion is that they are not punished before that period arrives. Then it follows, as the day of judgment is yet future, and after the second coming of Christ, for he is to judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom, that the wicked dead are not suffering their punishment now; if they are, they are not reserved "unto the day of judgment to be punished."

Where are they reserved? According to the Scriptures, they are dead in hades. After the righteous are raised in "the first resurrection," we read, "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished."—Rev. 20: 5.

At the end of the thousand years, as recorded in the 13th verse, "Death and (hades) hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works." This text shows that the wicked are dead and reserved in hades—the grave—to be raised a thousand years after the righteous, then judged.

As it is absurd to suppose the wicked are punished before the judgment, and as they are not judged till they come out of hades; it follows they receive no part of their punishment between death and the resurrection, while detained in the grave.

Having shown that the wicked will not be punished till after the judgment, the question arises, where will they be punished? In answer to this inquiry, we assume that they will be punished "upon the earth." We find no other place named in the Bible. The Scriptures affirm, "The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner."—Prov. 11: 31. When seven angels, having the seven last plagues, which complete the wrath of God against the wicked, poured out their vials, their effect was upon the people on the earth.

"All the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," when saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom under the whole heaven, and all shall serve and obey him; when "the meek" shall inherit the earth." As the wicked are to be punished upon the earth, where are they when all are obeying and praising God? They must be either converted or destroyed. The Bible says, "the Lord preserveth all them that love him; but all the wicked will he destroy."

Mr. Pick defines shah-mad, the word here rendered destroy, "to annihilate." The same word occurs in Num. 33: 52. "Then you shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images." This cannot mean torment the pictures and images. When those objects were destroyed, the form of parts constituting them what they were, no longer existed; so when "all the wicked" shall be destroyed, they cease to exist as men. Then they will have come to an end.

Says David, "The transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off." Ps. 37: 38. This corresponds with the declaration of Paul, when he says of the wicked, "Whose end is destruction," and with the Savior's, when he says, "Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction."

Job says, "The wicked is reserved to the day of destruction."—Job 21: 30. Says Solomon, "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright; but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity. The righteous shall never be removed; but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth."—Prov. 10: 29–30. The wicked do inhabit the earth in its present state; but we learn that it is to be made new, and then the "meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."—Ps. 37: 11. In harmony with the foregoing, the Savior says, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."—Matt. 5: 5. And Peter says, "We, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."—2 Pet. 3; 13. When John was in vision upon the isle of Patmos, he says, "I saw a new heavens and a new earth." Rev. 21: 1. This, we learn, is to be the inheritance of the saints; and "the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. But the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it."—Prov. 2: 21–22.

John heard the singing of the whole company of the redeemed; and he says, "They sung a new song, saying, Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth."—Rev. 5; 9–10.

The point now appears clear, that the meek shall inherit the earth, and that the wicked shall be rooted out of it, and be no more. David expressed this fact by saying, "Those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth;" but "the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be."—Ps. 38: 9–10.

This language indicates a total destruction of the wicked and their habitation. The whole new earth is to be given to Christ and his saints; and then the wicked will be found no more forever; they will have come to a perpetual end.

"Choice of Pearls."

In our column of selections this week may be noticed some wise sayings from the "Sage." These are found in a rare book, printed in Hebrew, with an English translation. The title page reads as follows:—"A choice of pearls, embracing a collection of the most genuine ethical sentences, maxims, and salutary reflections, originally compiled from the Arabic, by the father of poets and renowned philosopher, Rabbi Salomon Ibn Gabriol, and translated into Hebrew by Rabbi Jehuda Ibn Tibbon; the Hebrew text carefully revised and corrected by the aid of five Mss.; accompanied by a faithful English translation, with explanatory notes and illustrative parallels, selected from ancient, mediæval, and modern authors. By the Rev. B. H. Ascher, editor and translator of the "Book of Life," and author of "Initiation of Youth," etc. London: Trubner & Co., Paternoster Row, and at the author's, 9 Magdalen Row."

☞ Will be ready for delivery, Wednesday, June 13th, our discussion with J. S. Loveland, on Spiritualism and immortality, at the Meionaon Hall, Boston, on the evenings of May 1st to 4th inclusive.

Questions.—1. Is Man's Immortality taught by the Bible, Science and Philosophy, or proved by Spiritualism?

2. Is Immortality a gift of God, dependent upon the character of the receiver?

This is printed from a phonographic report by E. B. Ackerman. Price 25 cts., postage 3 cts. 1-4th off per dozen.

Bro. Cotton has given an excellent synopsis of the discussion in the columns of the Crisis; but those who wish for all that was said, should get it as taken by the Reporter, and corrected by the parties.

Visit to the Indians.

Friday, June 1st, at 5 1-2 o'clock, we left Boston, on the Steamboat train, via. Worcester and Norwich to New London, where we arrived at 10 1-2 P., M., and rested for the night. The next day we went by R. R. to Lyme, on the Connecticut river, and took the Steamer L. Boardman, Capt. Bates, from Hartford, and had a pleasant passage over the sound to Sag Harbor, where we found Eld. Lee, waiting to convey us to his brethren at the Indian settlement at South Hampton, Long Island, a distance of about fourteen miles; where we met a hearty welcome, as usual, expressed in kind deeds, rather than mere hypocritical words, as practiced in fashionable society. We enjoy their native simplicity, so full of good feeling, flowing out of warm hearts.

These Indians belong to the Shinnecock tribe, who live in good framed houses, well provided with the comforts of life. They have received much unkind and oppressive treatment from the whites, which has been borne with great patience.

Their whole number is only about two hundred, many of whom are traveling upon the pathless ocean. They are skillful seamen, and prefer the sailor's life to tilling the soil. Their land is occupied in common; and some of it is well cultivated, though not a very rich soil. They are near the Shinnecock bay, from which they take the finest clams in the world.

The first Lord's day in June, they have what they denominate "The June meeting," when the absent members of their families return home, as far as practicable, and large numbers of whites assemble also to participate in the joyous occasion.

Religiously, these Indians are divided into two bodies,—one Congregational, the other, those who are looking for the speedy coming of Christ. Elder Lee preaches to the latter class; and, aside from their "June meeting," they seldom have any one else. This year, the first Lord's day in June was very pleasant on the Island, and we met in "The Grove," with a sail for a sounding board, and an attentive and well behaved audience of whites and Indians, composed of sailors, farmers and mechanics, who came from two to forty miles to hear the preaching of the gospel in this secluded spot. We were gratified to learn that the seed, sown at former meetings of this kind, had taken deep root in several hearts, prompting them to make a sacrifice to be present at the gathering this year. Light and truth are radiating from this point in all directions and producing happy results. During the day, we had three interesting meetings in "The Grove," and in the evening, we met at Bro. David Bunn's to commemorate the sufferings of our Savior; a privilege they had not enjoyed since our last anniversary at the same place. As we sat around the table, they all spoke of their determination to endure to the end, and be at the marriage supper of the Lamb. It was a solemn season. All was still around, while we partook of the emblems of Jesus' suffering and atonement. A full moon illumined a pleasant evening, not unlike, we think, the one when Jesus was betrayed, immediately after the Passover supper. For over eighteen hundred years that supper has been carefully observed "in remembrance" of Jesus, by his faithful followers in every nation, kindred, tongue and people; and we were thankful for the privilege of enjoying this sacramental feast with the oppressed natives of the American soil. May the peace of God rest upon them to the home of the faithful, where the oppressor's foot never treads the soil, and the poor are robbed of their rights no more.

Early Monday morning, after being loaded with kind deeds and good wishes, we bade them farewell, and hastened home, thankful for the bright hope of soon meeting them in the land of eternal glory.

State of Europe.

At no time since we began to look for the return of our Savior, have events in Europe been more ominous of the approaching end of this dispensation, than at the present time. All things seem converging to a focal point not far in the future. The great harlot at Rome is in deep trouble, with no prospect of relief. There is strong probability that she will soon begin to drink her death potion. The cup of indignation is being filled for her use. She who has been drunken "with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," must soon reap what she has sown. She appears to be struck with death in her extremities, through the influence of the daring chieftain, Garibaldi, who has entered Sicily with his brave troops, and sent terror into the very heart of "The mother of harlots." The minions of Popedom stand aghast at the movements of this bold hero of liberty. Says a foreign correspondent, "An audible wail comes up from the "seven-hilled city." We apprehend it will not be long before her dying groans will rend the air.

It is said of Garibaldi, "Full confidence is felt in his ultimate success by the Italians who are flocking to the seaports in numbers too large for transportation, desiring to join their leader in Sicily."

The following letter from a young volunteer—a mere boy—from a noble family will give an idea of the feeling in Italy. The Italian papers are said to be full of them. Garibaldi's army is said to be made up of such daring young heroes, who are ready to sacrifice all to free their country from Papal oppression. He writes to his parents:—

"It would be in vain to endeavor any longer to conceal the truth from you. I am about to leave for Sicily, for that noble Italian Province which the infamous Bourbons are bent on turning into a cemetery. I have been brought up by a father who always loved God and his country more than himself. I have been petted by masters who instilled the noblest feelings into me. I raised an altar in my heart, with God in the middle, my country on the right, and my parents on the left. Were God to call me, I would leave both country and parents; now, the call is from God and my country. I must obey the call."—Rinaldo Acomaati.

We have intelligence from Rome dated May 20th. It is said the news of Garibaldi's movements in Sicily "had caused great agitation at Rome." The insurrection in Sicily in favor of Garibaldi is said to be very extensive and enthusiastic. The latest advices state that it was believed that sixteen thousand persons had already enrolled themselves among the insurgents. The whole island is aroused. So far as known, success accompanies the movements of this noted leader. We shall wait with deep interest for further news. In addition to the great movement in Italy and Sicily, the "Eastern Question" has again come up, which relates to the disposal of matters at Jerusalem. This is said to be "the most formidable of all European questions." This was what caused the Crimean war; but its final disposition remains for future action. The English, Russians, Turks and French, are each unwilling the other should occupy the land of promise. It is evident that the Turks, the present occupants, cannot hold Jerusalem much longer, for Turkey is just breathing her last political breath, and her estate will doubtless soon go into other hands. Napoleon will probably take the prize by the aid of the Jews, many of whom are officers in his army.

The least that can be said is, events are ripening fast, and the harvest of the earth must be near. Perils daily increase. Now is the time to watch.

For the Crisis.

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(From notes by J. F. Cotton.)

Mr. Grant. We hardly expected that our opponent would have brought forward the subject of last evening, which had been duly discussed, but have suffered us to proceed uninterrupted with the question which is now under debate. He says that we have not met his arguments, his assertions rather. This we are perfectly willing that the audience should decide. He asserts again that man is immortal, alike heedless of our demand for proof and our scripture arguments which substantiate the fact that he is not. Was not man after the fall driven from the life-giving tree, lest by eating thereof he might become undying in his guilt? If man had inherent immortality, from whence arose the necessity of placing on guard the flaming cherubim?

The question this evening is neither the existence of "superhuman devils" or the resurrection of the dead; but whether or not immortality is a gift dependent upon the character of the receiver. My friend says that this immortality is no where spoken of as a gift. To meet this we have only to turn to Rom. 6: 23 and read the declaration of Paul: "For the wages of sin is death: but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Is this not answer enough?

Our opponent has told us of a spiritual life arising from a natural death, and that the natural shall forever remain in abeyance to death, because, says philosophy, the resurrection of a lifeless corpse is impossible. How does philosophy know? As Paul asks Agrippa, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" And also in his celebrated defence of the resurrection of the dead, which he proves by the resurrection of Christ (1 Cor. 15 chap.), he says "But some men will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat or some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him, and to every seed its own body." This apt illustration shows

1st. That the seed sown must die before it is quickened.

2d. That, that which comes up will be in kind with the seed which was sown.

The process of germination has been watched by naturalists and they declare that the germ does die, and from it strikes the radical, or root, downwards, and the plumula, or stalk which bears the grain. Although there is not a cluster of men produced from one body, like the grain, yet it will be the same in kind. If men are sown men shall come up again; but if there were no men buried there would be no resurrection from the dead.

This resurrection is the chief hope of the christian in his trials and difficulties. Paul says, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not?" It has been said that in our view of the case it would not be a resurrection, but a new creation. Let us examine. Even infidels acknowledge that the elements cannot be destroyed. In the decay of man the elements of which he is composed are not destroyed by the decomposition of the body; but are resolved into the primeval elements. Then comes skepticism which asks how can gasses and denser bodies of lime &c., which constitute the man, be gathered and made into the same impersonification? A certain Prince had a goblet which he prized much, and he dropped it by accident into a vessel of nitric acid. He is inconsolable for his loss, till his alchemist says, I can restore to you your goblet. Into the vessel containing the acid is thrown the chemical agent which precipitates the silver, the material is there, the goblet is reformed, and presented to the wondering owner. We would ask, cannot God do as much as man, and gather together again the elements of which his creatures were first formed?

It is after the resurrection of the body, when it has put on immortality that we shall sing, "O grave, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting?"

My opponent has said that eternal is not synonymous with immortal. We shall see how Webster defines the word; "Eternal, without end of existence or duration; endless, immortal."

We had not time to consider the body from which Paul could be absent. Let him explain. Rom. 12: 5—"So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." 1 Cor. 12: 27;—"Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." Eph. 3: 6;—"That the Gentiles should be fellow heirs and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel." Col. 1: 18;—"And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the first born from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence." "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church." We think it is manifest that the church was that body. He debated with himself whether it was better to suffer with and for the church, thereby laboring for his Divine Master's glory, or to have done with stripes and imprisonments and live in unalloyed happiness in the presence of the Lord.

In relation to the tent or tabernacle which is to be dissolved, Mr. Whitfield renders it—"The house that is fixed on the ground." And this "building of God" is that one, not a number of houses or tents, which John saw in vision descending from heaven, and in which Jesus said, "there are many mansions."

The Bible says that it was Noah who preached, and preached by the power of that same spirit which raised Christ from the dead.

We are coolly told that it would have been more proper to have said "who maketh his spirits angels." Where would the spirits get tangible feet to wash, like those of the angels in the days of Lot?

We are asked how long does the destruction of the wicked continue? When a being is eternally destroyed, as in the second death, he ceases forever as a being. He receives the wages of sin, which is death. All the wicked will God destroy, and in this destruction is shown the mercy of Jehovah; for he deprives them of an existence which they are unable to enjoy. [Time.]

Mr. Loveland. In reply to the complaint of my brother that I have gone back to the first argument, I say no; or if I had I would do no more than he has done. He calls for proof at the same time he ignores everything which I have offered, or pretends not to notice it. He says that man could not rise unless he died. I have no objection; he must settle that with Paul. The resurrection comes as the plant from the germ. My friend says of course all are punished if there be no resurrection. But I say none perish, "For all live unto God, who is not the God of the dead but of the living."

As to what is eternal life I prefer the authority of Jesus before Webster. The knowledge of God is not the definition of Noah Webster. Paul says that this house, that is, shall be dissolved. I know that the church of Christ is mentioned often as his body figuratively; but it would be ridiculous to say that it was his identical body, as the Catholics do by transubstantiation. The way which my brother seeks to explain away a direct, unambiguous statement is truly astonishing. If the dissolution of the body is effected by death, then there is a positive declaration that something is present with the Lord. He still persists in saying that the preaching to the spirits in prison was done in the time of Noah. The text reads straight along and says that Jesus was carried and preached to the spirits in prison.

My opponent says that the throne of God is in heaven and the altar upon which the souls perished was upon the earth. I cannot stop to discuss that at present. "Do spirits have feet?" I am mortified to hear such a silly question coming from such a man as Mr. Grant. Angels are spirits, and we are told that John fell at the feet of one of them. My position is untouched that there is a spiritual existence where disembodied spirits, the spirits of just men made perfect, are forever singing hymns of praise to God for their salvation. There are multitudes of these beings looking down upon and mingling unperceived with men upon this earth.

All the ridicule which he throws upon the narrative of Saul and Samuel, will not reconcile that fact with his theory. The Book says that "Samuel said unto Saul." What Samuel was this who spoke? or is the statement not true? The Bible says that Saul and his sons would be with Samuel on the morrow. Our friend says that Saul was not killed till three days after. Of this there is not a shadow of proof. As to the meaning of destroy I would simply say that you cannot annex it to the idea of annihilation. For instance: "O Israel thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thy help." If Israel were annihilated no help could be afforded her. "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy: for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." Then a man shall be destroyed for the great crime of having annihilated himself! If destruction means annihilation, a man is annihilated after or before the punishment, or else annihilation is the punishment. If a man be annihilated before he is fully punished, it is not strict justice, if annihilation be the punishment; it is just no punishment at all.

In reference to the nature of demons, or unclean spirits, they are the spirits of wicked men. This theory the Greeks understood in their hero-worship. They have a spiritual existence and retain their wicked nature. Other than these there are none, for we have no account of the creation of superhuman evil intelligences or devils. [Time.]

Correspondence.

From B. P. Manning.

Bro. Grant:—By your permit, I wish to write a few lines to the dear brethren scattered abroad. I can say I am striving for the kingdom, but am a great sufferer from the chronic rheumatism. My feet and hands are so swollen that I have not been able to do but a very little work with my hands since the first of last Jan. O how glad I am that my dear Savior is coming so soon to relieve my pain; and not only mine, but all of the dear saints.

I see by the Crisis that Bro. Burnham is suffering with pain at this time. Well, Bro. B., I can sympathise with you in your sufferings. O my dear brother, this is a world of suffering, but the blessed rest that remains for the people of God is but just ahead,—only a little in the distance. I am willing to suffer here, if I can inherit the kingdom at last.

Dear brethren, how good the Lord is to his children, while here in this world. When in pain, he is always ready to hear prayer and send answers of peace. O how many times, while the pain has been so severe that my joints were drawing out of place, God has heard my prayer and stopped pain so that I could get some rest. To God be all the glory.—Amen.

Dear brethren, it rejoices my poor heart to read in the Crisis that God is at work by his Spirit, saving souls in these last days in some places. How much we need the work of God revived in New Hampshire. The worldly-mindedness that prevails among the professed people of God at this time is alarming; but my prayer is that God will wake up the people in N. H., before it is too late. There are some where I travel that wish to have Bro. Munger come up and give them the word of life. Can he not come and help us a little? If he can come to Manchester, and take the N. H. Central R. R. and stop at Parker's Station, I will convey him to any place where he feels the Lord would have him go to preach the word. Danbury is one place where I believe good may be done. Warner is another. Dear brother, ask the Lord, and see if you cannot come; if so, give notice in the Crisis. Come direct to my house in Goffstown, N. H., Parker's Station.

From Eld. J. T. Ongley.

Having been appointed at our last Conference to act as an Evangelist, to go into new places in North Western Pa., certain brethren in different localities were appointed to act as a committee to procure funds to sustain me in that position. The region of country in which I have labored is truly among the poor, their crops being cut off the last season, and the lumber business is worse than nothing this season, makes it rather discouraging in the way of raising funds. We have found quite a number of places where they have never heard the Advent doctrine. One discourse in a place creates an interest to hear more on the subject of our hope. I find quite a number in different places, that have become disgusted with the popular teaching and are ready to hear and read. Some have already come out and confessed that they have learned more Bible truth in two or three discourses, than all they ever learned.

When we see the interest manifested in different places, we are compelled to yield to their impertunities to come again, and trust in the Lord that the hearts of the people will yet be opened to receive and sustain the truth. I have just returned from a trip in which I traveled two hundred and thirty-six miles in eleven and a half days, filled twelve appointments, and gave away most of the tracts I had, about 50 cts. worth. I find a good chance to dispose of tracts and would be glad to send to the different offices of publication for more; but cannot at present. I am owing Bro. Hastings for books and tracts, and cannot see where the pay is to come from. I make this statement to show the brethren and sisters abroad that I am not idle, and also to stir up the pure minds of those appointed to act as a committee to procure funds; and if there are any others of like precious faith, that have any missionary zeal, and would be glad to aid in sending the truth in North Western Pa., to do so by sending to me at Blooming Valley, Crawford Co., Pa., in the way of cash, tracts, or the prayers of faith. Faith and works combined prove a mighty lever. God grant that they may be used, and we in the judgment find that we have not labored in vain.

Dear brethren and sisters, what we do must be done quickly. Spiritualism is stalking abroad. It is the most prominent thing we have to contend with in our travels. How necessary to contend earnestly, too, for the "faith once delivered to the saints." Soon He that is to come will come and will not tarry. But the just must have the right faith. When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth? Let us be up and doing, while the Bridegroom tarries, that when he comes we may say, "This is our God we have waited for him." Waiting implies a readiness. We must be like unto men that wait for their Lord. "Let not your heart be troubled." He will come again. Let us be glad and rejoice. The signs betoken him near even at the door. May the God of peace abide with you. Amen.

From H. Spaulding.

Bro. Grant:—Leaving Lincus, we came on to Houlton by stage, and then on foot five miles to Littleton, and got up a meeting for the Sabbath, gave three lectures, had a very interesting congregation, the eyes, ears and hearts were open. O, how the people did listen. The subject of the coming of Jesus and the restitution was a new subject to them. Blessed be the Lord, this subject does take well, among all who are not sectarians.

Let me relate one incident in my travels. I was at a tavern waiting for the stage, and the landlady recognized me, saying, you have been here before. Yes, I am the Colporteur—have given lectures here. There happened to be a Baptist missionary present, whose name was Spaulding. He came forward and introduced himself to me, inquiring what society sent me out. O, said I, I go on my own responsibility. I am not backed up by any society. But how do you get sustained? Why God sustains me. But you must have a fortune to bear your own expenses. O no, I only have a small farm. It don't cost so much as you think for. I go on foot, carrying my tracts in my hand to give away. I find the people very kind and hospitable indeed. He went on making inquiries, till he learned I was an Advent man, and then he brought up all the inconsistent things and fanaticism of the Advent people, and I defended the cause as well as I was able. While we were talking, Eld. Spaulding, the missionary, was called to dinner, but the Colporteur got no invitation. No, he may get his own dinner, or go without. I remained in the sitting room, till Eld. Spaulding had got through with dinner, returned to me and continued his talk, till another man came in and called for a dinner. Then I said to the landlady, sit on a dinner for me, I should like a dinner. It was soon done, and I sat down with the traveler to dinner, and Eld. Spaulding took his hat, and I saw no more of him. He hung his head, I noticed as he left. He could see the difference between being sustained by men, and being sustained by God. He was called, hired, sent out and paid by men, and of course he could ride in his good carriage with his wife, like a gentleman, and have a good dinner free. While I, who had no society to back me up, or pay me, had to go on foot, carrying my tracts, giving them away, and then had to pay for my dinner at the tavern. I guess he learned a lesson from it, if he did not, I did. His wife was introduced to me, and she seemed to sympathize with me, and on leaving said to me, as she gave me her parting hand, "God bless you, and when you come to Houlton you call on us." Blessed be God, there are hearts which can feel, and I guess she felt, and he too; probably it was not his fault that I did not get invited to dinner.

From Littleton we came on to Bridgewater, where we gave one lecture, and met a Bro. Morse, who undertook to defend the immortal-soul system, and found he had a hard row to hoe. Praise the Lord, it is an easy matter to defend Bible doctrine. I always pity those who undertake to defend immortality out of Christ.

May 16th we arrived safely in Presque Isle, found the bundle we had sent on by stage, and with it we started on, and arrived at Salmon Brook Plantation, where I was acquainted, having been there twice before. Here I have been universally received with joy and kindness. Yes, it seemed as though they would kill me with kindness. I need a great deal of grace to keep humble with so many attentions offered me. I see, now, how it is that ministers get lifted up with pride, when they get courted, flattered, pampered, and worshiped. If I were to receive $500 a year, I don't see why I should not be as proud as any of them. O, I bless God, I have no salary to blind my mind, and keep me from declaring the truth. We propose stopping here and holding meetings just as long as it seems duty. Our first meeting was very encouraging. Here are quite a number of Advent families. The Lord has done great things here, and the Bible truth prevails in this neighborhood.

Thus far hath the Lord helped us. Praised be his name. Our tracts will be sowed all over Aroostook County. Our friends may be assured their donation is doing good. We may need another in a month or two. Pray for us.

Salmon Brook Plant., Aroostook, Me.

☞ A letter from Rome, says:—"The influx of pilgrims is immense. We must go back to the jubilee of 1825 to find a similar concourse. From all the Catholic countries are arriving strangers of the highest distinction, especially from Belgium, Spain, and Germany, all wishing to make a demonstration in honor of the Sovereign Pontiff. The religious societies instituted for the reception of pilgrims and for giving them hospitality, have prepared as much as 18,000 rations per day."—The Catholic.

Obituary Notices.

Died, at Enfield, Ct., May 3d, 1860, Mrs. Emeline, wife of Syria Potter, aged forty-five years.

Sister Potter became interested in the religion of the Bible and gave her heart to Christ at the age of fifteen years. Immediately after she united with the M. E. Church, of which she remained a worthy and acceptable member, till by the great consideration of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, in the year '43, awakened in her mind, with attending circumstances, she was led to cast her lot, as to church relations, with those whom this expectation had identified as Adventists. She was one of the earliest and most devoted, as well as firm believer in the doctrines which we hold and preach, loving ever "the blessed hope," and ever ready to give a reason for it, while she could willingly offer a word of encouragement to the inquiring soul.

Bro. Potter's house has been the home of the traveling preachers from the beginning of the interest upon the Advent doctrine; hence many of our brethren will remember the kind and christian care they have received at the hands of our departed sister.

She had a great love for the distinguishing features of our faith, and the experimental and practical power of religion. Many powerful meetings were held at our brother's house while she was in better health, in which she participated with delight. Bro. K. S. Hastings used to make that pilgrim home a stopping and a preaching place. Many others, including the writer, often preached there.

She bore her long continued afflictions with remarkable patience, and died with christian resignation, in hope of a resurrection from the dead to a glorious immortality. Her disease was of a most fearful nature, cutting off hope almost from the beginning, and the occasion of most excruciating suffering; yet under all she was continually sustained, and thus gained a constant moral power which became the great element of victory. Her husband and children mourn for her, but not as those who have no hope; for in a little while "the dead will hear His voice, and they that hear shall live."

She rests from the sufferings of the present life,—free from care and sorrow,—sleeps in Jesus, and will "rise and be caught up to meet the Lord." "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Bro C. W. Baker preached the funeral sermon to a large and deeply interested audience, in which he ably gave the reasons of the hope of the righteous. W. A. C.

Died, in Exeter, N H., June 3d, 1860, Angeline M., wife of Bro. George W. Withrell, aged thirty-five years and six months.

Sister Witherell experienced a hope in Christ among the Methodists about eighteen years ago, and continued with them until 1853; at which time she embraced the faith of Christ's speedy coming, with kindred doctrines, and continued steadfast in that faith up to the last, and, although she did not love death, she met it with calm composure and quietly fell asleep, expecting to sing the song of triumph when Jesus comes to raise the dead. During the times of great excitement and enthusiasm, Sister W. exhibited much prudence and wisdom, and thus proved a great blessing to her family. Our ministering brethren who have visited Exeter, will remember her, as she was such a delightful singer, and took such an active part in the singing.

She leaves a husband, one child, a mother, brother and other relatives to mourn; but they mourn not as those who have no hope. The church feel that they have also sustained a great loss. The funeral was attended by Eld. L. Boutell, and words of consolation administered from Rev. 21: 4. May the Lord sanctify the bereavement to the good of the bereaved. Wm. H. Mitchell.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

(Advices of the 26th ult.)

It is reported that Garibaldi had issued a stirring proclamation to the Sicilians, stating that he had assumed the Provisional Dictatorship of the kingdom. The proclamation was received with great enthusiasm by the inhabitants of Palermo.

London, 27.—Letters from Palermo of the 21st state that the anxiety there was increasing, and the popular passions inflamed. On the evening previous several shots were fired from balconies in Toledo. The police returned the fire, wounding several persons. Strangers in the city had taken refuge under their national flags.

There was a panic among the public functionaries, and the directors of the official journal had fled.

The churches on Sunday were deserted.

Yesterday the fires of the insurgent's bivouac were seen on the heights surrounding Palermo, and it was reported a battle had taken place, and the population were anxiously waiting news of the result.

A very conciliatory proclamation from Gen. Laura had been coldly received.

Advices from Messina state that gloomy tranquility prevails there.

A letter from Vienna addressed to the Debats, states that Austria, after the landing of the volunteers in Sicily, assumed a decided attitude, and has resolved that, under any circumstances, she will not allow the Bourbons of Naples to be overthrown by a revolution. The letter adds that an extraordinary degree of activity has been lately evident in the War Department at Vienna, and that an Austrian squadron is being actively fitted out in the Adriatic, to be ready to proceed to Naples. Austria and Russia are therefore apparently in the same mind: they are resolved that Francis II. shall reign over the Two Sicilies.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

Marseilles, May 25.—Advices from Messina to the 21st state that, on the 20th inst., forty-six Neopolitan deserters, were fired at while passing to the insurgents. Two considerable disembarkations had taken place at San Stefano de Camestra to the right, and at Santo Veto to the left of Palermo. The rising at Messina had not yet taken place. It was expected that Palermo would soon surrender.

A proclamation by the committee of Palermo had been posted up in all parts of the town, announcing the victorious march of Garibaldi, and that Sicily would soon become independent. It is also added: "Even the Neapolitan police are commencing to desert their master," and terminated with "Viva il re Emmanuel! Viva Garibaldi!"

The Opinione Nationale publishes the following dispatch, dated Messina, 22d inst.: "There is a great panic among the authorities. The inhabitants are joining Garibaldi in crowds. Great numbers of strangers are quitting the towns. The soldiers have taken refuge in the forts."

THE FIRST ENCOUNTER.

The first encounter between the patriots under Garibaldi and the Royalist troops occurred while the latter were concentrating themselves upon Palermo and Messina. Gen. Landi could not resist the vigorous attack, and fled to Palermo, leaving behind him four guns one hundred dead and a great many wounded. During his two days' march to gain that city he was harrassed on all sides by the population and hotly pursued by Garibaldi's men.

GARIBALDI'S PLANS.

We quote from Gagilnani the following sketch of Garibaldi's policy and intended movements: "The general plan of Garibaldi's movement appears to have been modified, as he is now directing all his movements and resources towards Sicily alone, in order to make that island, if he should succeed in becoming master of it, the basis of subsequent operations against the kingdom of Naples. All volunteers are, until further orders, to be directed by small detachments towards Sicily; they will, it is arranged, land at points previously fixed on, and thence proceed to headquarters, where they will be formed into companies and battalions. If succes crowns Garibaldi's efforts, he hopes, the latest accounts from his friends state, to organize a formidable expedition, make a descent on Calabria, raise the country, and extend the insurrectionary movements from the South to the North of the Kingdom."

LATEST.

Paris, May 29. A second telegram from Naples announces a popular rising at Palermo, and an attempted bombardment by sea and land by Neapolitan troops.

Naples, Wednesday morning—9.30. The latest dispatches state that the bombardment of Palermo had lasted several hours, and that Garibaldi had entered the town on the 22d. The head quarters of Garibaldi are in the centre of the town.

The number killed is large.

The Prince Gortairo, at the head of the Japanese government, was assassinated on the 15th of March, while on his way to the palace with his train.

The Great Tornado.

MORE THAN ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY LIVES LOST.

Chicago, June 5th. Further particulars of the disastrous tornado have been received.

The tornado was first noticed between Marion and Cedar Rapids, in Lynn county, Iowa, going northwest and southeast in three separate currents, crossing the track of the Chicago Railroad several times.

At Lisbon the depot buildings and all the warehouses in the village were entirely demolished. A train of ten freight cars, heavily loaded, were lifted bodily from the track and dashed in pieces.

Before reaching Lisbon it had killed six persons.

One current passed north through Mechanicville, demolishing everything in its course and killing sixteen people.

Another current passed through Onion Grove, killing, in that vicinity, seventeen persons. It then passed south of the railroad near Dewitt, killing twenty-seven persons, sixteen of whom belonged to the family of Thomas Hatfield.

It then passed south of Romerss and Lowmoor, demolishing the house of David Millard, killing him and a portion of his family.

It then struck the town of Camanchie, on the Mississippi, at which point the loss of life is much greater than at first reported. From all accounts there cannot be less than 55 killed at this place alone. Some reports put it at even a larger number, but the bodies cannot be found. There are also 125 wounded, some fatally, and ten missing.

At Camanchie, a large timber raft, with a crew of twenty four men and two women, was scattered, and twenty-one men and both women lost.

The tornado is known to have traveled a distance of ninety miles in Iowa, and seventy miles in Illinois.

The loss of life cannot be less than 150.

During the entire day yesterday two trains were run every hour from Clinton to the scene of the disaster, with relief for the sufferers.

St. Louis, June 4. The storm of Saturday was very severe at Alton, Illinois. The total loss will exceed $100,000.

Religious Intelligence.

☞ A Cavan correspondent of the Belfast Banner says: "Last week, in our country prison here, out of upwards of fifty prisoners, some of whom stand charged with very serious offences, not a single one belongs to the Protestant community of any denomination."

Bohemia.—A great religious movement is going on in Prague and other cities of Bohemia. It is stated that conversions to the gospel have been numerous. Roman Catholic parish priests preach the pure gospel. The Bible is extensively circulated. The people demand with earnestness the celebration of worship in the vulgar tongue. All events seem to show that Bohemia, that ancient focus of reform, where four centuries of persecution have not been sufficient to put out the light of the gospel, is about to make a new advance in Christian truth.

Abolition of Slavery.—The government of Holland has published a decree abolishing slavery from the island of Java. The slaves made freemen by this decree were about five thousand in number.

"Numerous religious books and tracts were translated from the French and English languages, secretly printed, and stored ready for use. Consequently, now that the long-desired opportunity is come, there is no lack of ammunition wherewith to attack the enemy.

Even such men as compose the Council, of which Ricasoli is President, were frightened to see Bibles imported so suddenly and numerously, and put a priest in command at the custom-house, to check a business which they suspected as semi-political. They must be less uneasy now, for I hear that twenty large boxes of Bibles came safely through the hands of the police a few days ago."

France.—A great revival has taken place recently among Roman Catholics near Vesoul. In two or three villages situated in the neighborhood of this place, nearly a thousand souls have left the Roman Catholic church and turned to evangelical Protestantism.

Notices, &c.

☞ A grove meeting will be held in Plainfield, on land owned by Bro. Edmond Beals, Thursday, June 28th, commencing at 10 o'clock, A. M., and continuing over the Sabbath. Bro. H. Pratt is expected to attend, and we would be glad to have Sr. E. S. Fenn come and labor also.

David Thayer, for the Church.

P. S. This will be an important meeting for the Mountain brethren. Come with your tents, come ALL! Rome is falling, and the Lord is coming. Let your whole being respond, "Even so come, Lord Jesus." Bro. Grant will be present to aid in this meeting.
H. Pratt.

Campmeeting.

It is thought best to have our Annual Campmeeting at Wilbraham commence August the 20th, one week earlier than last year. We give the notice in season for all interested to make arrangements.

Hiram Munger,
R. E. Ladd,
Geo. T. Adams, } Committee.

Grove Meeting.

There will be a Grove Meeting, the Lord willing, at Pine Swamp, Sharon, Ct., about three miles from West Cornwall Depot, on the Housatonic R. R., to commence the 21st of June, and continue over Sunday. Provision will be made to accommodate brethren and sisters from abroad. Come in the name of the Lord. We pray the Lord to send such preaching brethren as are adapted to the wants of the people there.

In behalf of the brethren,
S. B. Munn.

Grove Meetings in Wisconsin.

There will be a grove meeting at West Point, Columbia Co., Wis., commencing at 2 P. M., Friday, June 21st. Call on Bro. Ira Polley.

Also one at Kingston, Sauk Co., Wis., commencing June 28th, at 2 P. M. Inquire for Bro. Parley Bush.

These meetings will continue over the Lord's day. Several ministers will be present.

Wm. Sheldon.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

Lines of Gladness.

Thank God for Truth, it makes us free;
Thankful our hearts should ever be;
Thank God for Truth, for here we find
Bright gems to deck the natural mind:
Thank God for Truth!

Thank God for Truth!—when sorrows roll,
It points us to a blissful goal;
It points us to the better land,
Where beauteous forms immortal stand.
Thank God for Truth!

Thank God for Truth in Time's dark night,
It makes the pilgrim's pathway bright;
Thank God for Truth in these last days,
It shows us sin in all its ways.
Thank God for Truth!

Thank God for Truth, it makes us pure,
It makes us feel in Him secure;
Nor fancied errors us can shock,—
We stand on an Almighty Rock.
Thank God for Truth!

With my whole heart and all my powers,
I praise this glorious Truth of ours;
Come, all the world, the aged, the youth,
And thank the Lord for precious Truth.
Thank God for Truth!

M. Mathews.

Lowell, Mass.

For the Crisis.

The Burning Boat.

A brave boy on the deck of the burning steamer Henry Clay, was seen to kneel and with closed eyes commit himself to the care of God. Rising from his devotions he leaped from the flaming vessel into the river. For a moment he was invisible beneath the waves; soon he rose to the surface, brushed back his beautiful hair from his face, and boldly swam toward the shore. Upon reaching the land he turned round to gaze upon the wreck from which he had just escaped, and touched with sympathy for the struggling sufferers left behind, he cried out, "O how I wish I could save them!" and burst into tears.

Reader, are you saved? Have you escaped the corruptions that are in this world? Do you believe and feel that for you the great work of pardon and deliverance has been wrought? Well, then, have you forgotten the hosts that perish behind you? Can you forget the pit from which you were taken? Can you forget those that are left behind you in sin and darkness there? Will you not try to save them? Does not your heart long to save them? Surely if you have been touched by the sympathy of Christ, if you have had the love of God shed abroad in your heart by the Holy Spirit, you will say, "O, how I wish I could save them!"

Can you not save them? You can tell them of the love of God who gave his Son to die for them. You can tell of Jesus who shed his own heart's blood to procure their pardon. You can tell them of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. You can show them by your words, and by your works, in a consistent, holy, joyous, peaceful, blameless life, how much Christ has done for you. You can kindly, patiently and lovingly warn them of their danger and beseech them to escape. You can tell them how to be saved through grace, by simply believing in Christ, by trusting wholly in his mercy, his goodness and his love.

O! be diligent, let your light shine, and so walk that you may be found of Christ in peace at his appearing. Warn the careless, entreat the perishing, beseech men to be reconciled to God. Be gentle and full of compassion, become all things unto all men that you may save some. Above all, pray that God may bless your efforts and save perishing souls, making his gospel effectual for their deliverance from sin and darkness, unto the light and liberty of life, and joy, and hope.

Remember this word: "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth and one convert him, let him know that he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways, shall save a SOUL from DEATH and shall hide a multitude of sins.—James 5: 19, 20. Remember also that there cometh a solemn day of resurrection, and reward and retribution, and then "they that be teachers shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn MANY to RIGHTEOUSNESS as the STARS FOREVER AND EVER."—Dan. 12: 3. O reader, I pray that you may have a portion there, and shine in star-like splendor when the Lord shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.

Reader, are you trying to SAVE MEN? If not then you are not safe yourself. O fly to Christ! This world is worse than a burning boat. You must forsake it soon, or perish when "the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." Now you may escape. God loves you and seeks to save you. Christ died for you and now tenderly invites you. Come to him, come now! Yield your heart to love your loving Lord. Then, standing in this place of safety, look back on the perishing and say, "O HOW I WISH I COULD SAVE THEM!" Then try, and with God's blessing you shall surely "save some."

Wit.—A blacksmith, having been slandered, was advised to apply to the courts for redress. He replied, with true wisdom: "I shall never sue anybody for slander. I can go into my shop and work out a better character in six months than I could get in a court-house in a year."

A Glorious Prospect.

"And to you who are troubled, rest with us."

Never, perhaps, was there an invitation presented to the human family so adapted to their condition as pilgrims, so soothing to their sorrows in the onward march of their weary footsteps, as the invitation to rest. The usual meaning we attach to rest with regard to the body, is none other than a present release from the fatigue and turmoils of life, by affording us, for a little space, quietude and repose from the cares and many responsibilities incident to the prosecution of earthly labor. But there is nothing permanent or lasting in such temporary relief, it only affords momentary enjoyment; for when at the close of the day we seek in the retirement of sleep that rest which the labor and bustle of business cannot afford, it proves evanescent as a dream, for the approach of morning light again reminds us that ours is a life of care and labor, and not of rest.

Thus do the pleasures of earth possess but an ephemeral existence, while the best and most flattering promises the world can give, appear but for a moment, enrobed in dazzling beauty, before the bewildered vision of the ensnared victim, and then wither away, blasting by their decay the fair hopes of thousands whose bright visions of enjoyment did not ascend higher than the precints of their native earth.

But while the repose obtained from worldly pleasure is of such short duration, affording but a momentary respite, would not a message of love and mercy, directly from the King of kings, and Lord of lords, if presented to the inhabitants of earth in their uneven and troubled pathway, be received with outstretched arms of humble gratitude, as glad tidings and good news of great joy, inspiring them with the hope of substanstial peace, and never fading glory at God's right hand? Well, there is just such a message of peace and love, hope and joy, for the weary traveler, as he journeys through this wilderness of sin; it is written out on the sacred page, its purport is heavenly and divine, as it is a saying of Him who spake as never man spake, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Yes, rest, not such as the world gives, but real rest, glorious rest, eternal rest.

The christian's rest is not only a rest in prospect, but a present and abiding rest in all his pilgrim way. It is a balm for his wounded spirit, a cordial for his fears, a solace in his troubles, because he confides in the word of Him in whom he has believed, and his promises to the believer are all yea and amen in Christ Jesus.

But there are some in our sin-ruined world, who are not weary or heavy laden because of sin, hence the message to obtain rest through the Lord Jesus Christ is not to them glad tidings of great joy. They are not yet tired of folly, nor weary of the pleasures of sin; it still rolls as a sweet morsel under their tongue. Thus a proposition to such to seek and obtain rest, is not welcomed or appreciated. Poor, deluded mortals! while they eagerly drink in the supposed pleasures of life, they forget that time is swift in its pursuit, and remorse will speedily overtake them, when to their astonishment their dream of felicity will quickly vanish away, leaving them indeed weary and heavy laden with guilt, an insupportable load, without one single promise of rest, or cheering hope of happiness; but on the contrary, a fearful looking for of fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.

O, then, shall not the humble follower of the Lamb bind his heavenly armor more closely round him, and hasten onward through the gloom of his desert pathway, patient in tribulation, and comforted in the prospect of his closing warfare, when his glorified spirit will be enabled to rejoice in the words of the Apostle, "And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels"?

Co-operation.

To say that co-operation amongst men is a thing desirable, is simply to say that we are possessed in common with human nature. God saw it was not good for man to be alone; and facts innumerable testify that it is not. No important enterprise can possibly be carried on without the aid of co-laborers. Hence to say that co-operation amongst brethren is not after all a thing so very important, is to say what is neither in consonance with the facts in the case, or common sense. The facts are, a man left utterly alone in God's vast creation is as helpless as an infant. What warrior, ruler, or great teacher, ever carried a point without the co-operation of his constituents? Say then that you are infallible,—that you are omnipotent—or else come down to stand on the level of a man amongst men.

And furthermore; do not be too punctilious as to the ways and means, nor as to the men. May be, you would like to associate only with such men as you think will compare in mental, moral, and social calibre with your unworthy self. It may be you are a religious aristocrat, a high-churchman; aye, may it not be barely possible after all that you are an empty pharisee,—having a religious shell but devoid of grace in your heart. One thing is certain; Christ Jesus came to save that which was lost. And again, St. Paul exhorts to condescend to men of low estate. If, then, they are such men as Christ seeks, what better ask ye?

But the principles upon which we should co-operate. Yes, that I know is the thing with the true christian; as well as with the man who thinks he has a conscience—though all his neighbors may think he has not. And I know, too, this is not the age to play "hail, fallow, well met," with Satan. I know this is the age when if a man would live a christian, he must live according to principle and not be governed by expediency; and it is a time, when, if a man will do this duty, he must stand up straight—perpendicular; must be radical, or be nothing. But what are the principles upon which co-operation among christian brethren is possible? Either these principles are definable, or they are not. If they are not, I pity you; for you are a man "lost in the woods." But if, as is to be hoped, they are, then will you define them and let us see who and where you are?

The question is often asked, Can American Adventists co-operate? Before answering this question let me premise:

1. If by the term "Adventists" is meant all such as are aiming to give to doctrines of the first and second advents of our Lord Jesus Christ just the practical importance the Word of God gives them—and who believe the coming of the Lord draweth nigh; and

2. If they are willing to acknowledge the protestant doctrine—the rights of conscience; and

3. If with this, each will act a brother's part—do as he would be done by—with reference to what he does not believe—then, I see not why ALL, who look for and love the appearing and kingdom of the Messiah, may not and should not co-operate as brethren. Away then with sectionalism. Be done with this paltry partisanism, and from hence be men—men of God; and let it no longer be said with regard to this matter—"the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." "All ye are brethren."

The Seventh and Last Vial.

"And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air, and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and there was a great earthquake such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great."—Rev. 16. 17, 18

The work to be accomplished under the pouring out of the seventh vial is great, and is the last plague to be visited upon this ungodly world. It effects the destruction of old Babylon and the nations of earth; like the plagues which God sent on slaveholding Egypt when he delivered his people from their Egyptian bondage. And when they were shouting deliverance on the banks of the Red Sea, Pharaoh and his hosts were destroyed; so it will be in the end when the last great plague is poured out, men will blaspheme God because of the plagues of the hail; but their blasphemy will be hushed in everlasting destruction from the Almighty; while his saints are shouting "Alleluia! Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, be unto the Lord our God; for true and righteous are his judgments."

It is believed by many that six of the vials have already been poured out; if so, there remains only the seventh to be fulfilled. Remember the seventh and last vial is poured out into the air; like the air it will pervade every kingdom, circulate into every nation, sow the seeds of anarchy in every society, and disorganize every bond of union among men, except the Gospel, "And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great." Voices mean political strife. Thunders is an emblem of divisions. Lightnings is a representative of anger and war. Great earthquake—denotes a great revolution. And there will be, when this vial is poured out, political strife among all nations, divisions among all sects, societies and association of men upon earth. Anger, war and bloodshed will fill the countries with horror and dismay, and a great revolution, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty a revolution and so great.

"And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell; and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." The great city is the woman which reigneth over the kings of the earth. The woman is Papacy. Papacy must also be divided, into three parts, to show her dissolution. "And the cities of the nations fell." As city denoted the papal power and religion, so do cities represent the power and religion of all other nations. Therefore all the power and all national religion will fall in and under this vial. And the anti-christian power will be judged; all her sins, cruel persecutions and bloody deeds will be brought into judgment, into remembrance before God; and he will fill to her the cup which she has made others drink, and she in her turn must drink the dregs.

"And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found." Islands and mountains are figures of great and small kingdoms and governments. This text alludes to the same time and circumstances of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Daniel 2: 35—45), when the stone cut out without hands shall smite the image upon his feet, and all the kingdoms of the earth be carried away, that no place be found for them. In this verse the mountains were not found.

"And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent; and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great." This, in brief, closes the history of the seventh vial, or plague. This storm of hail is the last part of the seventh vial, and the closing up of the judgments of God. I believe this hail to be literal, for this reason, I have never found it used in a figurative sense. See Isa. 28: 17, and 30: 30; Ezek. 13: 11, 13, and 38: 22; Rev. 11: 19. By reading these connections, you cannot but be struck with the argument of the prophets in their descriptions of this last and dreadful judgment of God upon this world. It will be literally a rain of great hail stones, like those which fell upon Egypt in the days of Moses.—Ex. 9: 23, 25. Please turn and read it.

This is no doubt a type of the last part of the seventh vial, or plague. Ere long a voice, a great voice, will be heard from the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, "It is done." Then will follow the judgments in quick succession, and the final hour when the destinies of all mankind will be eternally fixed. I believe that six of the plagues have been poured out, and the seventh is at hand. Let us gird our loins about with truth, and be like those who wait for their Lord. I. E. Clark.

Contentedness.

The sage observes, he who craves more than he needs, mars his actual happiness. The king said to the sage, a mere petition from thee would have inclined me to provide for thee for life. What, replied the former, how canst thou expect that one who is richer than thou art should solicit a favor of thee? On being asked for further explanation, he rejoined, because I am more satisfied with the little I possess than thou with thine abundant wealth. He who is satisfied with the portion allotted to him by his Creator may properly be deemed the richest of all mankind. Be content with that which God has bestowed on thee, and envy not the possession of others. Covet not that which was not given to thee, for he who rejoices in his lot will always consider himself abundantly rich. A little will suffice him who only desires from the world that which he actually needs. The smallest gift is acceptable to God from one who is content with the little vouchsafed to him by his Maker. Contentment surpasses intellectuality. Dignity and riches consist in the abandonment of covetousness. He is wise, who seeks from the world but what he requires; for wealth is deceptive, and worldly treasures vanish as speedily as they come. Contentment, which protects its votaries from baseness, is superior to opulence, which exposes its owners to disdain. Contentment of mind surpasses riches. Contentment, with diligence, must lead us not to magnify the possession of others, not to esteem our own as too scanty, neither to contrast our lot with that above us. The sage recommended to the discontented, to recall to their memory their past hardships and vicissitudes, which cannot fail to reconcile them to their comparative present tranquility—a contrast which admits of no substitute. The fruits of contentment are ease, and those of humility esteem. Regulate thy means, lest thy means will be governed by thy cravings. Contentment is irreconcilable with covetousness.

Resignation.

The sage observes, resignation is the crown of mankind; for avarice is poverty, resignation liberty, and suspense slavery. Regard the world as a blank, and thy share therein as an unexpected prize. The incessant solicitation of favors from mortals betokens lack of faith in God.

Diffidence.

Cherish the attribute of diffidence, for it betokens a noble mind. The garb of morality conceals all our feelings. Humility and faith are inseparable and coexistent.

Circumspection.

A cautious tongue insures prosperity, and adherence to industry averts want. The unwary forfeit esteem.

Subduing of Passions.

The sage observed, The success of man chiefly depends on his renunciation of worldly pleasures and immoderate desires. The ability to select or reject betokens discrimination, and the government of our passions is the best test of wisdom. Wisdom guides and instructs its adherents, whilst the slave of passions is led astray and perishes. Happy is he who controls his desires; he will once have as a witness Him who exists but is invisible, viz., God; for no man has ever regretted that which he has resigned in honor of God. We can only approach our Creator by worship. The fear of God renders our end happier than our beginning. The consciousness of the omniscience and omnipotence of God will guard us from the commission of evil; this constitutes the reverence of God, and the means of resisting our passions. Misfortune follows the footsteps of the dissipated. The restraint upon our excesses is our safeguard from evil consequences. Fickle words indicate the predominance of the passions. When passions sway reason, it is a sure evidence of deep immersion in folly. He who is unable to govern his inclinations and to repress sinful passions, so as to fortify himself against evil consequences, is surely unfit to rule over others. In the absence of reliable counsel, beware not to lean to the dictates of passion, in any object that may engross thine attention, for passion is the enemy of cool deliberation. Prosperous indeed would be the condition of man, but for the following reasons: that the old and experienced are unheeded, that our passions are unbridled, and that our self-love is overweening. Evil imagination and licentiousness corrupt intellect. Good counsel cannot be expected from the fickle, nor concord from the schismatic, nor tranquility from hope deferred. He who succumbs to his passions will be enslaved, and he who resists them will prevail. He who is a prey to passions, entails on himself loss of wealth and honor. The immoderate indulgence of passions will lead man to ignore his Creator, to multiply his sorrow, compunction, and remorse, and to increase his own punishment. Passion may be figuratively termed the twin sister of blindness. Alas! said the sage, that our discretion should slumber whilst our passions are vigilant; hence the submission of the former to the latter. The sages were asked, Which is the most commendable war? That which is waged against our evil desires, was their reply.

Borne with every Breeze along.

Borne with every breeze along,
Comes the wail of ruth and wrong;
Brothers, mingling in the strife,
Fiercely seek each other's life.
Tyrants lift the dagger high,
Freedom bares her breast to die;
Hate and wrong have won the day,
Peace must yield her gentle sway.

Darkness hovers o'er our path,
Men shall drink the wine of wrath;
Thunders mutter at our door,
Snares beset our way before;
Troubles gather thick behind,
Rushing swiftly as the wind.
See! the storm-king rideth by,
Terror lifts her banner high;
Myriads arming through the world,
Legions to the dust are hurled;
Earth may tremble at the shock,
We are founded on a Rock.

While the fires of passion burn,
Wait we for our Lord's return.
In the signs of earth and sky
We discern His advent nigh.
Soon the skies shall backward roll,
Earth shall shake from pole to pole,
Every eye shall plainly see
Christ, the Lamb of Calvary,
Judah's Lion, Mighty One,
Brighter than the noon-day sun,
Fairer than the golden dawn,
Passing through the gates of morn.
He shall burst the silent grave,
Backward roll the mountain wave;
From the dust his people bring,
In the likeness of their King.

Once he left his Father's throne,
Suffered on the earth alone,
Nailed to the accursed tree,
He hath died for you and me.
Low into the grave he sank,
Deep the cup of sorrow drank,
And uprising from the gloom,
Promising again to come,
Sought he then his native home.

Age on age hath rolled away,
Now we wait the promised day.
Lord, how long ere we shall see
Our Redemption come with thee?
We are waiting in the gloom,
In the shadows of the tomb,
In the morning, in the night,
In the darkness, in the light,
In the sunshine, in the shade,
All our hopes on Thee are laid;
Come! oh, must we wait in vain?
Come to bless the earth again,
Come to bind the bruised reed,
Come to bless our every need;
On that Hope we now repose,
Wait we Sharon's deathless Rose.

"Signs of the Times."

The following is from Dr. Cumming's work on the "Signs of the Times:"

"Let us glance briefly at some of the prominent and well-known dates, by way of introduction, as an approximate evidence of our place in the world. There is one great date in prophecy, repeated in different formulas, but in all substantially the same. We read of "time, times, and half a time;" or, 360 years, twice 360 years, and half of 360 years—making, when added up, 1260 years. We find the same date in another formula; as forty-two months, equal to 1260 prophetic days, or 1260 literal years. These prophetic days represent each of them a year; just as in a plan or a map an inch, or quarter of an inch, is made to represent a mile. We have distinct authority for this. In Num. 14: 34,—"After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." In Ezek. 4: 6,—"Thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days; I have appointed thee each day for a year." Thus prophecy contains its own plan—the measure of its own scale.

Now this period of 1260 years, thus alluded to in Scripture, is employed in every instance to denote the duration of a great apostasy that should overcast all the horizon of the West, and last throughout a period called in one place 1260 years; in another, forty-two months; in another, "time, times, and half a time." You will see that this is referred to in the following passages:—In Dan. 7: 25; "He shall speak great swelling words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they" [that is, the saints of the Most High] "shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time," —or 1260 years. Again, in Rev. 11: 3; "I will give power unto my two witnesses," [true christians] "and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth"—that is, depressed—i. e., 1260 years. The "witnesses in sackcloth" of St. John's Apocalypse, are the "saints worn out," or persecuted by the same apostasy referred to in Daniel, which is said to last 1260 years. I do not pause to identify this persecuting power with the Romish apostasy. This is almost universally accepted. The brands predicted in the prophecy are so fully developed by the Papacy, that dispute is barely possible. Indeed, the trouble to which mediæval monks and modern tractarians are put in getting rid of the almost universal interpretation, is something wonderful.

Having seen the duration of this apostasy, let us try to take a step further,—When did it begin? It is of no use to know the end of its life, unless we can ascertain the date of its birth. We find that the Emperor Justinian gave the Pope, in the year 532, not only spiritual jurisdiction, but civil power; in other words, constituted the great papal organization a politico-ecclesiastical power, and armed it with authority to enforce by the sword its rescripts, its laws, and its pretended obligations. I therefore date the commencement of the papal power, as fully organized, from the year 532; and if so, 1260 years added to that would bring us down to 1792, when history steps in to attest prophecy, and successive judgments begin to fall upon the Western Apostasy. Great convulsions then took place in every portion of Antichrist's dominions; all forces —infidel, political and christian—played against it; God's people began to emerge from the midst of it; and that part of the prophecy which still continues, came into its initial active operation,—"He shall consume it with the spirit of his mouth,"— while it is waiting to be utterly "destroyed by the brightness of his coming." From that era to this, the papal nations of Europe have been scourged, and Romanism wasted down to a shell, till it is rather a galvanized than a living thing. In France, it is a mere political tool; its hold on the great mass of the people is gone. In Italy, the higher priesthood is infidel. In Ireland, it is in its death-struggle. In England, its boasts, its glare and pretension, are signs of its exhaustion, not vitality. Just as the first wasting influences fell on the apostasy, the angel of the everlasting Gospel—that is, its various Missionary and Bible Societies, or, "the witnesses"—emerged from bondage, and were fully organized, with two previous exceptions, between 1793 and 1806.

The Resurrection of the Body.

The transformation of mortality into glory is one of those things of God which natural men never know or discern. Though surely, if nature teaches any religion it is the Christian—if she preaches any doctrine, it is the resurrection and the change. And were not the book of nature as well as that of grace, become a sealed book, what man that ever traveled with the earth through the vicissitudes of a year, could deny a resurrection? Ask the furrows of the field, and they shall tell thee. For "except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." The parts of the seed cannot spring forth afresh till they have been dissolved. It is true the husbandman soweth only bare grain, but it arises "clothed upon" with a beautiful verdure. And "if God so clothe the grass of the field," how much more shall he clothe the mortal body with a glorious body, O ye of little faith? But why need we take the compass of a year? Every twenty-four hours there is a rehearsal, in nature, of man's death and the resurrection. Every evening the day with its works dies into darkness and the shadow of death. All colors fade, all beauty vanishes; all labor and motion cease, and every creature veiled in darkness mourns, in solemn silence, the interment of the world. Who would not say, "It is dead— it shall not rise!" Yet wait, wait only a few hours in faith and patience, and this dead and entombed earth, by the agency of heaven upon it, shall burst asunder the bars of that sepulchral darkness in which it was imprisoned, and "rise and be enlightened, and its light shall come; the day-spring from on high shall visit it, and destroy the covering cast over all people," and array universal nature with a robe of glory and beauty, raising those that sleep, to behold themselves and the world changed from darkness to light, and calling them up to give glory to God and think of the resurrection.—Bishop Horne.

Silence at Home.

Let parents talk much and well at home. A father who is habitually in his own house, may be, in many respects, a wise man, but he is not wise in his silence. We sometimes see parents who are the life of every company which they enter, dull, silent, uninteresting at home, among the children. If they have not mental activity and mental stores sufficient for both, let him first provide for his own household. Ireland exports beef and wheat, and lives on potatoes; and they fare as poorly who reserve their social charms for companions abroad, and keep their dullness for home consumption. It is better to instruct children and make them happy at home, than it is to charm strangers or amuse friends. A silent house is a dull place for young people, a place from which they will escape if they can. They will talk or think of being "shut up" there: and the youth who does not love home is in danger. Make home then a cheerful and pleasant spot. Light it up with cheerful, instructive conversation. Father, mother, talk your best.—Sunday School Times.

Reading for Youth.

Wild Flowers.

One fine morning in June, three happy children, whose names were Anna, George, and Edmund, were playing in the fields. The birds were singing and the flowers were opening fast. The children ran joyfully from one bank to another to gather them. They thought of some hymns they had learned, speaking of the goodness of our heavenly Father, who clothes the grass of the field and makes all things richly for us to enjoy.

At length they said to each other, "Let each of us gather a bunch of our favorite wild flowers. We will run about separately, and meet there in the arbor." So they agreed, and soon they were all scattered about the field picking the fresh-blown flowers. They met at the arbor, each with a large handful, and began to tell the reasons for their choice.

George, the eldest, had chosen the violet. "It is called a very humble flower," he said; "it grows among moss and leaves, and is found where it is least looked for. But it smells sweetly, and every body likes it, and is glad to see it, and I love it better than any other flower." So saying, he gave some to his younger brother and sister.

Edmund had gathered some lilies of the valley. He said, "This delicate white flower grows in cool and shady spots, and its little buds look like strings of pearls hanging in clusters. It reminds us of the tender care of him who gives the lilies of the field their beauty; for they were mentioned once by him as a proof of God's care for the smallest and weakest of his creatures." Then he gave some to the other children, saying,

"The lilies of the field,
That quickly fade away,
May well to us a lesson yield,
Who die as soon as they."

It was now Anna's turn to speak. She was a kind, cheerful little girl, and she had chosen the blue forget-me-not. "Look, brothers," she said, "I found this pretty flower by the side of the brook. The blossoms shine like the stars in the sky, and you may see them reflected in the water. I have heard that this flower should teach us not to forget our friends, but to remember them with love and gratitude! so I have chosen it for my favorite, and I will give some to both of you."

So she divided them with the boys. She then proposed that they should all join their flowers together, and make two bouquets for their parents. They did so, and told their father and mother what they had been doing, and they were much pleased.

"Well, my children," said their father, "you have made a good choice,—humility, simplicity, and love. These flowers joined together seem still more beautiful than when separate; and thus you must try to improve in all that is right. These bouquets are more pleasing to us than crowns or jewels; not because of the value of the flowers, but because we know you give them with loving and affectionate hearts."— From the German.

Child's Hymn.

"I am thine, save me."—Ps. 119: 94.

Dear Savior, when my lips were sealed
In silence of mute infancy,
And only cries my wants revealed,
My parents gave me up to thee.
Thus I am thine; save me, I pray.

And when in childhood's early dawn
My life was opening like a flower,
Their prayers for me were heavenward borne
With holy, consecrating power.
Lord, I am thine; save me, I pray.

And now, that from thy Holy Word
I learn thy goodness and thy love,
I do desire to love thee, Lord.
Oh! draw my heart to thee, above,
And keep me thine; save me, I pray.

While still this promise is for me,
That they who early seek shall find,
I do yield up my all to thee,—
Myself in thy sweet service bind;
Forever thine, save me, I pray.

Praying with Little Children.

A father said that he remembered his father taking him into a room alone, and kneeling down and praying with him. Farther back than that he could remember nothing. But that prayer, though he was a very little child, he well remembered, and he often thought that he owed all his hopes of salvation to the fact that he remembered nothing beyond that prayer. It made an indelible impression on his mind. "It was forty years ago," said he, "that I heard that prayer, back of which my memory can not run. My father is dead and gone; but here I stand a witness for God, that he hears and answers prayer. And I beg of you, fathers, pray with your little children, not in the family merely, but pray with and for them alone, and the Father who heareth in secret will reward you openly."

Little Frank.

Little Frank is three years old, and has always heard his father ask a blessing at the table. One evening his father was absent at tea-time, and when Frank came to the table he looked around a moment, and then said:

"Mamma, put your hands up to your face."

Then, covering his eyes with his little round hand, he said grace, in the following original and laconic manner:—

"Tank the Lord. I eat my supper and go to bed."

May he and all our readers always truly feel this thankful and contented spirit.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$2.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	.50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	22.00

By this above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

The Sinner's Inquiry.

BY VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

AIR.—Dying Californian.

Watchman, in that golden city
Is there still an open door?
Will the blessed Master pity
One that's wasted all his store?
Yes! the prodigal returning,
Always makes the angels sing;
Day and night its gates stand open,
Haste! and freely enter in.

Watchman, I so long have scorned Him,
That I fear the blessed One,
With the dazzling seraphs round him,
Will my worthless name disown.
Do not fear, a fountain flowing,
All exhaustless, still shall shed
Mercy drops, with pure love glowing
On thy poor, unworthy head.

Watchman, I'm so weak and doubting,
That I hardly dare to pray,
Would I had some blessed daysman,
That could open me the way.
You have one, the blessed Savior,
On his bosom freely lean;
God will grant you every favor,
In his Son's most worthy name.

Watchman, lo! my sun is setting,
And my life is scarce begun;
Oh! how vain this wild regretting,
For my transient race is run.
I would live if but to suffer—
Must I pass the chilling flood?
'Tis enough, I hear Him whisper—
"I've redeemed thee" with my blood.

Farewell! watchman, home is nearing,
Though I sink beneath the wave,
Brother, I'm no longer fearing,
Christ will bring me from the grave:
One glad victor more will meet thee,
One more voice the song shall swell,
One more friendly hand shall greet thee,
Where they never say farewell.

Honor due to Messiah.

"I honor my Father, and ye do dishonor me."—JOHN 8: 49.

The nature of Jesus Christ, as "the author of eternal salvation," has been made the cause of much contention among men; being esteemed as the "Son of God," and partaking of the divine, God-like nature of the Father, by those who have received his Spirit and are taught of God, and worshiped by such, as God with the Father, in association with him in creation and redemption; yet regarded by others as possessing only the nature of man and as man begotten of God, who, when in the flesh, was accused of being man and having a devil; to which he replied, "I have not a devil, but I honor my Father, and ye do dishonor me." Jesus said, "I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. Why do ye not understand my speech? Even because ye cannot hear my word."

The misapprehension of the God-like nature of the Messiah is a fruitful source of irreverence towards Christ, and fails to produce a just appreciation of the honor due him as the Son of God and Redeemer of man. In view of which well might he say,—"Ye do dishonor me." Again he said, "I came forth from the Father and am come into the world: again, I leave the world and go to the Father. His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb."—John 26: 28. If the disciples were correct in their understanding of Christ's teachings, that he did not use any proverb or parable, then the conclusion is a just one, that when Christ left the world and went to the Father, he returned to where he was before he left the Father and came into the world. As he had before said, "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?"—John 6: 62.

Jesus, in personifying the bread of life that came down from heaven, instructed his disciples that he himself would return to heaven where he was before, and that they would be dependent on the Spirit, with the assurance that the words he spoke unto them were "spirit and life." If Jesus returned to the Father where he was before, when was Christ before with the Father? Let the Word decide. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: the same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made."—John 1: 1—3.

In the record of the work of creation as given in the book of Genesis, we read that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, etc. But in the brief history of creation, God is simply denominated the creator, without specifying the agencies used in the work of creation. One agency was Jesus Christ, of whom it is affirmed that "all things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." The same is affirmed by Paul in several instances. To the Hebrews he writes: "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things. By whom also he made the worlds."—Heb. 1: 1, 2. Again. Said Paul, "Unto me is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ."—Eph. 3: 8, 9.

No language can be more positive and none more conclusive than the apostle here uses, that God, though properly denominated the creator, did create all things by Jesus Christ, who was the beginning of the creation of God; but in relation to which the apostle declares there is a mystery, which from the beginning of the world had been hid in God, to which mystery by the aid of inspiration the apostle has given us a key, to wit, "Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory."—1 Tim. 3: 16. The same God that was manifest in the flesh, etc., was received up into glory, which is corroborative of Paul to the Phil. 2: 6,—"Who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took on him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men." When was he in the form of God? Before he took on him the form of a servant, was the Son of God by creation, in the form of God; and was made of the seed of David according to the flesh and took upon him the form of a servant. But if we fail to comprehend the nature or practicability of the change, shall we ignore the miraculous power of the Almighty? Let us honor the Son even as we honor the Father. "For he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father which hath sent him."

"If a Man Die, shall he Live Again?"

What a momentous question! Shall he live again after he has returned to dust? Shall bone come to his bone? Shall he spring to life again? or will he always suffer the extreme penalty of the law,—"Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return"? Will he always dwell in that place of darkness and silence? Is there no hope to cheer, no bright star to arise, no morn to dawn; only one long night, with no ray of light beaming on the horizon? How gloomy such thoughts! Where shall we look for help? To man? Oh no! for his breath goeth forth, his thoughts perish. But to the unerring Word, whose sure promises are, "Thy dead men shall live;" "I will show thee the path of life;" "They that sleep in the dust shall come forth;" "I will bring them again from the land of the enemy." The sceptic says these promises never will be realized. Stop, one moment. The way of life has been made known to us. Let us look at it.

Follow me up the mountain where that scene was enacted, which caused the sun to hide, and all nature to convulse. Amid the upheaving earth, the rending rocks, the opening graves, and the shrieks of the affrighted, and the reviling Jews,—amid all these scenes we hear a voice saying, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit." Then we see his body conveyed away and laid in the tomb. Is our hope lost? No; for He said, "I will rise again." Let us follow those women as they go early one morning down to the place of the dead. Hear them talk about embalming the body, but with sorrow in their hearts. They seemed to be troubled about the stone, for they said, "Who shall roll away the stone for us?" But to their joyful surprise the stone was removed, yet he who had been crucified was not there; but they saw two shining ones within, and they ask them whom they sought. "Jesus of Nazareth," was the reply. Oh the answer they received! What joy fills their hearts,—"Why seek ye the living among the dead? he is not here, but is risen." What a hope is preached to the world in those words! What glory beams upon fallen man! What light shines from that cave! No wonder when Peter heard of it he broke out in that soul-cheering strain, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." It is a lively hope, for then was life and immortality brought to light.

Now we see that great question answered—"If a man die, shall he live again?" We know that He has made known unto us the way of life. With this knowledge, no wonder that the Apostle Paul spoke with that confidence to be steadfast and unmovable, knowing his labor was not in vain. No wonder he said to the Hebrew brethren, "The God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, the great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will." When he found the advantage of living again, who wonders at his fighting with beasts or anything else?

Peter also speaks of a time of restitution when the Chief Shepherd shall appear. James speaks of those rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom. So it seems that all the inspired writers spoke of a time when men should be brought back again from the dust, and stand upon their feet an exceeding great army; and not only this but there is a blessing pronounced upon those who should be found worthy to obtain that world, and have a part in the first resurrection. That blessing is immortality and eternal life. And they shall not be hurt with the second death. Thus by all the testimony that I can glean, man shall live again. What a hope if we lay these bodies down, they will rise again at the last day! for by man came death; by man came also the resurrection from the dead. "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Letter to the Church.

BRO. GRANT:—As an expression from me at this time may be demanded by some, and being full of thoughts, I will write a communication through the Crisis, explaining my situation, and seeming neglect of the flock over which I have been appointed shepherd during the last six months. At the Conference held last October, after organizing a "Conference District," etc., I was appointed Evangelist to preach throughout the District for the year to come. Having entered the field in good faith, I have continued to preach to the best of my ability up to the present. Have been wonderfully blest from time to time in presenting the evidences of the Lord's speedy coming and its kindred doctrines, to about thirty-five in regular standing among us, with as many more in the Christian church of the same faith, and a goodly number of outsiders, over which we have, as a christian body, our share of influence, the effect of which will be better known in the finale of the history of this world, which is near at hand. Have eight regular appointments, which number I tried to fill severally once in two weeks, but for want of a horse was compelled to forego my week-day appointments; for according to my plan I was obliged to travel nearly two hundred miles every four weeks. The brethren proposed obtaining a horse for my purpose, but for the want of means, in consequence of the failure of crops, the pressure of the times, or a want of faith and zeal, or all combined, I am still without that necessary equipage, as I am not of a strong constitution. Perhaps the former reasons should be foremost, in our exercise of charity, although the broad fields and bending forests of some of the brethren show that they do not look for the Lord to come in their day, if he should come in a generation or two hence.

We have had our first and second Quarterly Conferences, both of which were thinly attended, so much so that there was no business transacted at either, for want of a sufficient number to form a quorum. Without an exception, there seems to be a strong desire on the part of brethren in every place where we preach to hear the truth, when it is carried to their doors; but beyond this, there is a lack of faith and works sufficient to stop the mouths of our enemies that we are weak, uninfluential, and inconsistent, and to serve the cause as faithfully as is our privilege and duty to do, between this and our Master's coming. For we of all people should be the most foremost to preach, pray, sacrifice and labor in every conceivable way to spread the truths we profess.

I regret that I am compelled at this late hour of harvest to quit the field and turn my hand to some employment that will secure me the necessaries of life. Not that I am ungrateful for favors received, no, no! for the brethren who have contributed to my wants have my thanks, both for this and the confidence they have reposed in me while trying to fill so responsible a station. Although I have received in the last six months four times the amount that I received for nearly eight years (except last year) of occasional labor in the vineyard of the Lord, yet the amount would not, I think, more than board me during said time, at the rate of twelve shillings per week. Then who feeds my family and clothes us (four in all), without which we cannot live?

Yes, brethren, I must retire from the field, not to ease, but to meet some obligations against me, because it is due my creditors and to save from reproach the cause I profess, as well as my own personal reputation as a minister of the gospel. I had hoped, at the commencement of the present year, that with what I could find to do, together with the liberality of brethren, I should be able to keep myself in the field, and labor with my might, the Lord directing, for the salvation of sinners, and the consolation of the church.

In conclusion I will say, that we are, amid these discouraging circumstances, making some progress in the truth, and striving, though feebly, to enter the kingdom. Brethren, of this section and everywhere, be faithful, pray much, ask God to direct you, and act, for time is short between this and the solemn scenes of the judgment.

Resolutions.

Lord, in thy strength will I renew
The covenant I made;
The path of duty I'll pursue,
My vows shall all be paid.

Here, take my heart and make it thine,
O! cleanse me from all sin;
Then, Holy Spirit, Love divine,
Come, thou, and dwell within.

I'll choose the path that leads to bliss,
Nor heed the thorns that grow;
My Savior knew more cares than this,
And he will lead me through.

[From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

For every system of theology, and for every style of interpretation, we may discover a key note, which can be expressed in one or more passages of Scripture. The doctrine of unending misery forms no exception to the rule. And though it is a delicate matter for one who dissents to select a key-note passage, still we shall venture to offer such an one, for very special reasons. We give the following, which is often cited, and as it is commonly quoted:—

2 Cor. 5: 11; "Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men."

If the reader will turn to the abridged edition of Cruden's Concordance, which is most likely the one he has, he will find under the word "persuade" the word "terrors" printed as above. And he has heard it thus quoted so often, that he may think it no error when he sees it. But his English Bible gives the word only in the singular number—"terror." The prevalent opinion has created the plural form, as also in another phrase, "future punishments," which can be traced back to the time when the soul began to be called immortal, about A. D. 200, and no further.

But not only is the passage commonly misquoted—we believe that it is even more seriously mistranslated. The Greek word phobos, rendered "terror" only in this instance, properly denotes fear, and is so translated generally. And the same phrase, "the fear of the Lord," occurs in thirty other passages in the Scriptures, besides the equivalent expressions, "the fear of God," "fear the Lord," etc., used over a hundred times. And in nearly all these instances the "fear" is not objective, i. e., it does not refer to the fearfulness of an offended God; but it is subjective, denoting a sentiment in the heart of man. And the sentiment is rarely that of alarm, but commonly the filial fear of reverence and piety. Thus in the same epistle, ch. 7: 1, Paul speaks of "perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord" (Acts 9: 31); "The fear of the Lord is his treasure" (Isa. 33: 6); "The fear of the Lord prolongeth days" (Prov. 10: 27); also Job 28: 28; Ps. 19: 9; 111: 10, etc. Now when Paul said, "Knowing therefore the fear of the Lord, we persuade men," the fear was almost certainly his own feeling, and that was certainly not one of terror. His allusion to the judgment of Christ (ver 10) indicates the same contrast that is made in Gal. 1. 10: "For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men?" Paul was wont to "persuade men" as one who was not afraid, but in that noble fear which quells all terror and alarm.

Offering this correction of a false key note, we proceed to examine the passages the misinterpretation of which, we think, has created the unscriptural "terrors."

Ps. 83: 17; "Let them be confounded and troubled forever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish."

The Hebrew here reads, "for ever and ever," and Vulgate, "conturbentur in sæculum sæculi." There is quite as much here to suggest the notion of eternal sorrow as in some of the passages adduced to support that view—quite as much to give the word perish a metaphorical sense, and give life to the lost in the world to come. If we take the words literally and strictly they describe such a doom as really as the passage in Rev. 20: 10. Euthymius thus applies it: "He is said to perish in the world to come, not who so perishes as to be no more, but who endures those punishments the sufferers of which are said to perish." And Calvin: "Here he (the Psalmist) plainly imprecates their everlasting destruction." But Patrick explains: "This is the worst we wish them, notwithstanding their enmity to us; that they may be so astonished and confounded at their defeat, as never to recover any courage to assault us; nay, together with their credit and their courage, quite lose their power to give us any farther trouble." Holden remarks: "Let them be totally frustrated in their designs and expectations, and suddenly seized with the most terrible alarming fears and panics; bring the greatest reproach upon them and complete destruction." And Poole: "But those of them that will not humble themselves before thee, let them be utterly destroyed." The eternity is that of effect; of which hereafter. And the passage shows that the burning of "wood" and "stubble" (vs. 13. 14) is no symbol of an uncomsuming destruction. On the term rendered "wheel" (ver. 13,) see Dr. Thompson's work, "The Land and the Book," II. 327, 358.

Isa. 33; 14: "The sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites. Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?"

A Lapide gives upon this passage the most immense and terrific estimate of misery for ages heaped on ages that we have ever seen. But Jerome, Jarchi, and others so far differ from this interpretation that they answer the question, "Who shall dwell?" etc,, from the next verse: "He that walketh uprightly," etc. De Lyra, Zwingli, Pellicanus, and Vitringa explain those words, uttered by "hypocrites," as being also hypocritical words, or a feint of humility and unfitness to minister before Him who is a consuming fire." And Vitringa, Poole, and others remark that the Hebrew term lanu, rendered "among us," more properly denotes for us. Kimchi, Vatablus, and Grotius understand the "fire" and "burnings" of the devastations caused by the Assyrian army.

We think that interpretation best sustained which refers the dreaded flames to the divine judgments upon the Assyrians. The words are doubtless those of unbelieving Jews who had advised ungodly alliances with the surrounding nations, and who are now terror-stricken at the dangers that impend. When God appears to deliver the nation, they cannot claim him as their God—he may be their enemy. In this same chapter the Assyrian host is represented as awaiting a sudden and utter destruction: "Now will I arise, saith the Lord; now will I be exalted; now will I lift up myself. Ye shall conceive chaff; ye shall bring forth stubble; your breath, as fire, shall devour you. And the people shall be as burnings of lime; as thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire" (vs. 10–12.) This had been already foretold in ch. 27: 4. "Fury is not in me [i. e. I am no longer angry with my people.] Who will set the briers and thorns against me in battle? I would go through them; I would burn them together." See also ver. 11, and ch. 10: 16–18. The prophecy appears as history in ch. 37: 36; "Then the angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and four score and five thousand; and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses." According to the custom of eastern nations these bodies should be burned. And on the phrase "burnings of lime" it is remarked by Dr. Alexander that "the same word burnings is applied to the aromatic fumigations used at ancient burials (Jer. 34: 5) [i. e. in the funeral pyre,] to which there may be some allusion here. The ideas expressed are those of quickness and intensity. The thorns are perhaps described as cut up, to suggest that they are dry, and therefore more combustible."

The prophet aptly describes the alarm produced by this display of God's power, in those who know not him as their deliverer. "Who among us," they exclaim, "shall dwell with (this) devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with (these) perpetual burnings?" Thus Dr. Alexander renders the passage, with whom agree Luther, Vitringa, Le Clerc, Matthew Henry, Lowth.

Thus by orthodox writers the words are fully explained, and their proper import is satisfied, from the scenes of time. Some of these writers think they contain also an allusion to, or a type of, a never consuming fire in eternity. But there are two objections to this: 1. That which consumes cannot typify the unconsuming. 2. The supposed allusion would explain not a single word, and such an extension of the meaning would prove nothing; it would be wholly gratuitous. If such a sense is found in other passages, the proof of it here would still be wanting.

If, however, we take the passage as portraying the final doom of the lost,—the first and second death combined in one,—a parallel passage would be found in Rev. 6: 17; "The great day of His wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" And until it is shown that the spirit will not fail before God's frown, we must infer any thing but immortality.

Isa. 66: 24; "And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Mark 9: 43, 44; "And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than, having two hands, to go into hell (gehenna), into the fire that never shall be quenched; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

Here it should be remarked that the passage in Mark is slightly colored in our translation. The phrase, to pur to asbeston, is precisely the same with that in Matt. 3: 12, and Luke 3: 17, rendered "unquenchable fire;" the sense of which is, a raging fire that cannot be subdued; as we propose to show. To call it a "fire that never shall be quenched," is to mistake the nature designated, and to assume an endless duration of the fire.

Again, the three-fold repetition of the last clause in the entire passage in Mark (vs. 43–48), is sometimes regarded as a solemnity of warning not required if utter extinction is the doom described. Without conceding that point, it should be stated that the manuscripts show various readings, and there is doubtless more or less interpolation. Mr. Green, in his "Developed Criticism," gives the following opinion in the case: "The clause 'where their worm dieth not,' etc., may be safely discarded from the first and second places, and 'into the unquenchable fire' from the second. Great doubt must necessarily attach to the latter in the first place also, from the amount of variation which occurs there, and its glossarial appearance." See also Tischendorf, who rejects vs. 44, 46, as spurious.

But we would not even seem to deprecate the repetition of the phrase in question, and will proceed to inquire what it means. As used in Mark's Gospel, it is evidently taken from Isaiah; and the words, by their own force, can prove no more in the one case than in the other. If they properly signify, or imply, immortality in the New Testament, they will do the same in the Old Testament; for the words are identical, and in them the argument must rest.

But it is of "carcasses," (kola) that Isaiah says, "their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched." The expression, then, proves the immortality of carcasses if it proves the immortality of the lost. If the expression itself is relied on, and if there is any consistency in logic, we do not see how this result can be avoided. And, as a matter of fact, precisely this result was accepted in the earliest orthodox use of the phrase which we have found. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with the Jew Trypho, says: "We have learned from Esaias that the carcasses of those that have transgressed shall be devoured by the worm and by the unceasing fire, remaining immortal that they may be a spectacle to all flesh" (c. 130).* But the idea of an immortal corpse is absurd, and the argument proves too much. That is, it proves no immortality whatever. Rather, as worms and fire utterly consume a dead body, so, if the antitype be true to the type, the two passages furnish the liveliest picture and the strongest proof of the utter extinction of the lost. And we might here waive all inquiry into the origin of the phrase, and leave the argument as the Scriptures must generally be left,—to the English reader with his referenced Bible. And this the more readily as nothing is said in Mark of the soul, especially as if the worm might be that of conscience; but the fire of gehenna is evidently the same with the agency which can "destroy both soul and body" (Matt. 10; 28); and in the similar passage in Matt. 5: 29, 30, the contrast is made between the loss of a member and the casting of the whole body into gehenna; and both in Mark and in Matt. 18: 8, 9, the contrast is between "entering into life" halt or maimed, and the fire of gehenna. The practical argument is plainly this: it were better to save one's life at last, even with the loss of a limb, than to lose body, soul and all.

* On the opinions of Justin Martyr, see Debt and Grace, pp. 312-318, where we think the statement of Gieseler will be found fully warranted, that "Justin appears to regard it as possible that the souls of the ungodly will at some time be wholly annihilated." (Dogmengeschichte, § 45.) To the other passages there cited we may here add that although he reckons the immortality of the soul as a doctrine common to philosophy and Christianity, (Cohort. ad. Græcos, c. 5), yet he says: "We have learned that they only are made immortal who live piously and virtuously before God." (Apologia I., c. 21.)

But we may judge what value should be attached to any opinion of Justin, from the following passage in Jerome: "About this time (A. D. 126-130) Aristides, a philosopher from the schools of Athens, presented to the Emperor Hadrian an Apology for persecuted Christians; and we are told that he not only retained his philosophic garb and profession, but that he also introduced his philosophic opinions in his book, which was afterwards imitated by Justin Martyr." (De Viris Illust., c. 20; Ep. 83, ad Magnum.)

Peace in Christ.

From the tumult of earthly strife, from the tempests of earthly sorrow, from the storms of earthly adversity, and from the intoxication of earthly joy, the believer flies away and seeks for peace in Christ. Here is refuge from the storm,—his covert from the tempest, his high tower and the rock of his strength. Here the heart reposes in confidence and in peace. The billows break in vain upon this rock. The strife of tongues,—"the sharp arrows of the mighty with coals of juniper," burning and tormenting, fall harmlessly about us. He is safe. He is in Christ.

Man of earth, are you there? Are you on the rock? Are you in the hiding place? Have you fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before you in the Savior? O, there cometh a storm when, not merely earth's shipping and earth's dwellings will be tried, but when thy hope and trust must stand the test. Are you ready for it? Can you meet adversity, and bereavement, and affliction? Can you smile at poverty and pain? Very well;—can you face DEATH? Can you listen to the rattling of his glittering spear and not be afraid? Has death no terrors for thee? The coffin and the winding sheet, the sepulchre and the worm, corruption and rottenness,—hast thou no fear of their loathsome coming? The worm that shall feed so sweetly on you when death shall have dominion over you; and all the dread pollutions of the grave, are there no terrors in these? Very well. After death the judgment! You must meet that—the thundering trumpet, the archangel's voice—the opening graves—the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust!—the great white throne, the burning flames—the awful sentence—can you admire all this? And then the second death—the lake of fire and brimstone—the place of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth—the graves of earthly hopes—the end of earthly joy,—can you meet all these? Is your heart harder than the nether millstone? Is your brow like burnished brass? can your hands be strong—can your heart endure in the day when God shall deal with you in justice and in might?

If not, you need to find peace in Christ. You need a refuge from the storm, or covert from the tempest. You may have it. Will you seek it? Will you seek it now, before it is too late? Will you not be reasonable and seek now the salvation of the Lord? Will you not take your stand upon the rock of strength? The waves of coming wrath are gathering in awful power; will you not then seek to escape before escape becomes impossible? You have reason—will you not use it? You have common sense—will you not exercise it? Is it reasonable to remain unmoved when salvation is offered? Is it reasonable to perish when you may escape? Is it reasonable to sink in the lake of fire when you may "mount up on wings as eagles," and dwell in all the light of heaven? Is is reasonable to trifle now, and wail and mourn at last? Is it reasonable to choose death instead of life, sorrow instead of joy, wrath instead of blessing, despair instead of peace, and perdition instead of salvation? Will you not then be reasonable? Will you not seek to know the Lord, and share his love? Will you not find peace in Christ? Behold, then, the Lamb of God! Look to thy bruised and smitten Savior! Confess his name. Believe with all your heart on him. Accept him as your refuge and your trust; cling to him with a grasp which can never be unclasped! There you are safe. There you have peace! There you need fear no evil. In Christ we are safe; out of him we are in constant peril.

O man of earth, will you have this refuge for your rest? Will you now accept the proffered blessing? Will you now cast all your cares upon the Savior's breast? will you fly for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before you? Behold now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. Now you may find a refuge where no wave of coming wrath can e'er assail. Now you may find in Christ, peace, deep, unsearchable and eternal. Will you find it? Behold thy rest! Hasten to it, and, standing in its hallowed precincts, invite a lost and perishing race to share it with you. O, prove the deep experience of that peace which is "like a river," which allies the heart to the eternal and the unchangeable, the Almighty one! Then lead the world to share the blessings you enjoy. Plead with the perishing—win them away from sinful pleasure—call them to sublimer joys than earth can ever give. Then, when the last storm of sorrow shall roll its broken clouds away, when the last surge of tribulation shall heave your tossing bark—when the last flood of woe shall forever subside, then you shall sing by the river of life, and dwell in the city of the Lord, and know through all eternity the endless blessedness of peace in Christ. Reader, may you and I eternally know this everlasting peace!

For the Crisis.

The Day of Trouble,

Is coming speedily. Preparations of enormous magnitude are being made with untiring vigor. Startling events of the past few years have awakened the dreamy world to a startled consciousness of yet greater scenes to occur hereafter. "Progress" is the cry of the world. "There's a good time coming," say the Spiritualists; and other deluded classes take up the chorus, and swell the echoes afar. It is strange that people can be so blind as to refuse to look about them. They are sailing on the stormy ocean, with every sail set. They heed not the flashing lightnings that glitter through the pent up storm clouds of darkness. They turn deaf to the howling tempest of vengeance, driven by retributive justice over the foaming billows. They close their eyes to the "breakers ahead" where the billows leap mountain high flinging the white spray to the winds. They close their ears to the cry of those on the look-out, and fancy themselves far out on the ocean with plenty of sea-room, and perfectly safe, and will not consult the chart to ascertain where they are, nor listen to those who do—nor look at the signs of the swiftly advancing tempest, which nears them on the wings of the wind; and they even smile as the advancing puffs of the coming tornado shriek hoarsely in their ears, dreaming their craft will weather the gale. Poor mortals! When their commander gives the cry, "All hands on deck," their ship is on the breakers—the scorching lightnings dance down the rigging—the hailstorm dashes upon them—the deafening roar of the hurricane's blast fills them with terror, and the combined thunders of ages join the mad chorus of their death-song—destruction is their doom, and every soul is lost.

Yes, tremendous events are yet to come, and what has occurred will be but a spark of fire to the coming conflagration. Dreams of peace will vanish. Hopes of future grandeur and earthly prosperity, never be realized. The nations are sowing the winds to reap the whirlwind. The earth will resound to fearful notes of carnage. The flash of musketry, and thunder of artillery will disturb the house of quietness. And the ocean, too, will be a scene of conflict, such as never was, judging of what may follow from that which is preparing, of which the following account will convey some ideas:

The Navies of the World.—It seems that a ship of the line, to be plated with steel, to measure three hundred feet in length, with an iron spur thirty feet long projecting from her bows, and to be propelled at a great velocity by engines of 1200 horses' power, has just been laid down in the dock-yard at Cherbourg. If we look around, we find France is relying very much upon plated ships of war; but, independent of these novelties, the steam fleet of Napoleon III. has made great strides during the past six years, and now assumes formidable dimensions. The Russian navy, again, now numbers forty-two sail of the line in the Baltic, which will soon be converted into a screw fleet. The minor navies of Holland, Sweden, Denmark and the United States, are all in a state of conversion and progression. And if we add to these the steam navy of Great Britain, now, fortunately, equal to the navies of France and Russia combined, and then recall the changes that political events have produced in the maratime States of Europe, we may infer that the sea will become the theatre of events more important and decisive than any yet witnessed.—Army and Navy Gazette.

Thus, look where we will on earth, we see preparations for a mighty conflict. The spirit of war and destruction seems awakened. The world don't go right. Its machinery is out of order, and grows worse and worse. Turn to the Bible, and it tells of just such a condition as now is. It speaks, too, of a better state of things,—of a King to rule righteously, when never more will war and desolation be; nor sorrow's tears, nor weariness, but everlasting ages of perfect bliss. There may we assemble and be with Him who loves us.

Controversy Indispensable to the Cause of Reform.

An article appeared some time since in the "Anti-Lancet," the organ of the Penn. Medical College, over the signature of "J. E. K.," saying "We do not expect to make battle for truth against the antiquated errors and hoary dogmas of authoritative medicine, without exciting some manifestations of feeling from those most deeply interested in their perpetuation."

He again says, "Without controversy there can be no progress. Steam, galvanism, gas and the electric telegraph had forever remained unknown to the world but for controversy. The simple announcement of a great and important truth is not sufficient to secure public attention. It must be arrayed against the error it is designed to oppose, and controversy must ensue.

The reformers in medicine, politics, or religion, cannot expect to succeed without conflict. The authority of ages with the accumulated prejudices and prepossessions of bigots, we may expect to be against vital truths. This, reformers of all classes must anticipate. Their success depends upon a warfare against the errors of their opponents. Controversy—discussion is the presage of their triumph; the life and prosperity of their cause. The dungeon of the Holy Inquisition did not arrest the great truths proclaimed by Galileo; nor did the walls of a prison prevent Martin Luther from exposing the gross errors and iniquities of the church of Rome. To this bold and fearless controversy may the Protestants ascribe their triumph over the antiquated errors and hoary dogmas of Catholicism. It is said that even the pious Luther on one occasion, when advised by some of his friends not to attend a certain ecclesiastical convention lest his opponents might cause him to receive insult or injury, retorted upon his advisers by saying, 'Go!' said he, 'I will go if there are as many devils between here and there as there are tiles on the roofs of the houses.' Such have been the characteristics of all great reformers. Energy and indomitable perseverance have crowned their names with honor and their efforts with undying renown."

A Correction.

In an announcement of my book on "Christ our Life," three or four weeks ago, I remarked that it contains some of the facts which I have given occasionally through the Crisis. I find one or two persons who suppose that I refer to my articles on materialism; and there may be others who understood my allusion in the same way. But this is a mistake. Two or three lines in the book show that I am not a materialist, and that is all. My allusion was to those facts I told respecting "Two kinds of Eternal Life"; "Curious Etymologies"; "Asbestos Again," etc., which were wholly aside from my discussion of the nature of the soul. If any think I believe in ghosts, they need not fear trouble from them in reading the book.

Theodore Parker's Library.

The library of the late Theodore Parker still stands as he left it. The books will not be transferred to the Public Library of Boston (to which he bequeathed them) probably before thirty days. His collection does not number 30,000 volumes, as the newspapers have reported, but only about 17,000. More than half of this great bulk, or about 10,000 volumes, are arranged on close shelves, reaching from floor to ceiling, occupying the entire upper story of his house. This was his work-room, or study, in which he prepared his sermons and numerous lectures and reviews.

His writing-desk, with his crowded portfolio lying upon it, and with a huge and blotted inkstand near, have not been stirred from the position in which he left them. His hat and coat hang in their accustomed places. His easy-chair seems waiting for its occupant to return. On one side of his desk has usually stood a small Parian figure of Christ, and sometimes on the other a similar figure of Spartacus—representing, as he used to say, Religious and civil Liberty. Behind his chair hangs a little black frame inclosing an autograph of Thomas Simms, the fugitive slave. The old muskets, which formerly hung in the doorway, and which were relics of his grandfather, and interesting as having been the first trophies taken from the British in the war of the Revolution, were removed by Mr. Parker himself, before leaving Boston, and placed in the State House for safe keeping.

The parlor, which is on the second floor, contains about 1,000 volumes. On the wall is Cheney's crayon drawing of Parker's head, taken several years ago, and shortly before the artist's death. The eyes have a singularly intelligent, penetrating, and spiritual expression.

Every room in the house is more or less occupied with the overflow of books. Even the bath-room has its crowded shelves.

Mr. Parker's library, in point of size, is not so large as that of Edward Everett or or George Ticknor, both in Boston. But it is not a little singular that of the 17,000 volumes of which it is composed, scarcely more than 3,000 are in the English language! Mr. Parker's plan in collecting books was to buy only such as were not generally to be found in public libraries. He was a ready reader of twenty different languages, and could pilot his way through five more. The first volume which he ever owned still lies near his writing-desk. It was a small copy of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, which he bought when he was a boy, and paid for by picking whortleberries at three cents a quart. He knew the exact position of every book on his shelves, and was master of their contents, even including prefaces, appendices, and foot-notes. He was an incessant student, whose over-study broke down his constitution, and brought him to the grave in the prime of life.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JUNE 20, 1860.

The Destruction of the Wicked.

No. 3.

"What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?"—1 Pet. 4: 17.

"Whose end is destruction."—Phil. 3: 19.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

V. The positive testimony of the Bible that the wicked shall finally and eternally cease to be, demonstrates the certainty of the TOTAL EXTINCTION OF THEIR BEING.

As the wicked are to be punished upon the earth, and the meek are to inherit it after it is made new; at which time "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth" will be "heard, saying blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever;" there must of necessity be an end to the wicked. That end is not in conversion and restoration to the favor of God, but their "end is destruction."

Having ascertained where the wicked are to be punished, we would dwell a moment on the time when they are to be executed. We have already seen that the Bible teaches plainly that they are not punished till after the judgment, which is not till after they come out of hades; hence, they are not now being punished.

Peter says, "the heavens and earth which are now are kept in store, reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men."—2 Pet. 3: 7. This Scripture shows us that the existence of the wicked terminates in the event that results in the new earth, which becomes the abode of the meek. Apolia, the word here rendered perdition, is defined by Donnegan as follows: "perdition, ruin, destruction, death." It is from apollumi, "to destroy totally."

Corresponding with Peter, we read in Malachi, "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."—Mal 4: 1.

It is certain that no such day is in the past, for the proud and wicked have been abundant ever since the days of Malachi. But when the great burning day comes, "all the proud and all that do wickedly" are to be burnt up like stubble. In harmony with this the Savior says, "As, therefore, the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world."—Matt. 13: 41. If the wicked were to burn eternally, and never be consumed, why not compare them to pure silver or gold, that might endure the fire, instead of "stubble" and "tares?" But in case there were no consumption, there would be no suffering. Could we be put into fire and not burn, like Shadrach, Meshech and Abednego, we should be unharmed. But David says, "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more."—Psa. 104: 35. Again he says, "the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs, they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away."—Ps. 37: 20.

Says Dr. Clark, "This verse has given the critics some trouble. If we follow the Hebrew, it intimates that they shall consume as the fat of lambs; that is, as the fat of lambs is wholly consumed in sacrifices, by the fire on the altar, so shall they consume away in the fire of God's wrath."

We find but one such time named in the Scriptures, and that is yet future, as is clearly shown by the Savior and Peter. All this goes to prove that the wicked are not now being punished, and will not be till after the judgment, when they will be destroyed totally, and cease to exist as men. Paul says, those "that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, shall be punished with everlasting destruction;" or as the wise man expresses it, they "shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."—Prov. 29: 1. This cuts off all hope of restoration after long periods have passed. Restoration would be a remedy, or release from destruction.

Says David, "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed forever."—Ps. 92: 7. Hengstenberg remarks on this passage: "The annihilation of the wicked comes into notice as the basis of the deliverance of the righteous, which is the proper theme of this Psalm."

Gad, the word rendered forever in Ps. 92: 7, is defined by Gesenius, "perpetual time, eternity." Parkhurst defines it—"time onward, futurity, eternity to come." The same word occurs in Isa. 9: 6, and is rendered "everlasting:" "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." This word occurs again in Ps. 45: 6, and denotes the duration of the throne of God: "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever." The word eternity occurs but once in the Bible, and is then translated from this word: "Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy."—Isa. 57: 15. Hence the passage under consideration proves the wicked will be eternally destroyed.

Before examining further testimony in favor of the destruction of the wicked, we will notice the most weighty objections against our proposition. It is certain that the Bible does not teach opposites on this subject. When rightly understood, it is either all in favor of eternal conscious suffering, or of eternal destruction.

One of the strong texts, which is urged in favor of eternal misery is, Mark 9: 44, where the wicked are represented as being cast into an unquenchable fire. The argument is, if the fire is unquenchable, they must burn eternally, but will never burn up. It is a well known fact that this illustration of the punishment of the wicked was taken from the gehenna fire, or fire in the valley of Hinnom, where the Jews burnt up their filth. They never cast anything into that fire for preservation, but invariably for consumption. Fire always purifies or consumes that upon which it acts. If it does neither, it has no effect upon the body cast into it. The wicked are not cast into the unquenchable fire for purification; hence they must be consumed by its action, or, like the three worthies in the fiery furnace, be unharmed. If an object susceptible of being affected by fire is cast into one that is unquenchable, it must be taken out, or the fire quenched, otherwise it will be burned up.

Let us look at examples of unquenchable fires. Says the Lord, when speaking to the children of Israel, "If ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath-day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched."—Jer. 17: 27. The question now arises, did Israel hearken to the Lord? No. Has the fire been kindled in the palaces at Jerusalem? None dispute it. Is the fire burning now? Certainly not. This shows then that an unquenchable fire is not necessarily one that burns eternally; but one that consumes that upon which it is kindled, as the temple or palace at Jerusalem was burnt by the Romans in A. D. 70. Great efforts were made to extinguish it, but it was an unquenchable fire as foretold by the prophet. When the wicked are cast into such a fire, they must of necessity be burned up. If a house is burning, and the fire is declared to be unquenchable and is often the case, we do not understand that it will never stop burning, but that the entire house will be consumed. Hence it follows that an unquenchable fire is not one that burns eternally, but one that cannot be put out till it has devoured the burning object.

Eusebius employs the same expression to represent the martyrdom of christians. He says, "Cronion and Julian were scourged, and afterwards consumed in an unquenchable fire." Again, "Epimachus and Alexander, who had continued for a long time in prison, enduring innumerable sufferings from the scourgers and scrapers, were also destroyed in an unquenchable fire,"* pur asbeston. No one would presume to claim that they are burning yet, and will burn eternally. Wetstein says, "The pur asbeston denotes such a fire as cannot be extinguished before it has consumed and destroyed all." Bloomfield says, "The pur asbeston completes the awful image of TOTAL DESTRUCTION." Thus we see that Mark 9: 44, so often introduced to prove eternal misery, is in perfect harmony with our fifth proposition, and is a very strong passage to prove the total extinction of the wicked, and can never be used legitimately to prove the opposite.

We are instructed to fear God, who "is able to destroy both soul and body in hell," or the gehenna fire. Then the whole being is extinct. Then the prophet's prediction is fulfilled, which reads, he "shall consume, both soul and body."—Isaiah 10: 18. Then the sinning soul will be dead, and sin finished. John represents the righteous by wheat, and the wicked by chaff; and when speaking of Christ, says: "He will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."—Matt. 3: 12. When burnt up in an unquenchable fire, they are not alive.

Sunday Schools.

For some time, we have been satisfied that the exhibitions given by Sunday Schools in many places are decidedly opposed to a pure christianity, and well calculated to make the children, as well as their teachers, parents and ministers, "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God."—2 Tim. 3: 4. This is one of the signs of "the last days." We are glad to see that some begin to get their eyes open to the perils around us. Says a New York correspondent of the Boston Journal:

"I sent you an account of the Sunday School celebrations in this city and Brooklyn last week. As a faithful recorder of passing events, I feel bound to say that the mode of conducting Sunday Schools—the new sensation movements—the character of the exhibitions—the semi-theatrical style of acting—the exhibitions of children trained to sing and speak, who are carried round from place to place, and thus starring it—with a variety of other new movements—are not relished by a large class of the sober-minded; and there is a feeling growing up that the tendency of these things will be to make them prosperous by the outside attractions and the secular appliances. There is a great deal of talk about the propriety of the street display last week. Some schools refused to join, and one teacher in Brooklyn thought the display and performance in the church was too theatrical for his class, and he removed it from the church while the exercises were going on."

We apprehend Satan cares but little how many Sunday schools there are, if they will only let him get up the exhibitions, excursions, sleigh-rides, pic-nics, and festivals; for by one of these, he can dissipate the influence of all the Bible instruction they have received for months. While the Bible tells us to come out from the world and "be separate," the practical influence of many Sunday Schools is directly the opposite. A coming pic-nic, festival, excursion or exhibition, is often presented to the child as a motive to join the Sunday School. At these exhibitions, pride and vanity are fostered, as well as almost every other unholy means, to ensure success in the eyes of a gazing crowd and a wicked world. We hope that none of our readers, who love Jesus and his appearing, will be identified with such unholy motives.

Editorial Notices.

We have received the tenth number of the Emphatic Diaglott, published by Benjamin Wilson, Geneva, Ill. This valuable translation should be in the hands of all Bible students. The present number includes from John 1: 22 to 8: 29. Price for twelve numbers $2.00. We have over twenty different translations of the New Testament, but we must give the "Emphatic Diaglott" a decided preference over all the others. Any who may wish for the first twelve numbers of this excellent work, can obtain them by inclosing $2.00 in a note addressed to Benjamin Wilson, Geneva, Ill. They are worth the money.

The Barbarism of Slavery.—We are indebted to Hon. Chas. Sumner for a copy of this his memorable speech in the Senate, June 4th.

Man his Own Judge.

In a late number of the Banner of Light (?) a Spiritualist paper, a spirit gives an answer to the following question. "Is man responsible for every good and evil deed committed while in the body?" In the answer it is said,

"We speak of man—not the body of man, for that is but a covering; an external garment. The body moving in the outer world is but the habiliment—but the outer covering and is not responsible for the movements of that form. But the spirit of man, the God, the individual, is responsible for its every act, and will surely be judged for the deeds done in the body, as he has a mortal existence. Again he is to be judged by himself as a spirit; he is to come before no other tribunal. If by the law of self he is condemned he must suffer according to the condemnation; if acquitted by self he is indeed acquitted. . . . Look within yourself and behold yourself a God responsible for every act. The body is not responsible for the acts of the spirit—that alone shall judge you or save. Come with us into the interior temple of spirit-life. Read the inscriptions there and thou shalt learn that thou art a God in thyself, and thine own judge."

How would those judge themselves who "depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience SEARED with a hot iron, forbidding to marry?" or advocating the "free love" system? When by "passional attraction" they had found their spiritual "affinity" in some other man's wife, and had persuaded her to leave her lawful husband for another paramour, as directed by the spirits, would they condemn themselves, when thus following their spiritual advisers?

From the foregoing, we can form some idea of the boasted "NEW SOCIAL ORDER" of which the spirits and Spiritualists say so much. When that prevails, they propose to have every man be his own God, lawgiver, and judge.

Theodore Parker.

Theodore Parker, a man noted for his intellectual strength, independence of character, and peculiar theological views, recently breathed his last, at Florence, in Italy. He was traveling and sojourning in foreign lands to regain his health. For some years he has been a prominent man in the city of Boston, and has weekly addressed large audiences at the Music Hall.

At the late anniversary of the New England Anti-slavery Convention at Boston, Wendell Phillips delivered a eulogy on the life of this noted man. He commences as follows:—

"Another friend is gone. Not gone! No, with us, only standing on one step higher than he did. To such spirits, there is no death. In the old times, when men fought with spears, the warrior hurled his weapon into the thickest of the opposite host, and struggled bravely on, until the blood ever is and reclaimed it. In the bloom of his youth, Theodore Parker flung his heart forward at the feet of the Eternal; yes he only struggled onward, and reached it to-day. Only one step higher!"

Read the following, from a published sermon, in which Mr. Parker gives a portion of his confession of faith:

"I do not believe there ever was a miracle, or ever will be. . . . I do not believe in the miraculous inspiration of the Old Testament or the New Testament. . . . The Scriptures are no finality to me. Inspiration is a perpetual fact. I do not believe the miraculous origin of the Hebrew church, or the Budhist church, or the Christian church; nor the miraculous character of Jesus. I take not the Bible for my master, nor yet the church; nor even Jesus of Nazareth for my Master. I feel not at all bound to believe what the church says is true, or what any writer in the Old or New Testament declares true; and I am ready to believe that Jesus taught . . . . that he himself should ere long come back in the clouds of heaven. I do not accept these things on his authority."

"He is not without errors, not without the stain of his times, and, I presume, of course, not without sins."

Let us compare this last sentence with the Bible. Says Peter, when speaking of Christ, "Who did no sin."—1 Pet. 2: 22. Says John, "In him is no sin." 1 John 3: 5. Says Paul, he is "without sin."—Heb. 4: 15.

Does God accept a heart that rejects his word, thus making him a liar, and his well beloved Son a sinner? We read that the "unbelieving . . . shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second DEATH."—Rev. 21: 8.

Christ our Life.

The following notices from the Boston press are received:

"The tone of research is reverent, and the arguments, many of them, very plausible, but we doubt their sufficiency."—The Congregationalist (Orthodox).

The Journal names the views stated by the writer, and says: "He attempts to prove these positions by a direct scriptural argument, and expends upon it both ingenuity and learning."

The Advertiser does likewise, and says: "We commend his volume to persons interested in discussions of this subject."

"This proposition he defends at great length, with a profusion of facts, arguments, analogies, and scripture texts."—Transcript.

"It is a pious and learned work."—The Traveller.

"The friends of theological writing will welcome this volume, which is able, searching, and exhaustive. The author sustains the position he has taken with ability and success."—Atlas and Bee.

Tract Fund for the West

(EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.)

"Bro. H.:—Enclosed is $— I send you for the Tract Fund, for which I am indebted to the Giver of every good and perfect gift for opening the way and providing the means. O how good the Lord is in these times of peril! I have often thought of you and of the Tract Fund, and thought I had a willingness to do, but had not the means; but blessed be God, I will show it now in sending to you a mite. I have not had to sacrifice tobacco, in any form, for I never used any, but always abhorred the poisonous weed; and as for tea and coffee, I think it a bad habit to use them, so much so that I have not tasted one drop of tea to my knowledge in nearly six years. I find the only way to live is to live so as not to get hit, and then we shall not have a chance to be displeased, and stop the paper, as some have done because it said so much about tobacco. I love the cause of God and any thing that will advance and honor the cause. Thus I am with you in the Tract Fund, but can find no one else in the place. My mite is small, but accept it in Jesus' name."

Well, if any are so joined to their idols that they will stop a paper because it rebukes tobacco using, all I have to say is, "Let them alone." Probably their fathers were the men who used to get mad when preachers fired into the rum jugs and brandy bottles. Well, let men "stop the paper." I'll get two new subscribers for every one that I know of who stops on the tobacco score, and as they do not spend their money for tobacco, they can pay for the paper, and give the Tract cause something too.

Another letter from a sister whose hands and heart are in the work.

Jan. 16th, 1860.

"Bro. H.:—Little did I think when you last heard from me that it would be so long before you would again, but I have not forgotten you, or your cause, for I assure you it is dear to my heart. I have been West myself, and know a little about it. I feel that people will read tracts when they will not listen to the truth. I have been afraid that you would get discouraged in your arduous work. Then I think, what can I do to help you?

I feel that I will deny myself of any thing so that I may have a little to send you, but it is so little that I can send. Still, what little I have is cheerfully given, I assure you, and if I had treble you should have it.

When I first gave myself to the Lord, I laid off all superfluities. I feel that it is enough to have the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. I find that I have a little now and then that I can give to the Lord. O that more would see the necessity of doing. I think I can send you some more soon, the Lord is so good to me. I enclose $3.00, with my prayers that you will soon raise the desired sum."

The above enclosed $3.21. It is not the first letter from the same source. In the midst of business and cares I have time to say, God bless the giver.

Another extract.

"Bro. Hastings:—I see by reading the Crisis of No. 2, that a dime from each reader would make up the amount. Therefore I thought I would see what I could do for the Fund. I wrote down the names of all the brethren and sisters that I thought would give, and as I had opportunity asked them to give 10 cents each for the Tract Fund; and some were very willing to give, others not so willing, and some would not give at all. There are others that profess to be interested in the Fund, but their works deny the fact. I read that 'ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you.' He has commanded us to go into all the world and preach the gospel, and if we cannot go, we can help the gospel to go, and if we are his friends we shall obey his command. I think if we be wise we shall work while the day lasts, and do willingly whatsoever our hands find to do, for soon the Master will come and reward the faithful, and give them rest forever where the wicked cannot come. The time is not now far off. We have abundant proof in the signs that thicken around us; and oh, my brother, may the thought of soon reaching home encourage you to faithfully fulfil your calling, and you shall rest very soon in the peaceful paradise of God.

Please acknowledge in the Crisis, so that they will know that you have received the enclosed. Received as follows, from A. G., J. B., W. B. G., C. D., T. B., L. K., E. K., J. W., T. K., D. T., J. C., W. R., B. N. B., L. L. D., T. G., P. T., C. C. T., T. H., A. H., C. W., J. M., J. K., B. A., and Bro. C. J., a dime each; and there are two others that gave who did not want their names down; and then there is another brother who gave me five cents, and another 2 cents, and I will give 23 cents, and that will make the amount, $3.00.

From your sister in Christ, expecting eternal life."

Thank you, sister. May the Lord bless and reward you for your care. If others would go and do likewise, the $1,000 would soon be made up, and then we could begin on another. Let us work while the day lasts.

Another extract.

"Iowa, June 3d, 1860.

Bro. Hastings:—Some three or four weeks since I received a package of Tracts, which came, I suppose, from you, and for which I thank you from my heart. Would it were in my power, my brother, to give you something more substantial than words as an expression of my gratitude; but the fact is, dimes have been so scarce with me for the past two years, that when I get hold of one it is needed in procuring the necessaries of life for my family.

I never knew what it was to be out of funds until I came to Iowa. I sometimes have hard scratching to get along, and am oftentimes much depressed in mind in consequence, yet I trust it will be overruled by a kind Father, so as to work out my good and his glory.

I am engaged more or less in proclaiming the truth as it is in Jesus, and I am happy to say that some are turning from the errors of the present day, and embracing the things concerning the kingdom of God and his Christ. May the truth have free course and be greatly glorified. Amen.

The first three years of our sojourn here, I distributed a great many tracts, but since then I have been unable to procure them. I trust that they, together with those you have sent, may be the means of leading some to Christ, that at his appearing and kingdom they may have eternal life."

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(FROM NOTES BY J. P. COTTON.)

Mr. Grant.—We never believed that God ever made either a devil or a wicked man, although we believe that such exist. We read of angels which sinned and were cast down into Tartarus. They might have kept their first estate, but did not; therefore they made themselves wicked. Man also, being a free agent, voluntarily transgresses; consequently, he makes himself wicked.

The argument which my opponent brings in regard to the resurrection, is to prove that man being sown does not come up. Paul says he does, that every seed shall have its own body. However, my friend admits that there shall be a resurrection of the just and unjust.

The figures "tent" and "tabernacle," "clothed" and "clothed upon," are all explained in the scripture texts which we have already quoted.

"The spirits of just men made perfect." This we briefly noticed during last evening's debate. Dr. Clarke says in relation to this passage, "We cannot understand these terms without the assistance of Jewish phraseology. The Jews divide man into three classes:—1. The JUST PERFECT, tsadikim gemurim. 2. Wicked perfect, rashaim gemurim. 3. Those between both, beinonim.

I. The just perfect are those, 1. Who have conquered all brutal appetites and gross passions. 2d. Who have stood in the time of strong temptation. 3. Who give alms with a sincere heart. 4. Who worship the true God only. 5. Who are not invidious. 6. Those from whom God has taken yetser ha raa, evil concupiscence, and has given men yetser tob, the good principle.

II. The wicked perfect are those, 1. Who never repent. 2. Who recieve their portion in this life, because they have none in the life to come, and are under yetser ha raa, the evil principle.

III. Those who are influenced partly by the evil principle, and partly by the good."

We are again referred to the "cloud of witnesses." The subject there is faith; and has nothing to do with "spiritual" witnesses, which the reader of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews will at once perceive.

My friend refers to Samuel as a genuine spiritual manifestation, when there is not a word about the spirit of the dead prophet. The witch said, "I saw gods ascending out of the earth"; and, at the request of the despairing and God-forsaken king, professed to "bring up Samuel." It was rather an earthly abode for gods; and the Spiritualists rather differ from the witch, for they bring their spirits down. (Laughter and applause.) We again affirm that the prophecy which said that next day Saul would be with Samuel, was untrue; for Saul was not dead till three days after. We would ask, had this evil woman, by the aid of her familiar demon power to raise a child of God? Jesus himself claims this as his prerogative.

My opponent says that death is no punishment. We hold that it is the greatest that man can suffer; and also that the punishment does not commence till he is dead. If the punishment be death, is it inflicted while the criminal is alive? No, sir. When his foot is on the gallows? When the rope is about his neck? When the drop falls? No. It is not death while a spark of vitality remains. If eternal life be man's greatest reward, then is eternal death his heaviest punishment. We should like to hear our opponent prove that death is no punishment. If he means, "we do not suffer when we are dead," we grant that; and it is here we see the justice of God toward the wicked. Suppose some one had a dog which goes mad, is in great pain, and becomes dangerous. What can be done with him? Humanity as well as wisdom says, put him out of misery forever. So is it with the wicked. They do not wish the society of the good, they would be miserable in heaven—everywhere; and, having had a fair trial, what can be done with them? Justice demands their death, Mercy says, put them out of their misery.

Of those who believe in a Hades, or place for disembodied spirits, we would ask how they get out to visit their friends? Obidiah says that they "shall be as though they had not been." That is nothing. How can this "nothing" range through immensity of space in blessedness, and come at the call of "mediums" to hold communion with the earth?

Our friend claims that there is no death; but that eternal life, progressive and glorious, awaits upon all. But we hold it in accordance with the Bible that eternal life depends upon the character of the receiver.

As we see no more points on the negative, we will refer our opponent to the following passages of Holy Writ which relate to the destruction of the wicked: Isa. 1:28; 10:18; and Ps. 104:35. David says, "I sought for their place and it could not be found." Jesus was crucified that he might destroy the works of the devil, but if some do his works forever, then are they not destroyed. [Time].

MR. LOVELAND. My brother has made an important discovery, that God made neither the devil nor wicked men—that they made themselves! He has found out the existence of self-creating individuals! How can a thing, created perfectly holy, make itself sinful? By what power, or from what motive? The thing is a monstrous absurdity as well as an impossibility. If it be not so, by the same process God himself may yet become a devil, and the earth become full of corruption. We come to the "spirits of just men made perfect." Will my brother say it is the breath of just men?

MR. GRANT. No.

MR. LOVELAND. What is it then? We are desirous of enlightenment upon this subject. This play upon words is merely boy's play; it is foolish. New England rum is "spirit," no one denies; but we hope that is not the "spirit" which Job says there is in man.

My brother says that there "is not a word about immortal spirit in the Scripture"; and that "the dead praise not the Lord." Yet the Bible tells us that there are multitudes praising the Lord. He goes on to illustrate by the case of a criminal under sentence of death, that his punishment does not begin till he is dead. What a monstrous absurdity. (Applause.) I repeat that eternal life is not merely a continual existence but "a knowledge of God." "To know thee is life eternal." "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature." He has in himself a measure of immortality, Christ being in union with organized dust. Christ says, "If a man believe in me he shall never die." Does my brother deny that many believed on Jesus when he was on earth? Where then have they been from the time they believed till the present? Dead? Then Christ was mistaken; for he said "He that believeth in me shall never die." I want to see how he will answer this. To do so he will have to admit the truth of spiritual manifestations.

My friend asks how wicked spirits can come back. He says they are the demons who were cast into Tartarus, which locality he labors to show is in the air. Hell or Tartarus is in the bowels of the earth. The angels which sinned were cast down into Tartarus, and reserved in chains of darkness. He says they are now in the air. How did they get back? If not only the devil but death is to be destroyed, then the power which the latter exerts over men will also be destroyed, consequently all must live and possess the future. What says my friend to this?

Paul says that "Christ is the head of every man." Therefore every man belongs to the body, and it is the universal redemption of this body which is referred to. The grand consummation of all things when the fullness of the Gentiles shall come in. Not a select few to be saved, and the rest lost. The principle is universal and must be universal in its application. (Time.)

BRO. GRANT:—Having just returned from a four months' tour West, and in C. W., I wish to say to brethren through the Crisis, that I shall be at home till July, so that if any wish to write me about books and tracts, or to send pay for those sold, they can direct to me here. None need to fear the loss of money sent, as I have never failed to receive letters sent. Direct to me at Buffalo, N. Y.

May 19th, 1860.

From Moses Chandler.

BRO. GRANT:—I have just returned from my tour through Iowa and Wisconsin. Had a good time—very great interest to hear the word. It is heart-rending to hear the calls and entreaties to come and give them the word and not be able to respond. Some would plead with tears in their eyes. It may truly be said, "The harvest is great but the laborers are few." O that the Lord would raise up more laborers, and thrust them into the vineyard! I find now and then one who has commenced to sound the trumpet; may the Lord give them success.

There is a great call for tracts, but I have no money to buy with, so I have to travel and do the best I can. I suppose there are tracts in store somewhere, paid for.

I believe I am the only Advent preacher in the Ill., and Eastern Iowa Conference, that is devoting his whole time to the cause. Bro. Pratt, my old companion, has gone East, but I hope soon to return. In my tour North, I fell in company with two of our preachers, N. A. Hitchcock, of Monticello, Green Co., Wis., and Robert Chown, of Plum River, Joe Davis Co., Ill., who preached some.

Monmouth, May 22d, 1860.

From J. A. Sober.

BRO. GRANT:—We met in conference in Burlington, according to appointment, June 1st, in the Freewill Baptist meeting-house which was kindly opened for us. Our meeting, all things considered, was interesting, and, I trust, profitable to the people. Ministers of the gospel present, were Elders A. N. Seymour, E. Hoyt, E. Miller, Jr. and E. Cheeseborough. There were also a goodly number of lay brethren and sisters present.

To the brethren who came here to labor in word and doctrine, I wish to say a few words. Shall we not put aside our peculiar views, especially when we meet to co-operate in spreading the gospel of God's dear Son? Shall we not keep to ourselves questions and points upon which we are not in harmony? Will strife and debate promote the best interest of the cause of Christ? The servants of Jesus should not strive. Now there are points of doctrine held among us, a belief of which is not necessary to salvation. I will here name one of those points. The view concerning the nature of the next age. Shall we, when people are perishing to know what they must do to be saved, ride a hobby horse? Hobby preaching will never save souls, but tend to divide, and scatter the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ and subvert the true interest of his cause.

Dear brethren, let us not longer pursue such a course, but unite heart and hand in publishing the gospel to the world and church. Our time to do this great work is short. The Lord is soon to come. Signs all over the the world proclaim him very near. "WATCH!"

Burlington, Mich.

From S. A. Elmore.

DEAR BRN. AND SRS.:—We have exceeding great and precious promises, which are as "a lamp to our feet," amid the darkness and gloom that surround our pathway, as we journey to the heavenly city. Is not the Word of God a priceless gift, making known the path of life? O how earthly objects sink away, if to us is made known the riches of the glory of this mystery,—"Christ in you the hope of glory." "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that . . . . we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." Job could say, "I esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food," and are they not a well-spring of joy, even in the hours of bitter sorrow?

"Blessed Bible, book divine, Precious treasure, thou art mine."

When we were in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity, he lovingly promised to forgive all our sins, if we would only believe, and look to him. When we have been almost overcome, has he not bid us be of good courage and promised to strengthen our hearts; to help, and deliver us? And when wave after wave of sorrow has swept o'er us, how the everlasting arms have been placed underneath us and given us "songs in the night"; and as we go forward does he not say, "Lo, I am with you always"? With the good Shepherd always near us, making our present and eternal welfare his care, uttering blessed promises, guiding our feeble steps, can we be cast down? Rather, while beholding in a glass his glory, will we strive to be "changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." He indeed had the Spirit without measure; but we ought to possess the same spirit. The example of Christ is pre-eminently beautiful and lovely. His humble, gentle, compassionate disposition is no less distinguished than his greatness and glory. Solomon, beholding him in vision, exclaimed, he is "the chiefest among ten thousand" and "altogether lovely." How much need we have to grieve over our want of conformity to him; but we know we shall be like him, when we shall see him as he is.

"Be thou my pattern, make me bear
More of thy gracious image here;
Then God the Judge shall own my name,
Among the followers of the Lamb."

Jesus is the substance of all the promises: for they are all in him, yea and amen to the glory of God. He says, "I am the way, and the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." He is the end of the promises; for they lead us to his glorious appearing with crowns of life, and in the enjoyment of his kingdom in the new earth they all have their glorious consummation. But great, and many, and precious as the promises are, how often are they forgotten—how often eclipsed by worldly objects upon which our hearts are too much fixed; is it because they are not believed? because amid the storm and tempest, amid the changes, and agitation, and confusion of this short life, we need no one to enlighten our darkness, and give us peace? Did not our Savior, when about to leave his little flock, say, "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you"? "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, ... and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." May the peace of God fill our souls through Christ Jesus. What can harm me, what can separate me from his love, while I lean upon him? "Shall tribulation, or distress, or peril"? Nay. "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord"; but may the grace of God that bringeth salvation, teach us to deny ungodliness and worldly lust, and live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

The Grove Meeting at Plainfield.

This will be an important meeting for the Mountains. Never were there such unmistakeable tokens of the drying up of "the Euphrates"—the demolishing of Mohammedanism, and the downfall of Rome, as now. Come and hear! Come with your tents, come all. Bro. Grant will be there to aid in the meeting. Meeting at my house in Wales the 24th.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

HALIFX, June, 13.—The Niagara brings a confirmation of the report that Garibaldi had entered Palermo and established his head quarters there, after a fierce combat, and the bombardment of the city from the sea and land.

The populace rose and captured the royal palace from the troops, and burned it.

The reply of the Chinese Government to the English ultimatum had been published.

The Liverpool Courier has the following remarks upon Sicilian affairs:

"A remarkable feature in the revolt of Sicily, is the conduct of the Romish priesthood. To a man they have sided with the people, even more zealously than their brethren at Turin joined with the Sardinians. Until a very recent period the Sicilian branch of the Roman Church was to a great degree independent of the Papacy. No bull had force in Sicily until countersigned by a Minister of the King appointed to examine and report upon all decrees coming from Rome. The late King placed himself entirely in the hands of the Jesuits; to them be committed the instruction of his son, the present King.

SPAIN.

The Madrid journals of the 23d express the opinion that the government really will demand of the Cortes authorization to increase the army to 200,000 men, and some of them state that the garrisons of the Ballerrio Isles are to be forthwith augmented by 20,000 men. The steam frigate Colon and the corvette Villa de Bloon had been ordered to proceed to Naples without delay.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

A letter from Warsaw speaks of the concentration of Russian troops on the frontiers of Turkey as an undoubted fact. There will soon be an army of 60,000 men on the upper Pruth and in Bessarabia and Padolia. The Porte is at the same time using every effort to form a numerous army, in order to prevent Servia and the Danubian Powers conquering their independence. The Turkish forces are concentrated on five points—four corps occupy Roumelia, a second army guards the frontiers of Servia, a third, composed of 30,000 men, is concentrated on the Danube; the fourth is stationed between the Danube and Black Sea. The reserve is at Schumla.

VIENNA, June 1. According to the most recent explanations of Prince Gortschakoff to the great Powers of Europe, Russia has only proposed the assembling of a Congress on the subject of the situation of the Christians in the East, in case an inquiry should confirm the justice of the complaints against the Porte, the Porte having itself taken the initiative in the inquiry by nominating three commissioners (ad hoc), over each of which a member of the Ottoman Cabinet presides. The Great Powers have agreed to await the result before entering into ulterior negotiations on the Russian proposition.

A letter from Constantinople says that Omar Pasha has been appointed generalissimo of the Turkish army of Roumelia.

A letter from Odessa states that pilgrims from Bosnia, Montenegro, and Servia are traveling through Russia, proclaiming the sufferings of the Christians in Turkey, and have excited among the Russian population an incredible hatred of the Turks and desire of revenge.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

The following dispatches will complete our latest information of the course of events.

PARIS, May 31. Garibaldi's head-quarters are in the centre, or town hall, of Palermo. The official Moniteur of Sicily is published. He has formed eight Sicilian regiments; and as the last regiment of King Victor Emmanuel is No. 52, the new ones are numbered 53, 54, &c. Twenty thousand muskets have come in various ways from Genoa. The whole of Bomba's forces are now directed on Messina. Rear-Admiral Mundy, on board the Hannibal, 74, has received the visit of Gen. Lanza, from whom he required restoration of fire-arms taken from British residents at Marsala; arms have been restored. The bombardment has ceased.

NAPLES, May 30. The bombardment of Palermo lasted some hours. Garibaldi entered the town on the 27th. The besieging forces were not numerous, but, commanded by the heroic leader in person, the victory was obtained. The head-quarters of Garibaldi are in the centre of the town. The number of killed is large.

MARSEILLES, May 31. Letters from Genoa state that Garibaldi has ordered the formation of eight regiments of infantry in Sicily, to take rank after the Piedmontese Infantry.

THE INSURGENTS' PROJECTS.

The Patrie observes "We are assured that as soon as Palermo falls into the hands of the insurrectionist party, a dictatorial decree will declare the island annexed to the new Italian kingdom, which will be effected by universal suffrage. At the same time a provisional government of fifteen members will be formed by the most noted of the Sicilian leaders, under the presidency of Garibaldi. This combination will have the effect of giving singular power and energy to the insurrection. The fall of Palermo is a question of time.

A Limerick paper says:—The famous Garibaldi is of Irish extraction. His grandfather was engaged in the troubles of 1798, and emigrated to Italy. His name was Garret Baldwin—changed to Garibaldi—and his residence was on the borders of the county of Limerick, but in the county of Cork.

The Times says that a scheme is reported to be on foot to raise £2,500,000, under a French guaranty of 5 per cent., for the construction in this country of ten vessels, each of about 6000 tons register, or 10,000 builders' tonnage, to be ultimately employed as a steam line from France to the East.

It is asserted that 15,000 guns have been sent to Italy from England, since the setting out of the expedition of Garibaldi.

SARDINIA.

It is stated in a letter from Genoa that the Piedmontese Government, in order to be prepared for possible eventualities, is continuing its warlike preparations. The army placed on a war footing comprises at present an effective of nearly 201,000 men, 116,000 infantry of the line, 17,000 cavalry, 16,500 riflemen, 6000 artillerymen, 3000 engineers, and a reserve of 42,500.

[Advices from Naples the 3d inst.]

THE INSURRECTION IN SICILY.

Dispatches subsequent to the sailing of the Hammonia indicate that the statement of the capitulation of the Neapolitan troops at Palermo was only partially correct.

Advices from Naples state that the King had refused the conditions of the capitulations, and that hostilities would recommence at noon.

A dispatch from Turin announces the renewal of the bombardment, and that Palermo was barricaded, and part of the royal troops were surrounded by insurgents.

A later dispatch, dated Palermo, evening of the 3d, announces that the bombardment had not been renewed, and the armistice continued. Garibaldi was still master of the town, but the forts were occupied by the Neapolitan troops. The terms of the capitulation had not been carried out.

Letters from the French squadron say that the armistice was to last until Tuesday, 5th.

Garibaldi was forced to grant the armistice for want of ammunition.

Messina is quite deserted.

The enthusiasm in favor of Garibaldi was spreading, and the Neapolitan troops were becoming more and more affected by it.

The clergy in Sicily are publicly preaching a crusade against the Neapolitans.

The demand of Signor Carafa for the intervention of the maritime powers in Sicily, it is said, met with an immediate refusal from the Emperor of the French.

Many officers in the Sardinian army had obtained discharges for the purpose of joining Garibaldi.

A dispatch, dated Naples 3d, says that four thousand insurgents, having several pieces of cannon, had attacked Catania on the 1st. They were bravely repulsed by Gen. Clay, with the 5th Chasseurs, one regiment of lancers and some artillery. After a combat of eight hours the insurgents were dispersed, losing three guns and two flags. The city has since been declared in a state of siege.

JAPAN.—Serious conflicts had taken place between the followers of the insurgent Chief and those of the Regent.

CHINA.—Transports with English and French troops were reaching China rapidly.

THE POPE'S HEALTH.—Paris, May 7.—The most mysterious and alarming accounts reached here yesterday concerning the health of the Pope. It is whispered that his Holiness has been in the habit of taking small doses of strychnine, much prescribed by Italian doctors for producing a salutary degree of mental excitement requisite for the endurance of the increasing amount of mental labor he has had to undergo during the last few months. A private letter received yesterday says that the change in the appearance of Pius IX. is evident to all. His head is bent, and his eye fixed and dim. In raising his hand to bestow his benediction on the people, it was observed to shake as if with palsy. He seems to have lost at least two inches of his height, and walks as if in a dream. Cardinal Antonelli, on the contrary, has grown fat and rosy. They say he smiles benignantly, and with peculiar meaning, whenever, in allusion to the Pope's failing health, the old prophecy is brought forward, and a hint thrown out that the last of the Popes is disappearing from the stage. They say he has a far different conviction, and that, as if in anticipation of some approaching change, his eminence is wholly bent on converting into money most of the securities he possesses.—London Morning Star.

The Spiritual Telegraph announces the fact that the Spiritualists are so taken up with their rappings that they do not support their journals. The result is a slaughter of thirty-eight Spiritual periodicals in nine years.

Notices, &c.

The next meeting of the R. I. Conference will be holden at Central Village, Coventry, R. I., June 27th, 1860. Coming on the Hartford and Fishkill R. R., leave the cars at Nipmuch Station. Brethren and sisters, come, and let us work heartily for the salvation of our fellow men and ourselves.

For the Conference,
JOS. D. BROWN, Clerk.

A Barn Meeting.

Hiram Munger will attend a meeting in South Pittsfield, N. H., about three miles from the village, commencing June 30th and continue over the Sabbath.

C. S. EMERSON.

☞ A grove meeting will be held in Plainfield, on land owned by Bro. Edmond Beals, Thursday, June 28th, commencing at 10 o'clock, A. M., and continuing over the Sabbath. Bro. H. Pratt is expected to attend, and we would be glad to have Sr. E. S. Fenn come and labor also.

DAVID THAYER, for the Church.

P. S. This will be an important meeting for the Mountain brethren. Come with your TENTS, come ALL! Rome is falling, and the Lord is coming. Let your whole being respond, "Even so come, Lord Jesus." Bro. Grant will be present to aid in this meeting.

H. PRATT.

La Porte Quarterly Meeting.

The next quarterly meeting of the LaPorte district will commence Friday evening, June 29th, and continue over the Lord's day. All interested are invited to attend.

By order of the Church,
B. P. MORGAN.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

For the Crisis.

"Lord, be Thou my Helper."

A lone wand'rer o'er life's uneven sea,
Father of mercies, lo! I turn to thee;
Be thou my guide, my light. When billows roar—
On my defenceless head mad tempests pour,
And fearful mists my doubtful way surround,
Filling the day with darkness most profound,—
And snake-eyed envy, fired with jealous rage,
With sland'rous tongue doth all her powers engage
To undermine fair virtue's modest throne,
Or place thereon some dark mysterious crown;—
And cherished friends assume the traitor's part,
Or like some frightened bird in haste depart,—
Be Thou a covert from the storm, a shelter
From the blast, a friend and comforter.
But not alone the fearful storm I dread,
Nor yet the triple demon's stealthy tread;
Falsehood and treachery both combined may pierce
My soul with thorns, and waken fears;
But these shall only drive me nearer thee—
Be thou my pilot; then my fragile bark
Shall breast the storm, and safely reach the mark.
Far more than these the calm I fear, for snares
Are there to take the child who, unaware
Of danger, lays aside his oar, and tries
By aid of Reason's glim'ring light to spy
Some nearer way to heaven, nor deems it true,
The way that seemeth right to man and best,
Leads downward to the very gates of death!
Forsaking thus the only true, the great
Eternal source of wisdom, life and light,
He seeks a path that ne'er was stained with blood,
Some other way than that which Jesus trod;
And lured to-day by fancy's fitful flash,
To-morrow finds him sunk beneath the crash
Of disappointments sore;—he learns too late
That earthly hopes, like ignis-fatuus' glow,
Lead on in some dark gulf him to o'erthrow.
Thus may my cautioned feet be led away,
In folly's maze, with pleasures throng to stray,
Unless I'm kept by thine Almighty power,
E'er mindful of my vows and that glad hour
In which my many sins were washed away
In Jesus' precious blood! O, joyful day!
That brought me near to thee, my Lord, my God.
Thou 'st been my strength and stay along the road
Through which I've passed, and still I pray, be thou
My helper, Lord, life's journey through,
And land me safe on that immortal shore,
Where sin and sinners will be known no more.

For the Crisis.

Is God's Will our Will?

Dear Brethren:—The hope of the second coming of Christ and the glory that shall be revealed in that day should rejoice our hearts above all earthly things. The things of this world will seem very small to us if we look forward with that eye of faith, with which it is our privilege to look, to that new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

God's Word is precious, if we will believe his Word. It is more to believe his Word, I think, than a good many of us are aware of. To believe his Word and to do his will is not only to go to meeting a certain number of times during the week, and to repeat a certain number of prayers, and to be called a member of a church, etc.; but I believe that when we square ourselves by his Word, keep ourselves unspotted from the world, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, as we have freely received so we must freely give; then it will appear we are willing to do the will of God. Let us lay all upon the altar.

Paul says in Rom. 12:1, 2, "I beseech you, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God." We find by examining God's Word, that we must not be conformed to this world, but be transformed, by the renewing of our minds, in order to know and do his will. We do not expect to enjoy the pleasures of this world and the pleasures of the world to come. We do not expect to talk like the world, dress like the world, act like the world, and have part in the first resurrection. We must not expect to possess that hope which is like an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that which is within the veil, and at the same time, the first ungodly man we meet, tell as large a story as he does, and also laugh as loud as he can, and perhaps indulge in as many idle words; talk about our neighbors; perhaps indulge in the love of filthy lucre; durst not give God even one dollar, for fear that we shall not receive two in exchange. I think I have seen professed christians (if I should judge by their works) so greedy of filthy lucre, that if they knew God had promised them two dollars in exchange for one, providing they would spend the one dollar to God's glory, in feeding the hungry or clothing the naked, distributing to the necessity of the saints, given to hospitality, they would be so fearful of coming to want, or being a little short of this world's goods, they would rather hold on to the one dollar, and let God's blessing go with his promises. Dear brethren, may God deliver us from such a love to him that will not love him in deed and in truth.

God says that we are to make no provision for the flesh to fulfill its lusts. I believe God will have a peculiar people zealous of good works. Let us examine ourselves and see if there is any thing in us that has the appearance of evil. Paul says to us, "Abstain from all appearance of evil." I do not believe God loves a people who are defrauding, backbiting and lying about each other. Says the Apostle, "All that will live godly shall suffer persecution. Read Heb. 10:32, 33, "But call to remembrance the former days in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of affliction; partly whilst ye became companions of them that were so used; and partly whilst ye were made a gazing stock, both by reproaches and afflictions," etc. Read 1 John 2:15, 16, 17, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world." What does God say of the world? "And the world passeth away and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Also read Gal. 5:16, "This I say, then, walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfill the lusts of the flesh." Verse 24,—"And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts."

Dear reader, let us make up our minds that we will serve God, and let the world, the flesh, and the devil go without serving. Dear christian, let us remember that we are fighting for a worthy crown. I think that if we would not gratify ourselves quite so much in the very things which God has said that we should mortify, many of us would have more to give to him that needeth, whoever it might be, whether to the ministers of the gospel, or to the poor of the flock, or in any other way which should be to the glory of God. Dear reader, let us be ready to every good work. Let us have on the whole armor of God. Let us give God our whole hearts, and not a part; thus may we be saved in the day of his coming.

For the Crisis.

A Whirlwind.

Bro. Grant.—Thinking you would like to hear the particulars in full of the great disaster here, in this part of Iowa, I sit down to pen them to the best of my ability for your valuable paper.

Friday, the first day of June, was pleasant, with high winds. Saturday it thundered, lightened, hailed and rained very hard nearly all day. Sunday, the third, was warm and pleasant, until half past five, P. M., when it commenced to thunder and lighten, with little rain; and after the space of fifteen minutes the heavens became much agitated; it grew quite dark with the wind raging very high; when we beheld, on looking in the west, a frightful scene, one that I never wish to witness again. A whirlwind was coming directly toward us, sweeping everything before it. We stood and gazed on it for about three minutes, when we saw it take to the north. Suspecting the danger was over with our little village, we sat down to watch its course; when we were aroused by our west window blowing in, and by seeing lumber, boxes, fences, and various articles flying in the air past our dwelling. We fled to the cellar, and staid there until the storm abated.

On coming forth we found but little damage done to our little town. There was one barn blown down with a horse in it (horse unhurt); one wood-shed and barn scalped, besides many other little things too numerous to mention; but nothing compared with the disaster four miles north of here, between Pioneer and Walnut Grove. I visited the ruins on the 5th inst., and such a sight my eyes never witnessed before. Imagination cannot conceive the horrible condition of things there. On a piece of ground of four acres and a half, there were five framed houses, from one story, to one and a half high, size from 16 by 20, to 18 by 28, that were taken away with all their contents, and have not been heard of yet. There was a stick of timber, size 16 feet long 8 inches square, known to have been in the house of Mr. Allen, that was blown 25 rods, and stuck in the ground 12 feet. Mr. Allen and his whole family, a wife and three children, and a man that stopped during the storm, were killed. Their bodies were found from six to twelve rods from where their house stood.

In another house two children were killed, and the man seriously injured; his wife and two other children escaped but slightly hurt. In another house, a man and his wife and three children were seriously injured; three other children escaping unhurt.

In another house the man saw the storm coming and ran to get his cellar door up; but before he could succeed in doing so their house was literally taken from them, leaving them to the mercies of the wind which carried them six rods into a thicket. He caught hold of a sapling, and while there felt something warm strike him across the neck, and knowing it to be one of his children he caught it with one hand, and said it took all the strength he was master of to keep hold of the child and tree. He said that it was as dark as the darkest night he ever saw, and rain falling in torrents. When it grew light, he distinguished something moving before him, but could not tell what it was. As it became lighter, he perceived it was his wife sitting in the water, moving to and fro, with her babe to her breast, her left ribs broken, (the babe was unhurt). On that piece of ground were killed nine head of horses, thirteen of cattle, twelve of hogs, and chickens that were literally picked and torn into pieces, of which there was no end.

The tornado swept everything before it. East and west of here, I learn by telegraph dispatch, its ravages were still worse. Seven miles west of Clinton, in a little town on the Mississippi, called Camanche, there were fifty lives lost, and one hundred wounded.

There were many families saved by fleeing to their cellars. How uncertain are the goods of this world! In five minutes' time they were utterly taken from their owners, and their lives left in imminent danger. O the necessity of being prepared to die! May every one take warning, and be prepared to meet death at any moment.

I was talking with one gentleman concerning his thoughts at the time. Said he, "I thought the day of judgment had come. Thoughts of the future rushed through my mind as the vivid lightning flashes through the west. Tongue cannot describe my feelings on this point."

After the storm was over, it was as calm and serene as summer, the moon shining beautifully bright. The next day I followed one whole family to the grave, five in number. They were buried in one grave, and without a sermon, as they had no friends this side of Ohio. O, I never wish to witness another such a scene!

Yours in hope. E. A. W. Lake.

Dies Irae.

BY REV. EDWARD PRATT.

That wrathful day, it cometh soon;—
Earth hastens to her burning doom;—
So do the holy seers declare.
Oh, how intense the awe, the fear,
When all before the Judge appear,
To meet the final inquest there!

How coldly rolls the trumpet's sound,
Reaching the charnel depths profound:
It summons all, with solemn tone,
It startles nature, wakes from sleep
Creatures from dust, and from the deep,
To stand before the judgment throne.

The awful volume then shall be Opened, that all their guilt may see;
The world arraigned its test must meet.
The Judge all-seeing will divine
Each known or secret guilty sign,
And make the scrutiny complete.

What words for me shall then be said,
When e'en the just are filled with dread!
Who then will speak for me, I pray!
Majestic Judge of sinful man!
Oh! tell me how my spirit can
Secure thy favor on that day.

Upon me cast thy pitying eye,
For 't was thy mission, Lord, to die,
To save me from a doom of shame,
Bearing the burden of my guilt,
Thy blood upon the cross was spilt
Let not thy travail be in vain!

Though just thou art, supreme in right,
Be mercy ever thy delight;
So shall my soul thy sentence spare.
With guilt oppressed, I grieve and mourn,
I blush, with sin and shame o'erborne;—
O God, let me thy mercy share,

Thou, who didst Mary's sins forgive,
And bade the dying robber live,
That precious grace deny me not.
By love divine, though man unbought,
Save, though my prayers and tears are naught,
Pluck me from fell Perdition's lot.

* * * * * *

Hear thou thy suppliant's filial cry,
See thou my soul in ashes lie.
Trembling, yet hoping but in thee!
And when that day of wrath and fear
Calls me before thee to appear,
Thy words of pardon let me hear,
O God of mercy,—grace for me!

For the Crisis.

"The World's Crisis."

The careless observer will fail to see the import of these words, while the reflecting mind will view their significance. As reflections follow their legitimate channel, future realities, awfully grand and solemn, are unfolded by them, until the mind becomes so impressively interested as to cry out, "Come, Lord Jesus! come quickly"! The world at large is being convinced of an impending "Crisis"; but its importance is mainly weighed in the scales of politics; hence when its ultimatum shall be seen, will the "tribes of the earth mourn"; then will the strength of hope's anchor be tested; then will the "refiners' fire" separate the pure from the base, the wheat from the tares, the sheep from the goats.

Wars and rumors of wars lose much of their terror from their frequency. Craft and tyranny have much to do with their existence. Self-exaltation is the great engine that sets in motion the contentious spirit. O! how much blood man's ambition causes to flow; how many hearts bear testimony to its triumph. The devil reaps a rich harvest, for the storehouse of the grave is well filled. Sad but truthful picture of human experience!

Weary pilgrim! Is your heart saddened in view of coming events? Is hope's anchor cast into the sea of doubt? Methinks I hear you say, ah no! my redemption draweth nigh; shall I not rejoice? The King in his beauty is coming; ought I not to welcome him? Yes, yes! I view millennial glory crowning the end of all these strifes. I know scepticism lifts high its head and asks, "Where is the promise of his coming?" And the infidel sneeringly replies, "He'll not come; the world will yet stand millions of years." Ah! I have heard many a one who professed to have tasted of the good "Word of Life," use similar language. Why is it so? Is it because the Bible is not comprehensive on the point of Christ's second advent? Is it not rather owing to a want of knowledge of what the Bible does really teach? Too many let their minister do most or all of the reading and praying. Too many read the good Book as though it were a task, and as if time were too precious to be thus employed. Perhaps the looking-glass of truth exhibits too plainly their moral deformities, reminding them of duties neglected and obligations unperformed. May be their moral dignity becomes humiliating when compared with the spotless character of the Nazarene. May be human reason becomes dross when tried in the crucible of eternal realities.

"Inductive Philosophy" is being advanced as superior to the sacred Word. Its language is, "Man is not fallen." How lulling to the conscience, making man a God; for he is said to have "all the attributes of God." Modern ingenuity is stretched to its utmost, to find out a way to lasting happiness, other than the "narrow way." Delusive effort! The Crucified will destroy all such hopes with the "brightness of His coming." Follower of the Lamb, travel on; the "Star of Bethlehem" will soon appear in the sky of promise.

Baptism of the Holy Ghost.

I wish to offer a few thoughts for Sr. M. D. W. to harmonize.

1. If the same manifestations are to follow the receiving of the Holy Spirit, as did those who were baptized with it on the day of Pentecost, why is it that we do not see some who can perform some of the same miracles as they did?

2. If this is the "dispensation of the baptism of the Holy Ghost," and of the "diversified gifts" as granted to those who were baptized with the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and those gifts are yet to remain in the church, for the "perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, even till we all (the church) come into the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God"; why is it that there is such diversity of faith, some believing that the dead know more than the living, others believing that the dead know not anything; some believing that man is immortal, others believing that man is mortal; some believing that God's anger will never cease, but that he will torment the sinner eternally, others believing that God will burn up the sinner and they shall be as though they had not been; some believing that the thousand years reign of Christ (Rev. 20th) was fulfilled during the reign of Papacy; others believing that the thousand years are yet future and commence when Christ comes and sits upon the throne of David, in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem; some believing that the earth is all made new when Christ comes, others believing that the kingdom of God will be set up in Jerusalem, when the ten kings (or kingdoms) are yet in power, and the nation or kingdom that will not serve Christ, (the king on David's throne) will be utterly destroyed? etc., etc.

If all this is the unity of the faith (for there is but one faith for christians), and the work to be accomplished by the Holy Spirit, then I pray God to hasten the time when it will exist no longer, when He will turn to the people a pure language; or will Sr. W. say that none of these believing so have received the Holy Spirit? Why not contend (as the Ervingites do) that in order for the church to come into the unity of the faith, there must be apostles, prophets, etc., etc.—Eph. 4:11—13. The way I understand this scripture is, it had its fulfillment during the ministry of the apostles, when they all believed the same things and spoke the same things. But if yet future, and before the coming of our Lord, then it is high time for the church to commence praying for God to pour out the Holy Spirit, so that there may be a unity of faith, and in harmony with what prophets, apostles, and Jesus Christ have spoken. Yours believing in the one faith and the one hope of the gospel.

God's Power and Faithfulness.

How great is the contrast between Him whose very name is Holy and Reverend, and poor, unworthy, sinful man! Yes; a power that can completely transform the heart to love what it naturally hated, and hate what it naturally loved; that can so elevate the nature of man as to become associated with the great and holy God—with all his myriads of angels—which transcends the human and must be ascribed to Infinite power. How desirable the reflections which gather to that city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is such a God, when contrasted with this rebellious, sin-cursed and doomed earth. Here fraud and deceit are carried on to great extent. There, nothing will harm or molest, but all will be happiness and joy. There friends will never prove treacherous. And best of all, we shall sin no more; therefore sorrow, pain and death can never enter.

David says, "Come, and hear all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul." Christians should ever delight in testifying to the great things God hath wrought for them. In meditation on the mercies of God I am often made to exclaim in the language of the poet—

"What shall I render to my God,
For all his kindness shown?"

Alas! my short arm cannot repay, but, by the grace of God, with David I am resolved to sing praises unto my God and Savior while I have any being.

Let the saints all rejoice and exult in their King,
To Jesus with shouting and melody sing;
For sinners' redemption his life's blood he gave,
And the faithful true Witness will never deceive.

He promised a crown when he left us a cross,
And he with a kingdom rewards all our loss;
To glory he leads, while close to him we cleave,
And the faithful true Witness will never deceive.

His word stands most sure—"I come quickly again,"—
He now waits to hear us resound our Amen!
Of that glorious hope hell will never bereave,
For the faithful true Witness can never deceive.

That He'll change our vile body, he caused us to hope,
Like his glorious body he will soon raise us up,
All shining in glory, redeemed from the grave,—
For the faithful true Witness will never deceive.

"There is Another Man."

Dr. Guthrie, in a late work, gives the following description of a scene on the ocean:—

"During a heavy storm off the coast of Spain, a dismasted merchantman was observed by a British frigate drifting before the gale. Every eye and glass were on her, and a canvass shelter on deck almost level with the sea, suggested the idea that there yet might be life on board. The order instantly sounds,—'Put the ship about,' and presently a boat is launched, with instructions to bear down upon the wreck. Away after that drifting hulk go those gallant men, through the swelling of a roaring sea. They reach it,—they shout,—and now a strange object rolls out of that canvass screen, against the lee shroud of a broken mast. Hauled into the boat, it proves to be a man, with head and knees drawn together, so dried and shriveled as to be hardly felt within the ample clothes, and so light that a mere boy lifts it on board. It is laid on the deck; in horror and pity the crew gather round it; their feelings suddenly changed into astonishment. It shows signs of life,—they draw nearer,—it moves—and then mutters in a deep sepulchral voice, 'There is another man!' Saved himself, the first use he made of speech was to seek to save another!

Christian reader, learn the blessed lesson taught by this thrilling incident, and practice upon it in your daily life. Has One sent from above and taken you, and drawn you out of many waters? Are you safe,—your feet planted upon the Rock, Christ Jesus? Then you may greatly rejoice; but is there not another man perishing, as you once were, but whom, under Providence, you may be made instrumental in saving?

You have gained the ear of a prayer-hearing God. Fill not that ear with the recital of your own wants alone. Remember, while you pray for your own advance in holiness, that there are many others for whom Christ died, and intercede for them also. Labor for those about you who are in danger. Speak to them kindly and earnestly, and let them see that you are sincerely interested in their soul's welfare. Surely, no christian should content himself to rest in his own hope of acceptance through a crucified Redeemer, while there is one other man exposed to eternal death.

All but the Last.

Theodore de Beza, it is said, knew all the Hebrew Psalms by heart, having laid up that divine treasure to be resorted to in his travels when he was out of the reach of books, and in his old age when the dimness of sight might disable him from reading. The 91st Psalm was peculiarly precious to him. Eminent and deeply tried saints have often had particular portions of Scripture deeply imprinted on their minds, perhaps from a coincidence of the experience therein described, with their own. Luther used to say of the 118th Psalm, "That is my own psalm,—it belongs to me in particular." Read it, and compare it with his eventful history, and you will see the reason of this appropriation. So Beza used to speak of the 91st Psalm. He had passed a life of great perils and changes, and lived to a great age. When he was near his death, he said, "God has fulfilled to me every promise of that psalm but the last,—'I will show him my salvation,'—and I am now waiting for the fulfillment of that."

Happy old man! You must read over that psalm and ponder every promise, to know how good God had been to him, and what a blessed life he had spent here on earth, even amidst the deep humiliation and sharp trials of the dreadful period in which he lived. But all he had experienced already, was but the first fruits of the glorious harvest before him, and which was assured and held up to him in that last promise,—"I will show him my salvation."

To the people of the world, the remembrance of past joys is embittered by the sad thought that they are gone, never more to return. So a great poet sings,

"No more, no more, O never more on me
The freshness of the heart can fall like dew."

It is not so with the christian. All he has enjoyed in this world, being the gift of his God, whose covenant has been established with him in Christ, is a pledge and an earnest of yet greater blessings in reserve for him. Memory holds up the mirror to hope, and the retrospect of the past discloses to him the boundless vista of future glory and blessedness.

None but Christ.

"He loved me, and gave himself for me." We want more love to Christ, we need to make our religion more a matter of personal reality; to have a spot where we may come to Christ, and hear him say to us, "I have loved you; I have sought after you; I have given myself for you; now go out into the world and do my will." And each soul should say, "I go." We have a personal Savior, personal love to him, personal trust in him. Let the Spirit be breathed into all our hearts and the work is done. Then we will work for the salvation of the world. How then could we hold back any thing? If Christ wants me in China, we should say, I'll go. If he wants my money let him take it. If he wants my heart's blood, I'll pour it out. We need to have a place where we can rise above the world and gaze on God. Then we will labor to get others to gaze on him. The humble christian asks, "How can I glorify God?" By getting another mind to gaze on God; to love him, to trust him, to serve him; to understand his love, his character, his kindness. If we can do this, God is glorified. And this is what we want—a burning zeal to bring others to know, love, and praise God. We want a livelier, firmer faith in God and in all his promises, so that we can come to his word, and as we read can feel God has said this, and that is enough. It is true. The promise is sure.—Missionary Address by Dr. Kirk.

Physical Value of the Sabbath.

1. The simple rest from labor, by which wearied bodily powers may be restored, makes this institution beyond estimate valuable. Week-day effort runs the machine down; the Sabbath winds it up.

2. The reaction upon the body of the rested, refreshed and enlivened mental powers which Sabbath rest secures, is of great value to the physical system.

3. The cleanliness which a well-kept Sabbath always brings, in connection with change of apparel, etc., is eminently favorable to health and vigor.

4. The honored Sabbath powerfully repulses every species of vicious indulgence, and favors all those virtuous habits which so strongly befriend men's physical welfare.

5. The most satisfactory experiments have shown that a vastly greater amount of physical labor can be accomplished with the rest and refreshment of the Sabbath than can be without it.

6. The same has been verified in reference to laboring animals—as horses, oxen, etc. Hence the law of the Sabbath, expressly mentioning them—"Thou, nor thy cattle."

7. Every species of human industry is befriended by the Sabbath's regularly returning rest, restoring wasted powers, invigorating wearied faculties, and putting the human engine in proper order for the demands made upon it by the succeeding labors of the week.

Hence both the wisdom and benevolence of God beam forth in the institution of the Sabbath. Hence, too, Sabbath violation is wrong done to one of the best friends of the weary and suffering inhabitants of our world.—Traveler.

Franklin's Sermon.

1. Man's ingress into the world.
2. His progress through the world.
3. His egress out of the world.

To return—

1. Man's ingress into the world
Is naked and bare. (Gen. 3:7; Job 9:21.)

2. His progress through the world (Ezek. 16:7.)
Is trouble and care. (Job 5:7; 14:1; Ps. 18; 9; 78:33; Matt. 13:22; Ezek. 4:22.)

3. His egress out of the world
Is, no mortal knows where. (Job 14:10.)

But to conclude— (Eccl. 9:10.)
If we do well here,
We shall fare well there. (Rev. 22:14.)
I can tell you no more
If I preach a whole year. (Micah 6:9.)

"Selah."

The Bibliotheca Sacra, in referring to the meaning of the Scriptural word "Selah," says that the Targums, and most of the Jewish commentators, give the word the meaning of eternally forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rythmical note. Hender regarded it as indicating a change of note; Matthewson, as a musical note, equivalent perhaps to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence. Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play and the singer stop." Sumner, after examining all the passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah."

Hygiene.

"This is for your Health."—Paul.

For the Crisis.

"Too Bad! Too Bad!"

Yes, Bro. Grant, it is "too bad," and I verily thought so while I was remonstrating with an advent brother some time ago, who was absolutely a victim to the vile weed. I asked him if he could seek God's blessing upon it?

"Yes," said he, "with as much solemnity as I can upon my food."

"But," said I, "don't you know that it is killing you?"

"Yes, and if I knew that it would kill me in five years, I would use it."

He furthermore told me that he had never exchanged the first cross word with his wife, and if he was forced to part with his tobacco or his wife, he would rather "lose his wife!" I could say no more—was utterly confounded! and inwardly cursed tobacco from its very existence. Poor brother, he is now wallowing in the mire of sin and vice, perhaps lost forever! O God! have mercy on him, for thy grace only can save him.

Bro. B., an advent preacher, loves his quid too well to give it up,—think that he would "go away sorrowful" if the Lord should tell him to "deny himself." One afternoon after he had ended his sermon, he put a huge "chaw" into his mouth, in the presence of his congregation. I stepped up to him, and asked if he could ask God to bless it?

"Certainly, I can, I eat it."

As he was a minister of the gospel, I said no more, but thought that if he would eat and swallow it, he would soon get sick of that kind of food.

Ministers of the Gospel, give it up! Deny yourselves, and let us have soul-stirring sermons, tinctured with the spirit of the living God. We are sick of tobacco-scented prayers and preachings! While you reform us of our sinful habits, we will reform you (if we can) of your filthy habits. Disciples of the blessed Savior, do as I have done,—consider the matter, and give it up! Hate the stuff!! Think of the evil that it has done, and is capable of doing, poison as it is, and ask yourselves if the use of it will enable you to glorify God in your bodies and spirits which are his.

The undersigned, all of whom are at present, and many of whom have been during the past winter, guests at take pleasure in calling the attention of the sick to it, as an Institution conducted on such principles and after such a plan, as to make it in their judgment a very desirable resort for all who wish to recover their health, and also for those who, not being sick, would like to learn how to live. In many of its methods it is peculiar; but these give it good significance, and enter vitally into the considerations that make it worthy of the public confidence. Poisonous Rooms.

Nothing short of "line upon line" is sufficient to impress great practical truths on the common mind; hence the reiteration of the fact that using wall-paper having a green color in it, especially if fuzzy, and not glazed, is immediately destructive of health, and of life itself if persisted in; as proof: H. Fulland, near Tipton, England, lately moved in a new house; all his children became curiously affected, worse at night than during the day: they were exceedingly restless; a singular twitching or jerking of the muscles, especially of the face, and general decline of health, indicated the working of some insidious agency. The physician had them promptly removed to another room, when they began at once to recover their health. On a small piece of green-colored paper on the walls of the room left, there was found on analysis enough arsenic to poison a man.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,
Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$2.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	22.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brs., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

A Poetical Sermon.

TEXT.—1 Cor. 15: 58.

BY F. P——.

Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand,
Work always till right is restored,
Forasmuch as we know that no labor is vain
That is wrought in the name of the Lord.

If Paul by his argument strengthens our faith,
His counsel may light up the way
That leads to that blood-bought inheritance fair,
In the kingdom where Jesus holds sway.

His words are a legacy far beyond price,
And we and our children are heirs;
More blest than if earth and its glories were his,
Is he who that legacy shares.

'Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand"—
Paul taught not by precept alone,
But the weight of example adds force to his words,
Which else they would never have known.

Unflinching in firmness, though beaten and scourged,
Unmoved as Mount Zion he stood,
Determined that never he'd swerve from his course,
Though it led him through oceans of blood.

Like him, oh my friends, let us never be moved
From a steady advance in the way,
In the path of the just that shall shine more and more,
Till the dawn of a glorious day.

Unmoved by the world, with its glitter and show,
With its tinsel, its fashion, its pride;
Its honors prove only the gateway of death,
And truly the portal is wide.

What a web of enchantment the devil has wrought,
And what consummate skill he has shown!
One step to the right, or one step to the left,
And he greedily calls us his own.

For the kingdoms of earth and the glory thereof
Full many will waver and fall;
And though Satan a thief and a liar is proved,
Full many will follow his call.

Full many march boldly and proudly along,
Till they catch the first glance of the foe,
Then their courage is vanished, their swords are cast down,
And the glittering banner laid low.

But we want a courage to carry us through,
A firmness that never will bend,
A courage unflinching when danger is near,
A strength that will last to the end.

The christian must needs be immovably firm,
Or temptation his purpose will sway,
For "wolves in sheep's clothing" prowl oft on his track,
And fain would entice him away.

There are cares to harass him, and joys to beguile,
There are threat'nings and bribes to withstand;
And Satan would catch us, by smiles and by frowns,
In the snares that his cunning has planned.

There's the scorn of the world, its contempt and its sneer,
The reproach that the christian must bear;
How many have wavered, denying the faith,
When the weather no longer was fair.

What virtue in boldness with naught to molest?
What firmness with nothing to move?
What strength to o'ercome were temptations withdrawn?
In tempests our courage we prove.

'T is to those who o'ercome that the promise is given,
Not those who have never been tried;
And, oh! in temptation there's One who will prove
A guard, and a shield, and a guide.

There's a strength that's made perfect in weakness, we know,
That can make us immovably strong;
A strength that is strong in the day of our need,
And is mighty to shield us from wrong.

The Lord is our refuge, we shall not be moved,
Though foes may encompass our land;
If built on Jehovah's unchangeable truth,
Our faith shall eternally stand.

Then let us be watchful, be prudent and wise,
Unmoved when temptations assail,
Unshrinking in dangers, keep onward, right on,
And soon we'll outweather the gale!

When the arrows are thickest, gird closer our mail,
For none but a traitor will flee,
Look out for temptation's dark breakers ahead,
And the dangers that girdle the sea;

And all that our foemen in battle have won,
Shall be doubly, aye, trebly restored,
And all we have gained of the enemies' ground
Let us keep in the name of the Lord.

Let us build by the Rock that is higher than we,
In its shadow for safety we'll hide;
And glory in God, we shall never be moved,
But firm as Mount Zion abide.

We must always abound in the work of the Lord—
Yes, the christian has something to do;
He must "cease to do evil, and learn to do well,"
He must work, for the workmen are few.

We need not expect to be freed from our toil
Till the "rest for the weary" is gained,
Till the Master returns to establish his throne,
And the enemy, Satan, is chained.

No! all we can do for the Lord must be done,
The christian faints not by the way,
And none who have come without bearing the cross,
Shall stand in that heart-searching day.

The way to the kingdom is toilsome and steep,
And many the storms we must breast,
And none without effort unceasing are saved,
And none are admitted to rest.

'T is little our Father has asked us to bear,
When compared with what Jesus has borne;
And shrink we from crosses? Remember His cross,
And the thorn-plaited crown he has worn.

After all we can do for the Lord shall be done,
We shall find we are owing him yet,
Grace fills up the measure we never can fill,
And Mercy must cancel the debt.

How precious the promise to those who have borne
The "burden and heat of the day,"
Who have started in youth, in the sunrise of life,
Ere age has o'ershadowed the way!

Yes, youth is the time to begin in the work—
In the strength and the light of the morn,
And the burden is lighter, less grievous the load,
The longer the yoke has been worn.

For the Crisis.

On the Son of God.

The acknowledged fact that "we know in part and prophesy in part," demands that the presentation of our different views should be evermore in the spirit of humility and forbearing love.

Truth is often assailed by two opposite extremes of error. Among the varied opinions of men concerning the nature of Jesus Christ, I can find none to harmonize with the testimonies of the "Eternal Spirit," but that of a Divine Sonship, united, in fullness of time, to a human body, justifying the scriptural appellations, "Son of God" and "Son of Man." Here my mind rested, after deep solicitude and prayerful research of the Word of God which abideth forever. During forty subsequent years, I have never been unwilling to re-examine the evidences of this precious faith, which once and forever dispelled from my troubled mind, the confounding theory, that a plurality of intelligent persons can constitute a single intelligent being. A theory, first admitted on the simple belief that it was a revealed fact of the divine testimony, and never rejected until assured that it was a plain and gross perversion and violation of that testimony.

Having given, in the Crisis, what I deem conclusive scriptural evidence against one extreme of error on this important subject, viz., that Jesus Christ has no superior nature than that of perfect humanity; I beg leave to present some of the scriptural evidences which have compelled me to renounce the theory, that "The SON of God" is the supreme God himself. We are happily agreed, in professing at least, that there is but one supreme God. Whether or not our theory is really in harmony with this profession, is another and very serious question.

Now I ask every beloved christian brother, ought not the plain, scriptural answer to the great question, Who is the one supreme God? to be considered as determining this controverted subject concerning our blessed Redeemer, Jesus Christ? If our only rule of faith assures us that the one God is Jesus Christ, either alone, or in association with one or more persons, then, whether or not we can have any intelligent conception of such a proposition, we have the authority of the Bible for affirming it. Ought we to affirm it without this authority?

Let us now examine whether or not we have this authority.

The reasonable expectation, that a divine revelation assuring us that there is but one God, should plainly and positively declare who that one God is, is not disappointed. It stands forth in letters of living light. "There is but ONE GOD, THE FATHER."—1 Cor. 8: 6. "God is ONE."—Gal. 3: 20. "Hear, oh, Israel; the Lord our God is ONE Lord."—Deut. 6: 4. Dear reader, did you ever read in the living oracles of eternal truth that He is THREE?* What is the testimony of "The faithful Witness" himself, who spoke as never man spake, accredited by the Eternal, "This is my beloved Son, HEAR YE HIM"? What, I ask, is the testimony on this great subject of Him whose words shall never pass away? Is it that God is three or two? Is it that the Father is one part of the supreme Deity? It is, that the "FATHER" is "the ONLY true God."—John 17: 1—3. If this does not settle this great question, permit me to ask, what language can settle it? Reader, can you adduce a single declaration from God's book, that the one God is any other than the Father, to cast the shadow of a doubt on this unequivalent testimony of the Son of God? Can any sane mind fail to perceive, that if the Father (acknowledged by us all to be but one person) is "the ONLY true God," all other persons in the universe are excluded from supreme Deity?

* The interpolated passage, 1 John 5: 7, neither affirms that the three are three equal persons, or three persons, or one God. See John 17: 21, 22.

It is worthy of our serious regard, that among all the passages which are presented to disprove the simple unity of the one God, not one of them was designed by the inspired writer to teach us who is the one supreme God. Let us examine them, and give them their full weight in the balance of the sanctuary.

It has been affirmed that John wrote his gospel to establish the doctrine of the supreme Deity of Jesus Christ. Does John say so? Let us hear him. "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: But these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, THE SON OF GOD, and that believing ye might have life through his name."—John 20: 30, 31.

But John, and Paul, and Thomas, and our Father in heaven, all apply the title of God to the Son. Now, dear reader, consider the fact that the title of God is applied to rulers far inferior to the Son of God,—Ps. 81: 6; and judge whether or not this will outweigh the plain and positive testimony of Jesus Christ, that his Father is the ONLY true God. It may aid us to come to a correct decision of the question, by considering the fact, that when the Father saith to the Son, "Thy throne, oh God, is forever and ever," the Father claims to be HIS GOD who has anointed him for this high office.—Heb. 1: 8, 9. Our only alternative, therefore, is, either to understand the term God as applied to the Son, in a subordinate sense, or to believe that the supreme God has a God above him.

You tell me that the Son "is over all God," or Ruler. True. The question is, is he so by independent right or by commission? The answer of the Eternal Spirit is, that the Father hath "put all things under" him,—1 Cor. 15: 27; an expression equivalent to his being "over all." To the plain and positive testimony, that the Son is "begotten of the Father," as the Word that was with him in the beginning, —John 1: 1, 14, "the first born of every creature,—Cor. 1. 15, "the beginning of the creation of God,"—Rev. 3: 14, it is affirmed, that his "goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." It is well known that the original terms in the Hebrew and Greek, translated ever, forever and everlasting, denote different periods of duration from three days (Jonah 2: 6) to strict eternity. Now, on the same principle that we give a construction to Rev. 20: 10, declaring the torment of the wicked to be "forever and ever," in harmony with the plain teaching of their final destruction of "soul and body," Matt 10: 28 and their second and everlasting death in the lake of fire Rev. 20, we must give a construction to the declaration that the "goings forth" of the Son of God have been "from everlasting" in harmony with the plain and repeated testimonies that he is "the first born of every creature," the beginning of the creation of God" and the "begotten of the Father."

It pleased the Father, that in the Son "all fulness" of wisdom, and love, and power should "dwell," for the glorious purpose of redeeming love. "All power is GIVEN unto (him) in heaven and in earth." He is indeed "the MIGHTY God." It were sufficient to meet the opinion of our dear brethren, that he is Almighty, with the simple question, "Who hath GIVEN to the Almighty?" For their edification, however, it may be observed, that when the charge was made against him by the captious Jews of making himself equal with God, he immediately repelled it by the solemn asseveration, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself but what he seeth the Father do."—John 5: 19. His knowledge is competent for his divine mission, but his plain and positive declaration that the day of judgment is known by the "Father only," demonstrating that the Son does not know it in any nature, proves that his knowledge is not infinite and independent.—Matt 24: 36. The argument, for supreme Deity, therefore, predicated of his revealed perfections, is inadmissible. The term "equal with God" in Phil. 2: 6, is admitted by learned trinitarians to be an incorrect translation. It should be "as" or "like God." See Doddridge and Macknight on the passage. The real change, ascribed to the highest nature of the Son of God in this passage, is totally incompatible with supreme, immutable Deity. We should delight to worship the Son "to the glory of God the Father."—Phil. 2: 11. The Father is worshiped to his own independent glory. See 1 Chron. 29: 20, where David is worshiped.

If we would understand the truth as it is in Jesus, we must allow scripture to be its own interpreter. We must compare "spiritual things with spiritual." It is not sufficient to quote isolated passages. By so doing contradictory opinions appear to be proved, which we all know cannot be admitted.

Dearly beloved in the Lord, let us remember that while our Father in heaven has set forth his first and only begotten Son, "the brightness of his glory and express image of his person," as the object of our faith, and love, and worship, as the "one Lord BY whom are all things, he forever claims the honor and glory of being the "one God" OF whom are all things;" the eternal, infinite, independent source of all things,—1 Cor. 8. 6; the ONLY true (or supreme) God,"—John 17: 1—3. This glory he will not give to another. To ascribe it to the Son, who disclaims it, declaring, "MY FATHER IS GREATER THAN I," —John 15: 28; 10: 29; is to dishonor both the Father and the Son. The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of God. See 1 Cor. 2: 11.—"Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

We would not, however, merely silence the argument for immortality from the phrase in question, but, if possible, satisfy the reader by a full explanation of it. What, then, do the clauses signify?

1. "The fire is not quenched." This is not a singular phrase. Equivalent expressions occur in 2 Kings 22: 17; 2 Chron. 34: 25; Isa. 1: 28, 31; Jer. 4: 4; 7: 20; 17: 27; 21: 12, 13, Ezek. 20: 47, 48; Amos 5: 6. In all these passages a reason is given, not for the continuance of that which fire preys upon, but for its being consumed; for the obvious reason that the fire is not put out. Thus in Isa. 1 28; "They that forsake the Lord shall be consumed." "Behold, mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and upon beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruit of the ground; and it shall burn, and shall not be quenched" (Jer. 7: 20), where Lowth remarks: "It shall make a total destruction." Surely all these things were not immortal. Again: "I will kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched," (Jer. 17. 27, comp. ver. 4: "Shall burn forever;" where the Assembly's Annotators remark: "For a long time;" and Orton: "Till you are consumed.") "Seek the Lord, and ye shall live; lest he break out like fire in the house of Joseph, and devour it, and there be none to quench it in Bethel." Amos 5: 6. All this seems plain. And the prediction in Ezek. 20: 47, 48, met the incredulous response, "Doth he not speak parables?"—not for the mystery of fire unquenched, nor because it was a trifling matter to be consumed, but because the people would fain hear smooth things.

2. "Their worm shall not die." If this is the worm of conscience, the figure was certainly far in advance of Jewish thought. And if it is not that of conscience, and yet implies the immortality of the lost, then most singularly is a worm named as immortal in the revelation, but the soul never. But the connection, and the word rendered "abhorring," (dsraon), used elsewhere only in Dan. 12: 2, and signifying the nauseous spectacle of putrefying carcasses, show that the "worm" is either literal vermin, or something of which that is a type. So in Ecclus. 7: 19; "Humble thy spirit very much; for the vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms." Compare ch. 10: 11; 19: 3 (cited above, p. 89); the Targum on Isa. 66: 6 (p. 80); and the remark of Lightfoot: "To be devoured by worms was reckoned an accursed thing, and what befell none but men of the greatest impiety." (Horæ Heb. et Talm., Acts 12: 23.)

The whole phrase has a historical allusion, respecting which there are two opinions. Albert Barnes derives the figure "from a scene where a people whose lands have been desolated by mighty armies, are permitted to go forth after a decisive battle, and to walk over the field of the slain, and to see the dead and putrefying bodies of their once formidable enemies." Of this the destruction of Sennacherib's host would be a notable example. Dr. Alexander, perhaps more correctly, thinks the prophet alludes to the fires kept up in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, or Tophet (Isa. 30: 33,) and predicts the fate of the apostate Israel. "The central figure is Jerusalem; and its walls the dividing line between the two contrasted objects. Within is the true Israel, without, the false." The latter is finally exhibited, no longer living, but committed to the flames of Tophet. "To render our conceptions more intense, the worm is added to the fire, and both are represented as undying. That the contrast hitherto maintained may not be forgotten even in this closing scene, the men within the walls are seen by the light of these funeral fires, coming forth and gazing at the ghastly scene, not with delight as some interpreters pretend, but, as the text expressly says, with horror. In its primary meaning, this is a prophecy of ruin to the unbelieving Jews—apostate Israel."

And it is not the exhaustless life of the individual, but the multitude of those who perish, that challenges the unquenched fire and the unfailing worm. Thus in Isaiah's context, vs. 15, 16: "Behold, the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire; and the slain of the Lord shall be many." Their number suggests a banquet like the "supper of the great God" to which the fowls of heaven are invited in Rev. 19: 17, 18. Yet though they be so many, the worm shall not be wanting for its feast, nor the fire to consume that which remains. The double figure shows the completeness of the extinction. A similar iteration, we think, occurs in Joel. 1: 4.

"In its primary meaning," says Dr. Alexander; and in either his exegesis or that of Mr. Barnes nearly all commentators are agreed. Thus Poole, Kimchi, Le Clerc, and Noyes. Now the secondary or applied meaning, in Christ's use of the words should correspond. But a destruction that leaves nothing can not describe an eternal non-destruction. And to extend the figure, as many do, to an eternal state, would not only make it self-contradictory, but would be gratuitous—explaining nothing, and proving nothing. That would be to assume the very thing to be proved, and to foist it upon words which in four or five different ways prove the contrary.

We may then freely say with Richard Watson (on Mark 9. 43–48,) "As the worm itself dies not, but destroys that it feeds upon, and as a fire unquenched consumes that upon which it kindles, so when temporal judgments are expressed by this phrase, the utter destruction of persons, cities and nations, appears to be intended; but when it refers to a future state, and the subject of punishment is, in itself, or by divine appointment, immortal, the idea is heightened to its utmost terror." But we have already found Mr. W. saying: "That the soul is naturally immortal . . . . is contradicted by Scripture." Hence, until the actual immortality of the lost is proven from other passages, this passage must, by his own showing, describe their extinction.

Mark 9 49. "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt."

This passage, sometimes cited to show the immortality of the lost, can only illustrate the facility with which the direst evils, once imagined, are proven. It is one of the most obscure and vexed places of all Scripture, as may appear from the nine close pages in which Kuinoel gives account of seven different interpretations of it. And when we find contradictory methods of inferring from it the supposed immortal death (see Stier, as compared with Landis, Doddridge, Poole,) we have some right to ask if it is not the very darkness of the passage that yields the supposed gloomy light.

But who shall be "salted with fire?" The phrase "every one" is unqualified, and naturally denotes all men. The "fire" may be that of trial and judgment, temporal or final (Matt. 3: 11, 12; 1 Cor. 3: 13,) by which every man is either purified and strengthened, or overcome and condemned. What is said of "sacrifice" and "salt" is doubtless an allusion to Lev. 2: 13; with which compare 2 Chron. 13: 5; Matt. 5: 13; Mark 9: 50. There is reason, we think, for supposing that "salt" denotes the preservation in immortal life of those who "have salt in themselves." See Philo and others cited in "Debt and Grace," pp. 200, 201, 242.

The facility with which the fatal immortality has been deduced from Mark 9: 49, reminds us of the illustrations offered by Tertullian and other early defenders of the doctrine. They spoke of lightning as a fire from heaven that kills without consuming, and thence conceived a fire of hell that consumes without killing. They pointed to the volcanoes that burn on and do not burn out, as pictures of eternal fire that does not destroy. Even Augustine appeals to "that grandest absurdity of all" the superstitions respecting the salamander, that it can live in the fire. This and the preceding examples "are sufficient witnesses," he says, "that not every thing which burns is consumed." (De Civ. Dei, 1: 21, c. 4.) Another illustration is offered by a Lapide, who says on Matt. 3: 12, "Hence the stone asbestos is named, which ever burns and is not extinguished." Truly an argument a lapide; which has been recently improved for the lapidation of heresy by one who renders the phrase pur asbestos "inconsumable fire"! (J. Litch, Pneumatologist, pp. 226, 274, 5; Discussion with Mr. Grant, p. 125.) We may yet hear of unquenchable water. But if the "terrible idea" of unconsuming fire be true, why did no prophet or apostle ever appeal to the burning bush, in Ex. 3: 2, as an illustration of a doctrine so important?

Matt. 3: 12. "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." So Luke 3: 17. Compare Mark 9: 43, 45, as noted above, p. 96.

With these passages should be compared Ps. 1: 4. "The ungodly are not so, but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away." Isa. 5: 24. "As the fire devoureth the stubble, and as the flame consumeth the chaff, so shall their root be as rottenness, and their blossom go up as the dust." Matt. 13: 30, 40. "As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world." See also 2 Sam. 23: 6, 7. "The sons of Belial shall be all of them as thorns thrust away; . . . . and they shall be utterly burned with fire." Isa. 10: 16–18, and Matt. 3: 10. "Every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." Isa. 27: 11. "When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off; the women come and set them on fire;" and John 15, 6, as examined above, pp. 90, 91.

We have already noticed the use of the phrase, "the fire is not quenched," (ou sbennutai.) Can the adjective form, "unquenchable" (asbeston.) sustain an infinitely different meaning? Is that which was wholly consumed by "fire unquenched," for ever unconsumed by "fire unquenchable?" Such a difference of implied meaning would be without a parallel in the use of words. And certainly there is no power of eternal endurance in "chaff," or in any thing of which that is a type, to require an implied sense thus without a parallel. And when dried branches and felled trees, "cast into the fire" and "burned," are also given as illustrations of the final destiny of the lost, it seems to us that language would be too capricious and uncertain a thing for use, if all such description of consuming fire were changed to that of unconsuming fire by an adjective termination.

We need hardly say more plainly that the same reasoning which would deduce the immortality of the lost from this adjective, would also show the indestructibility of chaff, and, indirectly, of all the other frail and perishing things named in the parallel passages. The whole imagery is that of perishableness. It is all ignored, we think, by the usual assumption of a soul that cannot perish. But that we have not mistaken the figure will also appear from various commentators. Thus Wetstein: "The pur asbeston denotes such a fire as cannot be extinguished before it has consumed and destroyed all." So Kuinoel and Rosenmuller Hammond says: "A fire never quenched till it have done its work." And Bloomfield, speaking of the oriental custom of burning straw and stubble, adds: "The pur asbeston completes the awful image of total destruction."

And the phrase is not peculiar to the Scriptures. Thus in Ecclus. 23: 16; "A hot mind is as a burning fire; it will never be quenched till it be consumed." Ch. 28: 23: "Such as forsake the Lord shall fall into it; and it shall burn in them, and not be quenched; it shall be sent upon them as a lion, and devour them as a leopard." See also a fever described as an unquenchable fire: "R. Chija Bar Abba said, "A greater miracle is wrought upon a sick man than that which was done for Hananiah, Mazael, and Azariah. For their fire could be kindled by any commoner, and extinguished easily (a qualibet re.) But the febrile fire of a sick man, since it is from heaven, who can extinguish?" (Nedarim, f. 41, 1.) Does an incurable fever argue the immortality of the patient? We read also, in Achmet, c. 122: "Burned with an unquenchable fire, with a strong wind." In the Anthology, I. 19, 3: "A fire is soon put out; but a woman is an inextinguishable fire." In the Iliad, 13: 169, 564, a similar phrase occurs, which the scholiast explains as "that which burns down quickly, or is quenched with difficulty." And Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History, b. 6, c. 40, uses the very words in question in describing the martyrdom of christians. Cronion and Julian, he says, were scourged, and afterwards "consumed in an unquenchable fire." And "Epimachus and Alexander, who had continued for a long time in prison, enduring innumerable sufferings from the scourges and scrapers, were also destroyed in an unquenchable fire."

Perfection.

The subject of a full salvation from sin in this world, or holiness, walking with God, sanctification, attaining to a life day after day, year after year, or until we lay our armor down at the feet of Judah's Lion, without sin, is a doctrine the Protestant world at large hate; they do not believe it. Precept may contradict this statement, but a wide-spread example serves for its truthful foundation.

The ground where the true light shines looks to me to be, a church free from sin, saved through the blood of Christ, presented to the Father as the pure Bride, the Lamb's wife;—"Here am I, and the children thou hast given me."

One of three things must be true; either God did not make Adam perfect, or the death of Jesus Christ makes a full and unconditional atonement for the entire race of Adam; or man must be perfected here in probation.

It cannot, or ought not to be questioned, that God made Adam just as he wished him to be, holy. It is certain he fell from that position. Now if it is true that God made Adam what he wished him to be, that is the standard set for man at the beginning; and no matter how low he has fallen, he must by some means be brought back to the same position, or you cannot have a full salvation; I mean, as far as character is concerned. If the death of Christ lowered the standard for his (Adam's) posterity, the question is, how much? or, in what way?

The fact is, if the Atonement covers one sin in one, it equally covers every sin in all. The death of Christ does not atone for a single sin unrepented of; it merely satisfies justice up to the time the promise was made to Adam, from the mouth of God. We do not say this is all the death of Christ purchased; but as far as the forgiveness of sins unrepented of.

We may safely say the Atonement has never lowered the standard God set in the beginning. There is only one way by which man can reach the point from which Adam fell; to blend the law of God, the death of Christ, and the salvation of man together; and that is the way Infinite Wisdom has revealed in the chart of light.

God capacitated man, and required him to keep his law, or render obedience to the requisition of his Maker, and walk in the path in which he placed him. It is just as much required of me to keep the entire law of God, as revealed through Christ, as it was for Adam to refrain from eating the apple in Eden. But I might do all this, since Adam fell, and yet sleep in the chains of the enemy forever, if Christ had not, like the strong man armed, entered the house of the enemy and spoiled his goods. It is in the power of Christ to bring to life every one that sleeps in his purchased possession, but the contract runs so that he can bestow eternal life and immortality upon no one unless they come up to the standard God set in the beginning.

Hence, as obedience to God was required of Adam, even so must we yield a perfect obedience to the law of God; "And he that offends in one point is guilty of all." And as perfection was required of Adam, so it is of us. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

The Religion of Sentiment.

There is the religion of sentiment; it is not the religion of conviction nor of the adoption of the heart, but purely of imagination. It indulges tender and sentimental emotions; it covers up every awful truth in theology with flowers and with perfume; it turns the most sacred truths into plaintive music for its amusement; it is the sentimentality of piety, extremely beautiful; spends its time in working lace for altar-cloths, in preparing priest's robes, in decorating the altar with flowers, in fitting the sanctuary to all the phases of the varying seasons and sentiments; it is the religion of painters, of poets, of sentimentalists, of ecclesiastical decorators, and robe-makers; it is the piety of Athens and the Academy, not of Jerusalem and the Church of God; it shrinks from the storm; it dreads defiling its delicate Sabbath-day and saint-day robes; it has no martyrs; it scarcely lives; it cannot endure; its advocates, as such, will not be saved in the end.—From the Great Tribulation, by Dr. Cumming.

☞ Christian faith is not the committing of one's thoughts, in assent to any proposition, but the trusting of one's being to a being, there to be rested, kept, guided, molded, governed, and possessed forever.

Correspondence.

From R. H. Clark.

Dear Brethren scattered abroad:—Though I have long been separated from you, and deprived of the society of those who believe in the coming kingdom, my sympathies are with you—we are one in spirit. The glorious doctrines of the kingdom sound sweet to me, and I think I prize the privilege of seeing one of like faith more than ever. Absence seems not to weaken but to strengthen my affections for the brethren, and to increase my desires for the spread of the truth and the advancement of the cause of God, which cause lies nearest my heart. O how I wish some of the preaching brethren could sacrifice enough to come here, even up the St. Croix River, and back in the lesser towns, both in Minnesota and Wisconsin. The people are poor in the back towns, but kind-hearted, and one of Christ's messengers would be received as well as in other places. I would therefore say, "Come over and help us," and the Lord will reward you.

I have been preaching the most of the time since I have been here on Sundays, but my circumstances are such that I cannot at present devote my whole time to the work. Many of the people appear to be candid, and say the doctrine looks reasonable; but as in other places, bigoted churchism is opposed to them. Will not some of the brethren write me words of encouragement? How good they are! Their value is not easily estimated. I would highly appreciate them. Cannot Bro. Hastings send some of his tracts and books as silent yet successful preachers of truth? My post office address is Cedar Valley, Polk Co., Wis.

From M. A. Poto.

Brn. and Srs. scattered abroad:—I am very much interested in reading the "Crisis," and hope it may be circulated through the land, that all may be reminded of the evidence of the Savior's speedy return; that a solemn day is now nigh at hand when "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up." Soon the angels will be despatched to sever the wicked from among the just. It will be a day of terror and darkness to the wicked, but to the righteous, who have toiled and suffered in faithfulness here, it will be a glorious day; for then all tears will be wiped away; there will be no more sorrow or crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away. Immortality and eternal life will be their reward. They will take the kingdom under the whole heavens; there will be no place found for the wicked, for the entire earth will belong to the saints of the Most High.

Ye sorrowing ones, in a brief space you will all be there; then "be of good cheer;" this blessed hope, that so long has been a comfort to your poor aching heart, will soon be consummated, you will ere long have a home with God, with Christ, and with all his chosen. There will be nought but love and bliss in all the land. Look all around, you will find no scoffer there; there will be no lip of scorn, no jealous, malignant eye. Yes, these things are so. The vision has so long tarried that we may well look up and expect redemption soon. I often think of the little flock, how they long ere this expected to be safely at home,—of their disappointment in not seeing the King in his beauty at (as they supposed) the appointed time. Truly hope deferred did make the heart sick; but, thank the Lord, they did not all cast away their confidence. To-day many are rejoicing that the blessed One will come and will not tarry.

Dear pilgrims, we can almost hear the rumbling of the chariot wheels, can almost breathe the balmy air. Soon we shall eat of the fruit of Life's fair tree. O! do you not long to be there? Methinks I hear the response from all those that love his appearing—"Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!" If he comes this year we will rejoice; if we must wait until 1866 or 68, we will wait patiently. When we do get home we shall be well rewarded for all we have suffered here. Then let us gird on the armor anew; we shall need it till the warfare is ended; then we may lay it by forever, and enter into that "rest that remains for the people of God," and the more faithful we have been, the sweeter that rest will be.

For the Crisis.

The "Light Ship."

Bro. Grant:—I feel perhaps it would be gratifying to the stockholders to hear of the "Light Ship," which is on the stocks, and which we shall see launched in a couple of weeks, from Bro. Cotton's "ways." I would say that I have seen the manuscript, and am highly pleased with its contents. I think that not only those who travel the waters, but those who travel the land, may find, by taking heed to its freight, something which shall lead them a pilgrimage that will end in glory. No contraband goods are allowed in this vessel; all duties are levied here before we get into port. To those who may be favored with the reading, I bespeak an endorsement of my pleasure in the cargo.

The Destruction of the Wicked.

No. 4.

"What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?"—1 Pet. 4: 17.

"Whose end is destruction."—Phil. 3: 19.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

V. The positive testimony of the Bible that the wicked shall finally and eternally cease to be, demonstrates the certainty of the TOTAL EXTINCTION OF THEIR BEING.

Another passage frequently quoted, to prove the eternal conscious suffering of the wicked, is found in Rev. 14: 11, and reads as follows: "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever; and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." This verse is in the midst of a symbolical prophecy, and consequently cannot be taken in a literal sense. The "beast and his image" which are worshiped, and the "mark" received, as well as "the wine of the wrath of God," and "the cup," mentioned in the preceding verse, are symbols, and applicable only to the characters there represented.

Before this Scripture can be made to bear upon the subject under consideration, it must be shown that it refers to future punishment, after the day of judgment. We will first suppose that this is the case, and inquire if eternal misery is then proved by this text?

Our attention is first called to the word "smoke," which consists of particles of the burning body, and is positive proof that it is being consumed; and unless the consumption can be stopped, it would be wholly consumed away; and if the smoke could not be collected again and reorganized, the being could exist no more. Hence David says, "The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of the Lambs; they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away"—Ps. 37: 20. Thus we see, if Rev. 14: 11 refers to the future punishment of the wicked, it proves, in harmony with other Scriptures, their total destruction. In order to show that the wicked are never reorganized, it is said that the smoke, which arises at the time they are burnt up, ascends forever and ever.

Aion, the word twice rendered "ever" in this verse, is defined as follows: "A space or period of time, especially a lifetime; life; also one's time of life, age, generation; also, one's lot in life, a long space of time, eternity, forever, an era, age, period of a dispensation, this present life, this world."—Lidd and Scott. Forever and everlasting are used in the Bible some two hundred times in a limited sense. They signify the longest duration of that to which they are applied. Let us notice a few examples. The mother of Samuel "said unto her husband, I will not go up till the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide forever," i. e., during his "lifetime."—1 Sam. 1: 22. "The forts and towers shall be for dens forever, . . . until the spirit be poured upon us from on high."—Isa. 32: 14, 15. This forever denotes a "period of time" between two other periods, the whole of which transpires in one's lifetime. When a servant wished to remain with his master, instead of going out free, the following ceremony was to be observed. "His master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him forever"—Ex. 21: 6. This forever represents the remainder of the servant's life. When Jonah was in the whale, he says, "The earth with her bars was about me forever."—Jonah 2: 6. This forever was only three days and nights in length.

These, and many other examples, show that the expression "forever" is indefinite till we learn its connection, and its qualifying words. Those who introduce Rev. 14: 11, to prove eternal suffering, make their main point on the word forever. This "forever" is limited by "day" and "night." The torment of the Devil, as specified in Rev. 20: 10, is limited also by the "day and night" dispensation. Job says, when speaking of the works of God, "He has compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end."—Job 26: 10. Then it follows, that if Rev. 14: 11 refers to the future punishment of the wicked, the forever and ever is limited by the succession of day and night, which is to come to an end; consequently the torments of the wicked and of the Devil must end. We learn, that since the flood the waters have been compassed with specific bounds; but when the saints enter the new earth, there is to be "no more sea."—Rev. 21: 1. Then the bounds of the waters are moved, and day and night will have come to an end, when the new earth is given to Christ and his children. Then "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," and "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold;" and there will be no more night after the meek inherit the earth; consequently, if the point could be sustained that Rev. 14: 11 refers to the future punishment of the wicked, it is evident that their torment must come to an end.

But we think it may be plainly shown that the events symbolized in Rev. 14: 10, 11, transpire before the judgment, and therefore before the final punishment of the wicked. The next verse reads, "Here is the patience of the saints." We can see no reason why the saints will need to exercise patience after they have entered the new earth, and the wicked are "cut off." We read a little further, and come to the preparation "for the harvest of the earth;" thus proving positively, that the final punishment of the wicked is not brought to view in the 11th verse. The harvest must take place before the judgment, and the punishment of the wicked subsequently to both. After reading the account of the harvest, we then come to the work of the "seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God." As these are the seven last, and fill "up the wrath of God," there can be no more to come after these are completed. We read on, and learn that "no man was able to enter into the temple till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled." If the angels are to be eternally fulfilling the seven last plagues, then it follows that "no man" will ever enter into the temple.

Other Scriptures, as cited in previous articles, have positively declared that the wicked shall be punished upon the earth, indeed, we have not been able to find a single passage to show they will be punished anywhere else. Let us see if the effect of the seven last plagues is upon the earth; if so, the point is fully confirmed. We read on to the beginning of chap. 16, and we find where the angels begin to execute their great work, and that the effect of all the vials is upon the earth. Subsequent to all this, after the wicked are destroyed, we have the fulfillment of the great promise, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." From the foregoing considerations, we do not see how Rev. 14: 11 can be made to prove the doctrine of eternal suffering.

Sometimes we are met with the parable of the rich man and Lazarus as proof of eternal misery; but this can have no bearing upon the subject, as all admit it refers to what takes place before the judgment, and the wicked are not to be punished till afterward.

We turn now to Matt. 25: 46, which is thought to be the strongest passage in the Bible to prove the doctrine of eternal conscious suffering. It reads, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." The word aionion, rendered "eternal" in this verse, is the same that is rendered "everlasting," and shows that the punishment of the wicked continues as long as the life of the righteous. On this point we have no doubts.

The question now arises, what constitutes the punishment of the wicked? The word kolasin, rendered "punishment" in this verse, does not answer the inquiry. It is from kolazo, which signifies "to curtail," "check," "prune," "to chastise," "correct," "punish."—Liddell and Scott. We find no classic author who defines the word to mean suffering.

If we turn to other portions of Scripture, we find the nature of future punishment most clearly defined. In 2 Thess. 1: 9, Paul is inspired to say that those who "obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ shall be punished with (aionion) everlasting DESTRUCTION." This answers the question in 1 Pet. 4: 17, "What shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel of God?" This is a plain and positive answer. So is also Rom. 6: 21–23, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is DEATH. But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end, everlasting life. For the wages of sin is DEATH; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." After describing a very wicked class in the first chapter of Romans, Paul says, in verse 32, "They which commit such things are worthy of DEATH." What is death? Thanatos, the word rendered death in these passages, is defined "extinction of life." Mr. Webster defines it to be "that state of a being in which there is total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions." Death is the point where dying ceases.

The question now arises, is "destruction," or "death," a punishment? Is it any loss to lose life? If not, why is death considered the capital or greater punishment? Says President Edwards, the younger, "Endless annihilation is an endless or infinite punishment. It is an endless loss, not only of all the good which the man at present enjoys, but of all the good which he would have enjoyed throughout eternity, in the state of bliss to which he would have been admitted if he had never sinned." Herman Witsius, author of "Economy of the Covenants," says: "May it not in its measure be reckoned an infinite punishment, should God please to doom man, who was by nature a candidate for eternity, to total annihilation, from which he shall never be suffered to return to life."

As upon the name of the traitor Arnold, so upon those who are destroyed by the Lord for their rebellion against his government, rests "everlasting shame and contempt."

It should be observed that there are no qualifying words attached to future life, showing that one class of men are to have a "happy eternal life," and another, a "miserable eternal life," but it is simply life and death. The righteous have eternal life, and the wicked the opposite, or eternal death.

As eternal life is the greatest possible reward, so eternal death is the greatest possible punishment. The wicked lose all that the righteous gain. Man prizes this life higher than all the world beside. If this short existence is so valuable, when crowded with perplexing cares, pain and sorrow, is it no punishment to lose an eternal life of glory?

The question is often asked, "How can the wicked be punished when they are dead?" Death is their punishment, and does not begin till they are dead. Suppose this punishment was imprisonment, when would it commence? When they were put in prison. How long would it continue? As long as they were kept in prison. If the punishment were death, when would it begin? Not till they were dead. How long would the punishment continue? So long as they were deprived of life. If they never lived again it would be eternal punishment. The last mention of punishment in the Bible is found in Rev. 21: 8. "But the fearful and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death." We learn from Peter that the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is set forth as an "ensample unto those that after should live ungodly."—2 Peter 2: 6. When the wicked die the "SECOND DEATH," we find it is to be accomplished by fire and brimstone, after the manner of Sodom's destruction. As "the wages of sin is DEATH," from which there is no resurrection, it must of necessity be eternal punishment. Then sin is "finished," because every sinner in the universe is dead.

In this we see justice, love and mercy combined. Justice demands that the incorrigible sinners shall die. As they stand in the judgment, weeping, wailing and gnashing their teeth, love and mercy say destroy them and put them out of misery. In their destruction, justice, love and mercy are all satisfied. Oblivion's waves eternally cover them; for "THEY SHALL BE AS THOUGH THEY HAD NOT BEEN."—Oba. 16.

Castleton.

The good work of the Lord is still onward in this place, notwithstanding the strong and continued sectarian influence against it. As we observe the movements of the people around, we are often led to exclaim, "these are strange times!" Every false and evil report that can possibly be started against us is sure to find believers, who seem to delight in passing the reproach through community, but none of these things move us. We remember the Savior has said, "Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy; for, behold, your reward is great in heaven."—Luke 6: 22, 23. We feel as though we understood the meaning of this Scripture from "blessed" experience.

If those who are standing opposed to this great work could only taste for one hour the joys we feel in the service of the Lord, and the comforts of the "blessed hope" which they now think is so erroneous, we should have no fears that they would ever reproach us again. Did they but know how we love the Bible and its Author, we are sure they would call us infidels no more.

It is a well known fact that all who embrace, defend, and obey the very truths, for the preaching of which we receive so much severe censure, are led to love God and his word better than ever before. And on the contrary, those who oppose them, after they have had a chance to hear, go backward, instead of onward, in divine life. Why is this so, if we are spreading such awful heresy, as some believe? Is Christ divided? Does he sanction opposites? Here is a goodly number who have been active and consistent members of churches for years, that have recently heard and embraced the doctrine of the sleep of the dead, the destruction of the wicked, the literal and speedy coming of Christ, who say, without exception, we "have received new joy, peace and love, and never took so much delight in reading the Bible as now." If these are such soul-destroying errors, why does the Lord bless us so wonderfully in their promulgation? and why are so many led to repent of their sins, and commence his service, when they believe them? We most heartily wish that those who think we are "the enemies of the cross of Christ," would come into one of our love-feasts and hear the joyful testimonies of some sixty or seventy young converts; some of whom were known a few weeks since as miserable, drinking, profane, Sabbath breakers, but now as happy, praying men; and we think they would say, "This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes."

It does not seem right that those who claim to be the children of the Lord should be so much more particular than he is. We are confident that it is ever safe to co-operate with the Savior wherever he condescends to pour out his Spirit in the awakening and conversion of the people, though he should bless the labors of those who may differ with us on some points of doctrine.

We think all christians should unite their labors in harmony with the Lord, when he is awakening the careless and backslidden, and spare no effort in persuading people to become the disciples of Jesus. We hope those who have stood aloof from this great work of the Most High, will come and rejoice with us, and be blessed as others have been.

During the last nine years we have preached in a large number of towns, cities and villages in eight different states, have seen hundreds converted to Christ, and met thousands who believed the very truths that some think such "gross errors;" and we have yet to learn that one has loved the Lord and the Bible less for believing them; but on the contrary, it has made them stronger than ever in the principles of christianity. There are many happy examples around us to confirm this statement. I am led to inquire, why is this so, if God be not with us?

The church in Castleton is a living and growing one, happy in the Lord. Their prayer meetings are excellent. They have four or five a week, when they do not have preaching, and they are well attended. New ones are seeking and finding the Lord, and rejoicing in his love.

Last Lord's day, June 17th, we had a large and attentive congregation. We met in the morning for a love-feast, and had a heart-cheering season. Sixty spoke in less than an hour; and their testimonies moistened many eyes. Nine more have been baptized, making eighty-eight in all; and others intend to follow Jesus in this ordinance next Lord's day.

"Conversation and Reading."

We clip the following sensible remarks from the American Presbyterian. When people love to read fiction it is sure evidence they have lost their love for truth. When speaking of the cause of the "deficiency in the conversational faculty among the women of our time, the writer says

"One of very considerable potency, we take to be the unfortunate disposition and practice with young women to devote most of their spare time to works of fiction.

It will surprise him who for a moment reflects how large an amount of this substance or shadow, rather, may be taken into the mind without any perceptible increase in its growth. The literature of fiction yields, unquestionably, a large amount of excitement of a certain kind. Like some other stimulants, however, it leaves its victims in a state of mental vacuity. If it happens at times to partake less of the sensation type, we shall find it still wanting in all those qualities best calculated either to enlarge, to invigorate or to enrich the mind. Fiction is essentially unsuggestive, and instead of stimulating the thinking or the reasoning faculties, actually disposes to somnolency and languor.

Fiction, even if it does not contaminate, in other words, if it be what is called moral fiction, brings little indeed, we think, either to warm the heart or elevate the sentiments.

That class of fiction termed the best by some—we mean that which is based on the actual persons, or events of historic record—yields but meagre returns for his perusal, who seeks to enrich his memory with topics safely suited to the purposes of conversation. For on the score of real knowledge, he will find that the license usually taken with facts, and the false lights which it throws over characters and scenes, but lead to bewilder and dazzle the blind; and this to such a degree as to make it scarcely doubtful if it be not a serious misfortune, that the actual facts, events, and personages of history should ever have been pressed into the service of fiction.

It has been wittily and truly said, that no watches so thoroughly deceive us as those which are sometimes right. Could anything be more applicable than this, to what are usually denominated "historical novels?"

Truth to all, but prominently to the young, is of the most vital importance; and the real and practical in all periods of life, and for all purposes, are of vastly higher value than the romantic and the visionary. Besides, the practice in early life of reading for the mere amusement of the fancy, inevitably leads to the ultimate avoidance of reading whatever fails to amuse. They who enter on life accustomed to naught but trifling and shadowy themes, will grapple reluctantly, indeed, with those of real solidity and importance, when these, as they must, present themselves in their turn.

Works of fiction, it might be supposed, would furnish conversation, if not with others, at least with those who are themselves accustomed to their perusal, but strange to say, fiction does not even perform this office well! The leading hits, the salient points of a few, or of a number of quaint or striking characters, startling adventures, or wild scenes, by repetition, soon pall on the minds of those to whom, from previous perusal, they are already familiar; and we can scarcely conceive of a more dreary punishment than that of two confirmed novel readers, condemned exclusively to each other's society for any length of time, with no other mental aliment than the re-hash which their memories might be able to reproduce from this unsubstantial source. . . . .

Nothing can come of nothing; and how should the power of conversation, which is in itself an elegant as well as a useful art, be the result of a mental training like this?

Stirring Events.

In these days, people may well say "stirring events" are at hand. We are disappointed if we do not find startling news in every daily paper; such as thirty years since would not occur once in months. Murder is so common, that we pass the bloody tale with as little surprise as would be occasioned by an ordinary death, a quarter of a century since. Crime of every description, especially of the blackest dye, is increasing with alarming rapidity, and people may well pause and inquire, what do these things mean? Well, it does not look much like "the conversion of the world," unless it be to sin and Satan. The tide of iniquity is rising with great rapidity. State and Church seem hastening to the focus of general confusion, with no prospect of improvement till Jesus comes. "Distress of nations, with perplexity," is a leading heading in the world's programme from the present to the close of earth's great drama.

Present appearances indicate that Napoleon III., Garibaldi and the Pope, will act very prominent parts in the closing tragedy. Garibaldi has already begun an earnest work in Sicily, and met with great success against the Papal power. Says a Paris correspondent:

"We may conclude that, as far as regards Sicily, the contest is nearly at an end. Messina must soon fall, and then the island placed under a Provisional Government, with Garibaldi at its head, will be an independent Power in Europe. What will be the acts of the Dictator we have yet to learn, but it is not likely that he will sit down in quiet, or think anything done while anything remains to do. The man who, like a Norman adventurer of old, made his descent with two shipfulls of followers and conquered a kingdom in three weeks, is hardly likely to settle down now that he rules a population of more than 2,000,000, and has the spoils of the Neapolitan Arsenals with which to equip the levies who will join him. We may certainly look for some stirring events on the mainland. Italy is in such state that boldness is the best, and, indeed, the only possible policy. The Royal party at Naples is panic-stricken, and the discontent of the people, roused into fury by the news from Sicily, may anticipate any movements of Garibaldi. In short he seems to be more busy in organizing the war that is to come, than in conducting the war now in progress. This deserves attention."

Wine Drinking.

The following interesting and practical remarks on the use of wine are from the pen of Dr. E. Nott. He says:

The recently exhumed Bacchus from the ruins of Pompeii, with a cluster of ripe grapes in his hand, from which he is expressing its juice into a vase to be drank by assembled guests, is in evidence that the office of the cup-bearer in ancient Greece, as well as ancient Egypt, was to express the pure unfermented, and therefore unintoxicating blood of the grape to be drank in the courts of kings, as afterwards it came to be drank in the offices of religion, drank at the wedding in Cana of Galilee, drank at the last paschal supper, drank at the first supper of our Lord, and is to be drank with his disciples in the kingdom of his Father; but in all these instances, the wine drank, and to be drank, was new unfermented, and therefore unintoxicating wine."

For the Crisis.

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(FROM NOTES BY J. F. COTTON.)

FOURTH EVENING.

Mr. Grant. The question for debate this evening is—Is immortality the gift of God, dependent on the character of the receiver? Last evening we endeavored to show that the affirmative is true, as the Bible says, "all the wicked will God destroy." Before proceeding, we will notice a few remarks made by our friend on the preceding evening. He said that we have found out that devils and wicked men made themselves. In this we are much misrepresented. We said that they made themselves wicked by their own acts. We have proof that angels sinned and fell; and surely no one will say that man was created in sin.

It has been remarked that "demons are the spirits of wicked men, and were so considered by the ancients"; only by some, others believed differently. Homer thought they were the souls of men; and Thales, a Greek philosopher, who died five hundred and forty-eight years before Christ, said they never had been embodied as men. Plato says, "The demons hold a middle place between God and men." Justyn Martyr calls the demon who tempted Eve, "The man-hating demon." Tatian says that "the demons who govern men are not the souls of men." Tertullion held the opinion "that they were invisible beings, endowed with spiritual power, living in the air, attending on particular persons." We might bring many such proofs to show that they are the angels which sinned.

"Tartarus." "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down into hell (Tartarus), and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment."—2 Pet. 2: 4. Our opponent asserts that Tartarus is in the bowels of the earth. Some of the ancients thought so, and others differently. Dr. Parkhurst says, "It appears from a passage in Lucian, that by Tartarus was meant, in a physical sense, the bounds or verge of this material system." Dr. Ramsey says that "Tartarus means, according to Greek writers, in a physical sense, the bounds or verge of this material system." This word which Peter uses, and which is translated hell, is found nowhere else in the New Testament. Dr. Whately remarks that this word refers to our earth "with its dull clouds, foul vapors and misty atmosphere." Socrates and Plato call it the abyss; and the latter calls also the earth Tartarus. Plutarch says it is our air, from being cold, as also do Homer and Hesiod. When Christ was on earth the demons talked to him. How could they do so if they were confined in the earth in chains and darkness?

Our friend said that the Bible says "The dead praise the Lord." We hold that it teaches the contrary, as is verified by Ps. 115: 18, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence."

My opponent quotes from John 11: "They shall never die." Let us look at the passage. "And Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this?" Wakefield renders it thus: "And no man living who believeth in me will die forever." The point in this is the resurrection of the dead. Jesus says to Martha, "He that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." Those last are those which Paul says "shall be changed," who if they believed not should die the "second death."

My opponent says that I admit that wicked spirits do come back. I have admitted no such thing, forasmuch as there is nothing to come back unless the breath of lives, unless the man himself comes back. In the vision of Ezekiel of the valley of dry bones, "bone came to bone, and sinews and flesh came upon them, but there was no breath in them." Then comes the breath—they are vivified and spring into life an exceeding great army. After Christ said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," he did not go to heaven, or, if so, he remained only three days; and after his resurrection he said, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." It has been said that Christ did not literally die. We shall see. Heb. 2: 16:—"For verily he took not on him the nature of angels: but he took on him the seed of Abraham." Phil. 2: 8:—"And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." In Luke 23: 41, we read, "And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit, and having said this he gave up the ghost." Some translators render it, "I commend my breath," and that which is rendered "gave up the ghost" is expneo, and signified "to breathe out," "make an end of," "expire," "die"; and it is translated "expired" in the above verse by Sawyer, Whiting, Wesley, Campbell, and also in the Syriac, and in the "Emphatic Diaglot." If Christ were not literally dead the records are not true, and the lie is given to the following testimony of the son of God himself (Rev. 1: 18): "I am he that lived and was dead: and behold, I am alive for evermore, amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." Stephen commended his spirit into the hands of God, and afterwards fell asleep. We think the martyr was literally dead, for they buried him. Paul in speaking of the state of the dead says, "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep."

We affirm that the spirit is not the man, but the principle of life. And my friend, who claims for the soul inherent immortality, contradicts Matt. 10: 28, for it is there admitted that there is a possibility of the destruction of soul and body.

My friend refers to "the redemption of the body" as spoken of by Paul, and says that it means the "body of humanity." Does not this prove too much and overthrow his position that there is no literal resurrection from the dead?

We now come to our proposition that "all shall not inherit the kingdom of God. 1 Cor. 6: 9, 10,—"Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?" etc. Daniel 7: 27:—"But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Matt. 5: 5:—"Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." Matt. 25: 34:—"Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom," etc. We see the character of those who shall inherit the new heaven and new earth which Peter looked for.

In Philippians 3: 18, 19, Ps. 37: 20, Matt. 13: 40, and 2 Pet. 2: 6, we see the inevitable fate of the wicked and the ungodly. This consigning them to the "second death" proves that all have not immortality. [Time.]

Mr. Loveland. I feel the most sincere pity for my brother, in his assuming his present unfortunate position. He says that he believes the Bible and relies on the Bible, insinuating that I do not, because I am a Spiritualist. Now so far from this being the fact, we, as Spiritualists, believe more of the Bible than any denomination of Christians; and moreover shall compel them to admit the truth of our doctrines or reject the Bible entirely. (Cheers and hisses.) We do not say that Spiritualism rests exclusively upon the Bible; but ignore Spiritualism and the Bible has no foundation whatever. (Applause and hisses and cries of oh, oh.) But (turning to Mr. Grant) is this the man who believes the Bible?

Mr. Grant. Yes, sir.

Mr. Loveland. He says he does. Yet he must deny, or explain away, or give away altogether its most simple histories, or his theory falls at once to the ground. The materialist, like "the natural man, receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned." Paul, in speaking of himself and co-laborers, says, "God hath made us able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." "To be carnally-minded is death." I do not use this in an offensive sense. Jesus said "the words I speak unto you are spirit, and they are life." I don't suppose the words he spoke were breath. And I would ask, without reference to the various construction which is put on it, whether it be "wind" or "breath" what is the "breath?" He will not surely say that foolish thing, that the last gasp of a dying man is this "breath." Instead of listening to passage after passage to show where, or how often it appears, let us hear what are its properties, what its qualities. We had better have a fair meaning. It would seem, from the history of man's creation, that it was something which God breathed into the inanimate clay, not merely "air" but that which had a vivifying power, even as Jesus is said to be "a life-giving spirit." The mode of argument pursued by my brother, where he sticks so close to the letter, reminds me of that adopted by Luther in controversy with other reformers. The subject was what was termed the "real presence" in the bread and wine of the eucharist, or transubstantiation. Luther contended for it, on the letter, although he disbelieved it. To his opponents' arguments and explanations he read from his Latin Bible "Hoc est corpus meum—this is my body," It was there and they could not drive him from his position. "The bread is the body," for so says the book: and so says my literal brother. If spirits mean "breath," then the good spirits are the "sweet breath" and the evil spirits the "foul breath." This harping upon the literalism of a few texts of scripture, has consigned thousands to the grave and the darkness of despair. If Christ came to redeem them from the power of death, he has signally failed, for men still die.

In regard to the question where Tartarus is, if I understand aright, Homer and Hesiod teaches that it is in the bowels of the earth. I do not stand before you to explain the mystery of heathen mythology, but as the subject has been brought up again, I say, that the supposition is that Tartarus is in the bowels of the earth; an idea in harmony with many classic writers. My brother, by giving it so many locations, shows that he does not know where to place it.

As to "fallen angels" he has not proved an iota against the position that demons are the spirits of wicked men. My brother quotes the passage, "He took not upon him the nature of angels." He might know that the word "nature" is not in the text. 'He took not hold of angels," is the literal rendering.

"The dead praise not the Lord." I have quoted a number of passages to prove that multitudes do praise him, and I leave my brother to reconcile the discrepencies as he can. My brother says if Christ went down into hell he could not have gone to his Father; and yet David says "though I make my bed in hell, thou are there"; consequently if Christ went there he must have found his Father. But I have submitted proof enough on this point.

My brother says that "demons cannot come back because they are already here." I have never advanced the idea that these beings ever were cast down into hell; and my opponent has failed to prove it. "The spirits of just men made perfect." This passage my brother does not seem to like, as he has not noticed it. I will do it for him. The word rendered "perfect" had among the early christians a peculiar signification and applied to those who had perfected their christian character by martyrdom. Paul says "for when I have suffered all things that I may be a partaker of eternal life," he means that he shall have reached the climax of devotion when he has "laid down his life for his friend." He expected to be perfected by martyrdom and the resurrection of the dead. To comprehend the meaning "of rise again" we must attentively read 1 Cor. 15. After arguing and explaining Paul's exposition, he cooly turns around and denies the analogy. But we are accustomed to his denials where the passage conflicts with his theory. My brother says that the illustration of the seed does not, in its analogy, apply to man. Paul says it does, in these words, "so also is the resurrection of the dead." Who is right, he, or Paul? A natural body is sown, a spiritual body is raised. [Time.]

Mr. Grant. We have perceived that our friend has not noticed the strong passages which we have brought forward. He promised to follow us closely. We have endeavored to reply to every one of his positions, and we see little in them to notice save that they have somewhat helped us along. He has said that we do not believe the Bible. To this we plead "not guilty" and defy him to prove his charge.

Mr. Loveland. I have already done so.

Mr. Grant. We would like him to do it again. We do not see how he can do it, after he has charged us with being too literal. He asks us "what is breath?" That which is in man's nostrils. My friend says that I call "spirit breath in all cases," when I have repeatedly said that the word has four significations. He talks about "angels and demons" being "breath," and we affirm that there is not an immaterial intelligence in the universe.

Mr. Loveland. We admit that.

Mr. Grant. Thank you. My friend says that "Christ had no need to take upon him the nature of angels." Very well, we won't dispute it. But it is worse for his side of the argument, for it proves that angels are not men. He says we have not noticed "spirits of just men made perfect." We have answered it several times already. He says we deny the analogy in the "dying" and "rising." Man does not come up like a stalk of grain, bearing fifty and an hundred fold. Nor does Paul teach analogy in this point.

We now come back to the real subject of discussion. If the wicked are to be destroyed, then all shall not inherit eternal life. In the symbol of the vine and the branches our Lord illustrated the connection of himself and his people. So long as a branch remains healthy it obtains nourishment and bears fruit; but when it ceases to do so, it is "cast forth and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burned."—John 15: 6. The wicked are here symbolized by the withered branch. And in Matt. 3: 12, they are compared to chaff. "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." If the fire could be quenched then might some be saved; but Malachi says that of the wicked there shall be left neither root nor branch. And when this can be said of a tree, we ask how much of it does exist? If there were anything salvable in the wicked, why were they not likened to gold and silver instead of the destructible materials, tares, chaff, thorns and withered branches? If I am spiritualizing or explaining away those texts, will my friend please show it to me? We shall now look at the last mention of punishment in the Bible. Rev. 21: 8.—"But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

We now come to the second proposition in the affirmative, that immortality is the gift of God, depending upon the character of the receiver. Matt. 19: 16:—"And behold, one came and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" Jesus told him that to receive eternal life he must "keep the commandments." Here is the thing desired, and the conditions upon which it is to be obtained. In Mark 10: 30, we are assured that those who have sacrificed for Christ, the world with its affections and lusts, "shall receive a hundred fold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions, and in the world to come eternal life." John 3: 14, 15.—"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Here are conditions again. John 6: 40.—"And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son of man and believeth on him, may have eternal life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Here it is again, the conditional gift. Again Titus 1: 2, "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, has promised before the world began." You see it is promised, not given. We do not hope for that which is ours already; and it would be foolish to promise a man the thing he is even now possessed of. Rom. 6: 23—"For the wages of sin is death: but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The gift is in accordance with the character of the receiver. Spiritualists deny the salvation through Christ. The Atonement is the great fundamental truth of the Bible. Spiritualists repudiate it, and yet have the effrontery to assert that they believe it more than any of the christian denominations; and also that we are in the dark as relates to spiritual things. This we leave the people to decide. All the phenomena of spiritualism may be accounted for in the Bible; and where our views do not harmonize with the Word of God, we challenge our opponent to show.

The affirmative of this question is sustained by the scripture which states that immortality is a thing sought for and obtained by a certain course of conduct. Rom, 2: 7.—"To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life." Now if this does not meet the proposition what does. No language could be plainer. If we are too literal, do not charge us with being too spiritual. By reading 1 Tim. 6: 15, 16, we will see who has this immortality which our friend makes so universal. "Which in his times he shall show, who is the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto: whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to whom be glory and power everlasting. Amen."

If my friend's position be true, why is the Bible altogether silent upon it. If the immortality of the soul is a profitable doctrine why has Paul not said a word about it. In Acts 20: 20 "And now I have kept back nothing profitable unto you." Therefore it is not profitable. "For I have not shunned to declare all the counsel of God." Therefore is it not in the councils of God. With these irrefragible proofs must I believe that all men are immortal, upon the lying testimony of demons. No, no. The Bible sustains us in our position, and nature will not contradict it. My friend has tried to overthrow it; but his efforts, with those of thousands before him, have all been a total failure. [Time.].

For the Crisis.

"Our Paper."

BY M. MATHEWS.

How sweet to be permitted to hear from one another, as we journey to eternity. How careful God is that his people shall have some source of joy, so that the sorrows of time, as they come dashing in mad fury, shall not overwhelm them. How thankful we ought to be for these blessings. Brother, sister, don't you love "The World's Crisis"? Do you ever thank God for it? What should we do, were we to be deprived of hearing the voice of the Church, a band here, a solitary soldier there,—one struggling with Satan, another winning souls to God, one doing great and another small things. They tell us of their joys and sorrows. The toilworn one seeks our sympathies; the other, weak and faltering, our prayers. The strong, the mighty, exhort us to faithfulness. Here are testimonies from the aged, telling us how steadfast a friend Jesus has proved to them, and then follows sweet, small voices, telling their determinations to test His friendship.

O! I love to read the Crisis. God's people are out on the great battle-field of life; and it is cheering and interesting to hear from those noble soldiers, who have turned away from the tempting allurements of the world, refused its pleasures, its wealth, honors, and all that nature calls lovely, or that the natural man desires. Yes, how sublime a company, all fighting under the banner of King Jesus. They have voted for this King in preference to all earthly monarchs, and are out to prove their loyalty. No wonder they seem happy,—here 'mid vexatious perplexities, and Satan ruling o'er land and sea, still they think of the mighty Conqueror about to come, and joy unspeakable fills each heart.

Above everybody, it does seem that those who are looking for the Lord, if in a prepared state, must be happy. Why, with such a solid foundation on which to stand, reason, logic, and the sciences, besides the blessed Bible, their faith must be strong enough to smash in fragments all the spiritualized, immaterial, nonsensical arguments of the opposer, though they come from the great of earth. Then prize the Crisis, pay for it, write for it, and bless God for the truth it teaches.

Obituary Notices.

Calmly fell asleep in Jesus, in Portland, Me., May 13th, 1860, Sister Mary Augusta, daughter of Bro. John and Sister Abigail Brooks, aged eighteen years, seven months, seventeen days.

Augusta became interested for her salvation in Feb., 1859, under the labors of Bro. E. Burnham and M. Grant, and at that time gave her heart to the Lord. Soon after she was baptized by Bro. B. S. Emery, and lived the religion of the gospel. Her natural amiable disposition and gentleness of mind, sanctified by the love and truth of Jesus, soon won for her a large circle of warm-hearted friends.

Although of a frail constitution, and often sick, she was ever patient, and her last illness, which was severe, she bore with true christian fortitude. When all around her were weeping that she must so soon leave them, she meekly said, "Weep not for me." Her last words were those of comfort and encouragement, and as a sweet flower drops its head and dies, she calmly expired, in hope of soon being raised again to enjoy that blessed land where "the inhabitants say no more, I am sick."

The sobs and tears of the large number of persons who attended her funeral, told plainly how deep and strong was their love for Sister Augusta. May the dear father, mother, and all the bereaved ones, be sustained by the gospel hope, and be prepared to greet our beloved sister in the soon coming kingdom of Jesus. R. R. York.

Died, in Slocumville, R. I., Aug. 13th, 1859, Hannah Tisdale.

She was sick but a few weeks. Sat up every day during her sickness. Took her bed on the 13th, about five o'clock in the afternoon, and seemed to fall into a sweet sleep; but breathed her last that evening, at ten o'clock. She was kind and affectionate to all, and manifested a christian spirit in all she said or did. Has left a widowed mother, two brothers and four sisters to mourn her loss. The happiest one among us is numbered with the dead. Nothing will comfort our hearts but the thought of having her brought back to life again.

Eld. P. Tillinghast, assisted by P. C. Rodman, comforted us from Col. 3: 4.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

[From Liverpool the 9th.]

Letters from Rome of the 5th say that fresh bands were menacing the frontiers, to which Gen. Lamoriciere had sent more troops. Numerous families were arriving from Naples. The French government had ordered ships to Naples to embark French subjects there.

The Times' Paris correspondent writes that the Sicilian insurgents have captured Girgenti.

There is a rumor current of a French loan of 40,000,000 francs; also a Russian loan of 8,000,000 sterling.

Turin, 8th.—Advices from Palermo of the 4th state that Garibaldi had issued a decree for the organization of the Sicilians.

The Neapolitan troops still occupy their positions at Palermo. Many desertions had taken place from their ranks.

Orders have been sent to all the garrisons in Sicily to concentrate at Messina, where entrenchments will be formed.

Catania had been bombarded and pillaged. There was a strict blockade between Calabria and Sicily.

Turin letters say that the Sardinian Government will have to support Garibaldi by going to war with Naples, or put down an insurrection at home.

It is reported that M. Cavour is about to send a Commissioner Extraordinary to Sicily. All the men-of-war at Genoa and Spezzia are to be prepared for sea.

The Sicilian Insurrection.—"Garibaldi, in letters from Salerni and Calatafimi, praises the zeal of the Sicilian insurgents, and, speaking of the Neapolitan troops, says they were more determined in their resistance than the Austrians last year in Lombardy. A despatch from Cagliari of the 2d June announces the safe arrival of volunteers, arms, and amunition. Messina, on the 28th of May, was quite deserted, the people having taken refuge in the shipping."

Later.—The Turin dispatch speaking of the terms of the capitulation says—"The Neapolitan troops are to embark with arms and baggage. They are to encamp till their embarkation on the Monte Pelegrino."

The fort of Castillamare has been placed in the keeping of the English Admiral until the evacuation has been effected.

Garibaldi has issued a decree calling on all Sicilians to arms between the ages of seventeen and fifty years.

Fifty vessels of war were in the roads of Palermo.

The Opinione Nationale gives a rumor that France had, with the consent of Piedmont, accepted the mediation proposed by Naples.

The conditions of the mediation are—a liberal Constitution for Naples and a separate government for Sicily under a Prince of the House of Bourbon, subject to the condition that the Sicilians give their consent.

It is said that Mazzini has embarked for Sicily. The Sardinian Government has ordered its fleet and all the authorities along the coast to apprehend him if possible.

FRANCE.

The Emperor would leave Paris on the 15th for Baden, there to meet the Prince Regent of Prussia, and other German sovereigns.

The evacuation of Italy by the French troops is completed.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian government had resolved upon increasing the effective strength of the second army in Venetia, and a corps of cavalry is also to be collected in the Italian Tyrol, that part of the Austrian territory nearest Lombardy.

ITEMS.

Tornadoes and other Atmospheric Phenomena.—Another fierce tornado has swept over a portion of the West, destroying life and property to an extent more fearful than any of those dreadful visitations which have preceded it. This, we believe, is the fourth destructive tornado recorded this summer, one of which occurred in our own State, and never before, perhaps, did the same number take place at so early a period of the season. It is very rarely that these storms are heard of before midsummer, and their early and frequent appearance this year is only an additional instance of the many curious atmospheric phenomena which have characterized our climate for some time past. For instance, while these tornadoes have been more numerous, we have heard of less earthquakes than usual of late. Again, the breaking up of the late winter season has been particularly free from freshets—indeed, we hardly remember one of a very serious or destructive character. The dry season, of an unprecedented duration, which has just ended in New England, and to which many attribute the fatal cattle disease now ravaging there, is also one of the most unusual instances of continued drought perhaps ever known on this part of the Continent. All these phenomena indicate some change; but what it is, or whence it comes, no one knows. It would be well for scientific men to give these facts some consideration, and let us have some explanation, if possible. They are very curious, and are not without their meaning.—N. Y. Herald.

The St. Joseph (Mo.) Democrat of June 8th says: "A general feeling of gloom pervades all classes in this usually prosperous part of the State, and unless the parched earth is speedily visited with copious rains, it is evident that we are to have a repetition of the famous famine year of 1833."

The Tornado Season.—Within a fortnight there have been four in the middle and Western States, one extending from Louisville up to Central Ohio, one in Cattaraugus county in Western New York, one in Armstrong and the adjoining counties in western Illinois, surpassing all others in violence and destructiveness. By the storm along the Ohio not less than one hundred lives were lost, mostly in coal boats; by the storm in Pennsylvania some ten or twelve victims are reported; but the last and greatest visitation in Iowa and Illinois has left at least 150 dead bodies, with more than double that number of persons injured or dying. Altogether, the number of deaths within the last month, which may be placed to the account of the tornado, cannot be less than three hundred. Whole counties are in mourning, and many persons will long remember with sorrow the wind-storms of 1860. The destruction of property is incalculable; but in the city of Alton alone, the total loss is estimated at $200,000, and in Camanche, $250,000.

Notices, &c.

Dedication in Vernon, Vt.

Our new chapel will be dedicated to the service of God on Saturday, July 7th. Bro. Himes and Grant are expected to attend, and remain with us over Sunday.

E. G. Scott.

Notice.

Barn Meeting in Kingston, N. H., July 4th, morning and afternoon. Eld. Himes will speak, and Eld. Grant is invited to come, if consistent with other duties, and aid in the meeting. Let there be a general gathering, and keep the day for God and the kingdom. If pleasant, the exercises will be held in a grove near Franklin Gales, Kingston.

Grove Meeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a grove meeting on the farm occupied by David Randall, about a mile and a half north of the Providence and Hartford Turnpike, the 4th day of July. Persons from abroad may stop at Scituate and Foster Academy. Ministers from abroad are expected to preach the Word. Let there be a general gathering of the family of Jesus. Meeting in the same place as last year.

M. R. Phettaplace.

Notice.

I will say to Eld. M. Chandler and others West, there are some tracts at Earlville, Illinois, I received from Tract Fund just before I left. Send orders to A. A. Burlingame.

W. Pratt.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

For the Crisis.

"I am Weary."

Air—"I love thee."

I'm weary of wandering o'er earth's dreary waste,
And long with my Savior forever to rest,
With all the dear children and Jesus to dwell,
And with lungs immortal God's praises to swell.

The hope of the Gospel to-day is my hope,
It is a sure anchor with faith for its rope;
'Mid the tossing of billows and raging of waves,
The tempest and whirlwind it always outbraves.

This hope, yes, the hope of the Gospel, is mine,
No more will I linger, no more will repine;
But onward, still onward, my progress shall be,
Till the glorious coming of Jesus I see.

For the grand consummation of Israel's hope
And Jesus' appearing I'm still looking up,
Though sadness and sorrow my brow now o'ershade,
In God's glorious kingdom no tears will be shed.

The night of our mourning will soon pass away,
The day of Christ's coming, that glorious day,
Will soon break upon us with splendor most bright,
And banish forever the darkness of night.

The light as the noonday in splendor will shine,
In the bowers of the kingdom we then may recline;
The pure in their white robes their Savior will see,
From sin, pain and sorrow forever be free.

The vision which John saw, by faith now I see,
Life's river of water, the wide spreading tree,
The water like crystal, the tree living green,
A sight which by mortals can never be seen.

The City from Heaven descending from God,
With streets of pure gold, by the saints will be trod,
Twelve gates and foundations eternally sure,
Can be entered by none but the faithfully pure.

Behold! I come quickly, and bring my reward,—
Prepare ye, dear children, to meet your dear Lord,
By walking uprightly and doing His will,
For soon he that's holy will be holy still Materiality.

Although I am not a philosopher—I sometimes doubt even what philosophers say—I am inclined to think that much that passes for philosophy is falsely so called. The subject embraced in the word at the head of this article ever has been and is still engaging the attention of many minds, and as it is much easier to ask questions than to answer them, to offer propositions than to clearly define or explain them, to make suggestions than to enter into detail, I wish to keep upon the safe side and leave it for clearer heads and stronger minds to enlarge upon the subject, which I hope will be done; for I consider that a correct understanding of the subject is of importance. I understand that materiality has form, body, parts, exterior, interior surface, weight, divisibility, etc. Its form may change; it can become organized, be compounded; those organizations and compounds be decomposed, but still the substance, the materiality, remain; it is without increase or diminution.

And here I wish to ask, can materiality depend upon a contingency for its existence? Has there been an increase or diminution since the creation? I do not mean can an organization of matter depend upon a contingency? but matter itself, that is the question. It is clear to my own mind that it cannot. If it cannot, then, I ask, are not many of our philosophers at fault when they aver that many things to which we give names for the purpose of conveying our ideas of the effect produced by the action of material bodies, are material? I refer to such things as sound, light, heat, the shadow, etc. I do not know that all philosophers contend that all these are material. I know that some do. Let us examine a little. The blacksmith strikes his anvil with a hammer. There is a sound. Is there a creation of materiality, or even a formation of it? Is it not plain it is the effect of those bodies upon each other? Then the anvil, the hammer, the waves in the atmosphere, the drum of the ear, neither of them or all of them combined are what we call sound, but sound is contingent upon the existence and action of those bodies. In that instance it cannot exist without them or separated from them.

I apprehend the same is true of light. Are not light and heat produced by the action of matter upon matter, by a combination or decomposition of matter? Go into a dark room; take with you a candle; there is no light in the room. Now light the candle. Why the change? Is there an introduction of materiality, or is the light the result of the change that is going on in those particles of matter? Now stop that process of change and what becomes of the light? Is it in existence? gone to some place? If you say it still exists, can you prove it, or will you tell me that it still exists? It is like many things which we cannot comprehend, but must not question. Who says I must not?

The same may be said of the shadow. Remove the post, or the light, and what becomes of the shadow? If it is matter, it exists; if it is not, it ends with the circumstances that created it. And here I wish to ask question No. two:—

Is not everything to which we give name (that is immaterial) merely the effect of material agencies, and entirely dependent upon contingencies, and must they not end with the circumstances that created them?

These thoughts, which I have not properly clothed for want of language to express them, were suggested by the question, Is the soul of man material or immaterial? It occurs to me that it would be better to prove man had a soul, and then inquire into its nature. There is plenty of proof that man is a soul, but I have yet to see the evidence that there ever was added to man an entity called a soul, either material or immaterial. If you say there has been, just tell me when it was done or how it was done. I want something tangible for proof. But, says one, I think you go too far. We can deny the immortality of the soul, but we must admit people have souls, and nephesh means life often, and men have that. I know that men have life, but has a man got a life? We say a man has a hand, a foot. If that hand or foot was taken off and buried, or preserved in spirits, we could tell where it was; but suppose he lose his life, where is it? Echo answers where? It has gone where the light from a candle has gone when the candle is consumed. If we will be satisfied with the record, there will be no trouble.

God made man of the dust, then whatever constitutes man is dust. His thoughts, his mind, are not the man; they are immaterial. Whatever thoughts or mind he may have depend upon contingencies. Man is a complicated piece of machinery; if he is perfect in all his parts as he came from the hand of his Maker, he will be capable of thought. If he is then surrounded by objects, there will be impressions made upon his brain; there is thought. Remove those objects that make the impress, or the five senses through which the impress flows, or the brain, will there be thought in either case? Impair the brain, you impair the mind; destroy the brain, you destroy the mind. The brain is not the mind, neither is the shadow the post. Remove the post, the shadow is gone; destroy the brain, the mind is gone.

But we are asked, how will God preserve the identity if the mind is the result of material organization and ceases to exist when the organization is dissolved? Now I wish to ask my readers, if I fail to explain how God will do it, will a belief in an immaterial soul that no one knows anything about, where it comes from at birth, or where it goes to at death, throw any light upon the subject? Let me try to illustrate.

I will compare the brain to this sheet of paper before the impressions are made, it is a blank, capable of receiving impressions, either good or bad. After the impressions are made they determine the value and character of the sheet. By them I should identify it wherever I might see it. Now let us burn the sheet. What becomes of the impression? (I will here remark that while I make the impressions on this sheet by the addition of materiality, the ink, I understand the impress on the brain would be in another way, perhaps by indentation, at least without the addition of materiality.) Had the impression been made by indentation, they certainly could not have been in existence, made as they are by the addition of materiality; although the material of which they are composed may remain, the identity is gone. Now, I ask, does my reader believe that God is able to restore the sheet after the particles of which it is composed have been scattered to the four winds? I believe in such a God. I also believe it is just as easy for him to restore it with the impress as without it. Will there, then, be any difficulty about the identity? I apprehend not. And here I will remark that on this blank God has given us to fill up, we are writing many things contrary to his direction. There is a promise if we repent they shall be blotted out, not when we are converted,—that does not change what is written,—we then commence writing on a different subject; the blotting out is to be done when the time of restitution shall come at the appearing of our Savior, Jesus Christ. See Acts 3:19—21.

For the Crisis.

Parallel Falsehoods.

BY M. MATHEWS.

Man in this life is constantly surrounded by objects that deceive the mind. Even among his dearest friends he often meets with deception. "There is none good; no, not one." Man feels this sensibly; and as his bright fancies fade,—as apparent realities prove but wild dreams,—as friends prove but enemies of the foulest cast in disguise, he looks up to God and exclaims with one of old—"All is vanity!"

It is a sorrowful fact that there is no truth in our world unmingled with falsehood. I speak on a large scale. Man naturally tells his story to suit his circumstances. True, there are good, honest hearts in our land, who aim at truthfulness; but even these, without much grace from on high, will sometimes equivocate. In the beginning this was not so. When God first formed man and gave him the world to rule and reign over, falsehood had not had an existence. But in due time the spoiler came, and here, as in all ages, we see, and suffer by, his innumerable offspring.

I will take you back to the time and place where transpired the foulest act of deception ever palmed off upon mankind. When our first parents were happily walking and talking in Eden, talking face to face with their Maker, God, things were vastly different from what they are at present. How peaceful lived that family. No home has ever been like that. Innocence and heaven-born love reigned supremely in those two hearts that beat in unison with each other and with the pulsations of creation at large. How much poetry they saw in everything. Doubtless a certain writer is right in saying, "Poetry was their common talk." How lovely those roses looked. How sweet sounded those warblings echoed far and near from birds that flitted through that hallowed garden. How pleasantly the lion and the lamb lay side by side, 'neath the warming rays of that bright sun that had never been eclipsed. How green must have been the mossy mantle spread over the face of our earth, that had never been chilled to the heart, and whose bosom had never taken to its fold one lifeless form. Ah! these scenes were too bright to last. Man could not rightly appreciate such happiness till he had suffered for it. God could not be honored sufficiently till man had known the extent of his love and mercy. Peace was too easily received to be duly estimated. So the first deception was enacted, the first sin committed, and the first fruit of disobedience ripened.

God told Adam that if he proved faithful this earth and all its inhabitants should be his, and that he should live forever and rule the whole human family. But in case he disobeyed,—proved unfaithful, death should be his portion. So the affair was well understood by all parties. Adam was quite lordly. King and Queen, Adam and Eve, man and wife, how innocent, how happy! But Satan came. He wanted this earth. He wanted to be king. He wanted to put God and man at a great distance from each other. So he raises his ambition higher than earth,—tells him that they may become as gods, in wisdom excelling any. Man's heart can be easily impregnated with pride. The enemy appeared so wise and so lovely that Adam, no doubt, sighed to be like unto him. Being told that it was his privilege to be more, even like a god, he readily sinned. Consequently woman obeyed Satan, and man obeyed woman. The deed was done. The first sting of conscience was felt. The first triumph of Satan, the first sin of man. Earth fell into the hands of Satan, and if Christ had not purchased it with divine blood, the evil one would have had it, deed and all, long ago. But thanks be to God, the mortgage has been redeemed!

Now Adam had been led to believe that he should "not surely die." God had plainly declared that DEATH, literal death, should be his doom, that he should return to dust, out of which he was taken. But ambition had been created, and imagination took its flight. Satan was wise in not only making man believe he should not die, but that there was a better land, even the habitation of God, which he might inherit after this failed him. So man takes his affections from this earth which is to be his home, and places them upon heaven, where Satan could not dwell, on account of pride. And he learns to abhor his body, which was made to dwell on earth, and worships the "spirit" which is so constituted as to fly to heaven at death. O what deception! There is no deathless soul and no heaven for it to fly to. This is a nice lie of the devil, meant to rid earth of man. Millions are taken in this snare. O that those who cling to the assertion, "Ye shall not surely die," but knew its author. And ye who call this earth a prison, would to God you knew it to be your heaven in disguise. There is no other home for you. Satan is working mightily to get possession of it. Place your affections on it, then, and live so that you may make one of that number who shall shout victory over the adversary of all good.

Reader, do you mean to believe God, or Satan? Make up your mind. You are daily condemning one or the other. If your hopes are built on going to heaven, you leave the deceiver full possession of this earth. If you think a part of you can never die, your faith is built on a sandy foundation with the devil for its chief corner stone. My fellow creatures, will you not study to know truth? Learn the truth, "tell the truth and shame the devil." Come, awake!

Won't man have learned a lesson, during the time of suffering the penalty of disobedience? Won't Adam come out of the dust next time a wiser man? He will believe God to be God. He will own Satan to be Satan. He will own death to be death, and that it is "all of death to die." Won't he have reason to praise God for redeeming him from the grave! Eternity will be none too long to sing redemption's song.

I do believe that if men could see how Satan is deceiving them,—how he tries to take their home from them they would utterly hate him. Fellow pilgrims, ye who have an understanding of these things, let your lights shine. Preach truth. Sound it out. Higher than the votaries of falsehood raise your voices in behalf of truth. We came in at the eleventh hour, then let us work with all our might in the hour that remains. Talk, write, preach and print truth. "Feed my lambs." Christian, do you hear your Savior speaking? Rouse thee! Go forth and tell the nations of judgment to come. Tell Satan's hosts that this earth is yours, that you are a joint heir with Christ to all things.

I talk to the wind! Is it possible that men will not heed the voice of warning? Will they not tell others of Jesus and prepare them for his coming? Some will. A few are zealous. God bless them. Christ reward you, souls bless you, and eternity repay you. Amen.

Contemplations.

I'm longing for a better world,
Where sorrows ne'er can come;
A land by prophets long foretold,
The saint's eternal home.

A world where saints in glory bright
Praise their eternal King,
And clad in robes of spotless white,
The victor's song will sing.

Sickness and death await us here,
And blast our early hopes,
Lay low the friends we hold most dear
In this lone vale of tears.

I would exchange this world of gloom,
Where death triumphant reigns,
For one where flowers perennial bloom,
For Eden's verdant plains;

Where life's fair tree, whose branches wave,
By heavenly breezes stirred;
The crystal river, where we'll lave
Fast by the throne of God.

Our God will wipe away all tears,
Will heal each wounded heart,
And bid our anxious doubts and fears
Forevermore depart.

Jerusalem! with pearly gates,
And streets of shining gold,
I'd share thy joy, which now awaits
In yon bright happy world.

I'd range the heavenly fields of bliss,
And pluck life's healing leaves,
Far, far removed from pain like this,
Which never resting gives.

The earth renewed shall bloom again
In more than Eden glow,
No blighting curse, no withering pain,
Thy happy bowers shall know.

Grant, Lord, that I at thy right hand,
May have a humble seat
In Beulah's fair and peaceful land,
Where saints in glory meet.

For the Crisis.

Extracts from Rothe.

The following are the passages from Dr. Richard Rothe's "Theological Ethics," which the article in No 15 of the Crisis was designed to introduce. They may require study, but they will repay it.

C. F. H.

"Evil can therefore be for God only an object of absolute negation, and his agency in respect to it only an absolute reaction against it for its complete removal, which, as divine and absolute, must be absolutely efficient. This simply effective, unconditional, negative reaction of God against sin is his primitive agency. Thus in general the conception of punishment as divine is, that it is the absolute and purely efficient reaction of God, on the side of his omnipotence, against sin, whereby he removes it absolutely. Herein lie, now, two essentially distinct moments (elements): 1. In the first place the divine penalty (for we here speak only of this,) is retribution of pain. God directs the evil which comes in consequence of sin, against the sinner himself, in order to remove the sin in him,—he recompenses the sin with evil, while he appoints to the sinner the measure of evil answering to his sin. For this the mass of his creatures are as an instrument at his command, and he is thereby in no way limited to the precise evil already flowing as a natural and necessary consequence from a given sin, which are in a religious point of view themselves a divine punishment. Whence arises the distinction between natural and positive penal recompense (or, according to the customary use of language, punishment) of God. It is positive in so far as it is not an evil already in itself necessarily resulting from the sin appointed for retribution, but first brought in upon the sinner in the divine government of the world. This divine penal retribution is in itself, as a reaction of God against sin, although it immediately affects the sinner, still not directed against the sinner, himself, i. e., not against his person, but against the sin in him. It would remove this from him. That God hurls the evil proportioned to the sin back upon the sinner himself, has its motive in this, that he would determine him by the experience of the natural consequences of his sin, to turn himself against it, and to separate himself from it. If now the sinner actually enters into this design of the divine penal retribution, then it becomes for him chastisement (Heb. musar, Greek, paideia), by the educational method of divine love, or, more properly, grace. Nearer to this chastisement is a modification of penal retribution, to wit, the penal retribution which is affected upon the sinner, in so far as he is in himself conscious of his sin as such, and of his need of instruction by means of the applying of evil penally retributing his sin. As chastisement, painful retribution has ceased to be punishment.

2. But penal retribution cannot enforce the attainment of its primary object with reference to the sinner, his separation from sin or his amendment. By means of his power of self-determination the sinner is able to harden himself against it. Yet he cannot thus annul or frustrate the divine punishment, but by so doing he gives it a changed direction. Divine penalty is essentially divine negation of sin, divine reaction against it; and, as divine, simply absolute. It cannot relax until it has actually removed the sin. If the sinner does not separate himself from the sin, if he identifies himself with it finally, then the punishment is directed against himself, and fulfills the divine judgment upon sin in himself by the abolishing of his own being. For evil must be done away absolutely, as certainly as it is utterly opposed to God,—at whatever cost. If the sinner will not cease from it, then must he share its doom; successfully mock God in defiance of it, he cannot. Thus divine retribution results at last in the annihilation of the sinner;—even by means of the evil impending over him as consequence of his sin, through and in it the divine punishment culminates. This annihilation of the sinner (this death in the New Testament sense) is accordingly the final aim of divine punishment, and the necessary final result, lying in its very idea, of sin consistently and completely fulfilling itself.

Remark 2. It is altogether incorrect to suppose as the object of divine punishment, the amendment of the one punished. This is doubtless an object of punishment, that is, of punishment in so far as it is painful retribution. But even in this form is it only one of its objects, not its only object. It lies certainly in the conception of divine punishment that it attempts its aim first of all with the amendment of the one punished; but it is not also implied in it, that it must actually attain it with this attempt. Its proper object, on the other hand,—the actual removal of evil,—it must by its very conception absolutely attain, in such way as may be; whether with the salvation of the sinner, or with his perishing—which depends on his own self-determination. If punishment is executed completely, then is its consequence ever the annihilation of the sinner himself. As punishment, that is, when it remains punishment, and is not removed by forgiveness, it ever ends with the death of the sinner in this sense. That which with Julius Mueller (pp. 281, 285) is "the primary object" of divine punishment, the most clear revelation that the majesty of law and of God himself is not actually injured—this forms also, according to our conception of it, a determinate element in the object of divine punishment."

Selections.

"Why don't God make it Morning?"

A sick child tossing restlessly upon her bed, often asked of her mother. "When will it be morning?" The kind mother as often answered, and tried every method which a devoted mother's love could devise, to make the wearisome hours pass more comfortably. At length the sick child exclaimed, with the utmost impatience, "Why don't God make it morning?"

Are there not many Christians, who in moments of darkness and trial, feel, though they may not express, the same impatience? Sickness lays its heavy hand upon one in the midst of much labor; when he feels that there is much to do for Christ and his cause, many souls who might be saved by his exertions, and who will be lost without them; he feels, too, that the night will soon come when no man can work, and that he must needs work while it is day; yet there he is, as he thinks, doing nothing for the glory of God. He tries to feel that all is for the best, yet the dark cloud will at times overshadow him,—his faith is weak, and in agony he asks, "When will God make it morning?"

Another loses a beloved and only child; and he cannot see why God has thus taken away what he regards as his greatest earthly blessing, instead of bowing meekly to the stroke, he contends with his Maker, wanders farther and farther from the light of God's countenance, into deep darkness, and then impatiently asks, "Why don't God make it morning?"

Loss of property, or of friends, often embitters the feelings of those who thus suffer, and instead of bringing all these cares and burdens to the mercy seat, and there casting them off, they sink away from God, with the darkness gathering thicker around them, and almost in despair they call out from the midnight gloom, "When will God make it morning?"

Let all such sorrowing ones remember, that if they are indeed the children of God, his eye is upon them, however deeply they may be shrouded in darkness. Christ is always with those who have committed themselves to him, and by every trial here, he is only preparing them for the bliss which shall be theirs hereafter. In his own good time, and at the best time, he "will make it morning." "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

What makes a Man?

A man never knows what he is capable of until he has tried his powers. There seems to be no bound to human capacity. Insight, energy and will, produce astonishing results. How often modest talent, driven by circumstances to undertake some formidable looking work has felt his own untried and hitherto unconscious powers rising up to grapple and to master, and afterward stood amazed at its own unexpected success!

Those circumstances, those people, enemies and friends, that provoke us to any noble or manly undertaking, are our greatest benefactors. Opposition and persecution do more for a man than any seemingly good fortune. The sneers of critics develop the latent fire of the young poet. The anathemas of the angry church inflame the zeal of the reformer. Tyranny, threats, fagots, torture, raise up heroes and martyrs, who might otherwise have slept away slothful and thoughtless lives, never dreaming what splendid acts and words lay buried in their bosoms. And who knows but the wrongs of society are permitted, because of the fine gold which is beaten out of the crude ore of humanity?

Here is the truth worth considering. Are you in poverty? have you suffered wrong? are you beset by enemies? Now is your time! Never lie there, depressed and melancholy! Spend no more time in idle whining! Up, like a lion! Make no complaint, but if difficulty fights you, roar your defiance. You are at school, this is your necessary discipline, poverty and pain are your masters—but use the powers God has given you, and you shall be master at last. Fear of failure is the most fruitful cause of failure. Stand firm and you will not fail. What seems failure at first is a discipline. Accept the lesson; trust the grand result: up and up again; strike and strike again; and you shall always gain, whatever the fortune of to-day's or to-morrow's battle.—Arcana.

Worlds on Fire.

On the night of April 22, Ellis Thomas, a worthy farmer who resides ten miles north-east of Richmond, Ind., arose from his bed for the purpose of taking some medicine at twenty minutes before 2 o'clock. As there was considerable light he at first supposed it was after day-break, until approaching a table he was surprised to see the window light reflected upon it, in which the shadow of the sash was very distinct, and as the light came from the South-east he at once directed his attention to that quarter of the heavens, to ascertain its source; the moon being at her change at once precluded the idea that it was lunar in its character, as it is always dark at that particular period.

The object sought was soon found in the shape of a red disk of light as large as a dinner plate, fully as well defined in its outline, and resembling in every respect the sun when setting in a hazy atmosphere. It was perfectly stationary about 20 degrees above the horizon, though it gradually diminished in size so that in the space of a quarter of an hour from twenty minutes to 2,—when it was first seen,—it was reduced to the dimensions of a star of the first magnitude, and five minutes later wholly disappeared, without any explosion or motion whatever. The light emanating from it was sufficient to cause a glow in all that part of the heavens, though no luminous spot of similar appearance was seen at any other point.

This description was obtained from Mr. T. when at his house a few days subsequently, and was fully corroborated in every particular by his lady, who also observed the strange phenomenon."—Cin. Com., May 10th.

Shower of Meteoric Stones.

New Concord, Muskingum Co., Ohio, May 5th, 1860.

Eds. Com.:—On Tuesday last (May 1st) at twenty-eight minutes past 12 o'clock, M., a sharp report was heard in the heavens very similar to heavy cannonading, creating quite a visible shock, which was heard and felt many miles distant, and which some persons actually avowed was the sounding of the last trump. Immediately succeeding these followed twenty three distinct reports, following each other in quick succession, and which made those who heard stand aghast with fear.

The sound then seemed to gradually die away into a heavy roaring like distant thunder; succeeding this again, some men who were at work in a field, heard a buzzing sound as of a body passing rapidly through the air, and hence giving their attention in the direction from whence the sound proceeded, they discovered a body descend and strike the earth about one hundred yards distant, and upon making search, found a hole in the ground, from which after some labor they extracted a stone weighing fifty-one pounds,—the stone was of a quadrangular shape, and resembling in appearance a river stone, the surface being somewhat blackened as though washed by the waves, and then bleached by the sun. The surface though generally smooth, was irregular in some places, such as small crevices which might contain a pebble. Upon being broken the stone was found to be of a grayish cast, and somewhat gravelly, being interspersed with particles of metal, and by being brought in contact with some other solid substance it would ring like bell metal. After satisfying their curiosity with this, immediate search was instituted for more, and guided by the sound, they had not proceeded more than two hundred and fifty yards before they discovered another, which was buried twenty inches in the ground, having been obstructed by striking a rail fence, breaking one or two rails. This stone was exactly similar to the first. It is evident from the glazed surface that they have not been severed from any other body.

The two stones above described both alighted upon the farm of Jonas Amspoker, who lives three miles east of Concord. Another was found to have fallen upon the farm of Mr. Law, one mile east of town. This is exactly similar in every particular to the others. A number of others, weighing from two to forty pounds, have been found within a range of five or six miles.

Fine specimens of these mysterious visitors are in safe keeping here now, and can be seen at any time by curious visitors.

Yours, etc., J. R. Buchanan.

We add the following from the Columbus Statesman:

We have received letters from the same region of country, which not only corroborate the statement, but add greatly to the singularity of the phenomena. It appears that the noise alluded to was heard through a wide range of country, and that stones of the kind described were found freshly imbedded in the earth in the same manner, miles apart.

In Morgan, Muskingum, Coshocton, Morrow and Tuscarawas county the explosion was distinctly heard. Near McConnellsville several boys observed a huge stone descend to the earth, which they averred looked like a red ball, leaving a line of smoke in its wake.

The phenomena seem to be unprecedented. These stones were found nearly fifty miles apart, although the explosion was heard at all the places mentioned from the direction of New Concord. Houses were shaken by the shock, and in one or two instances the doors bursted open. It occasioned a great deal of consternation in that section of the country, as well it might.

Evil Company.

Sophronius, a wise teacher of the people, did not allow his sons and daughters, even when they were grown up, to associate with persons whose lives were not moral and pure.

'Father,' said the gentle Eulalia one day when he had refused to permit her to go in company with her brother to visit the frivolous Lucinda, 'Father, you must think that we are very weak and childish, since you are afraid that it would be dangerous to us in visiting Lucinda.'

Without saying a word the father took a coal from the hearth and handed it to his daughter. 'It will not burn you, my child,' said he; 'Only take it.'

Eulalia took the coal, and behold her tender white hand was black, and without thinking she touched her white dress, and it was also blackened. 'See,' said Eulalia, somewhat displeased as she looked at her hands and dress, 'one cannot be careful enough when handling coals.'

'Yes, truly,' said her father; 'you see, my child, that the coal, even though it did not burn you, has nevertheless blackened you! So is the company of immoral persons.'

A Word to the Juveniles.

BE GOOD.

Be good, be good, my bright-eyed boy,
Roaming the fields in thy childish joy;
Rejoice as you bound over meadow and wood,
Be cheerful as you will; but, oh, be good!
Rob not the nest that your quick eyes see
Perched on the boughs of yon chestnut tree;
Bruise not the butterfly's tender wing;
Harm not even the smallest thing.
Be good to all, even to bird and bee,
Even as God is good to thee.

Be good, my little girl, be good,
Be not selfish, nor vain, nor rude,
Ne'er from your lips let a cross word fall;
Be patient, and humble, and kind to all.
Ne'er let that brow with frown be dark;
Be cheerful and blithe as the warbling lark,
Ever be gentle and pure as the dove,
Your words and your actions full of love.
"Be good to all," let your motto be,
Even as God has been good to thee.

A Pig for a School.

When one of the Karen chiefs at Toungoo inquired of Mrs. Mason, the missionary's wife, how her female school was to be supported, Mrs. M. replied that she trusted in God, whose ravens were still upon the earth. The chief understood her, and with a sympathizing glance, said in an under tone to those who stood by, "I must send the mamma my great pig!" and in a few days after, down came the great pig, and eleven rupees for the support of the school.

Our Order Book.

A story is somewhere told of the Duke of Wellington to this effect. During the campaign in the Spanish Peninsula, an officer woke his lordship one night, and said that the execution of a certain enterprise, which was to be carried into effect that night, was impossible. As the officer was going on to give his reasons for this opinion, the Duke replied, "Give me the order book," and turning over the leaves said, "Not at all impossible; see, it is down in the order book," and so lay down to sleep again.

The Duke was a fallible man; but his plans were ever laid with consummate care, and he would not have his officers inquire into their practicability. It was enough for the subordinate to know, in regard to any project, that it was down in the order book. If the thing was found written there, it was to be done. The soldiers must believe—in point of fact they did believe—their captain infallible; and this was one secret of his success.

The Captain of our salvation is really infallible. He, too, has his order book—his own divinely inspired word—and the business of the christian soldier, in regard to the work before him, is to inquire, not whether it is possible, but whether it is commanded. This should be our only test of practicability—is it ordered? What readest thou?

Christian! Whatever you find written in the order book, do it. Leave the result to your Commander.—Sunday School Times.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$2.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	21.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

A Poetical Sermon.

TEXT.—1 Cor. 15: 58.

BY F. P———

Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand,
Work always till right is restored,
Forasmuch as we know that no labor is vain
That is wrought in the name of the Lord.

(Concluded.)

The weakest must labor as well as the strong,
For all there is something to do;
Improve on the talent the Master bestows,
Remember the interest is due.

We all have a station, an office to fill,
We all have a Master above;
He shows us the labor he'd have us to do—
We work by the promptings of love.

And some he has chosen to lead in the strife,
To be first in the battle array;
And some are to follow and bind up the wounds,
And care for the sick in the way.

There's the bold noble Paul, and the sweet loving John,
And Luther, the lion in might,
And the winning Melancthon,—what contrast is here!
Yet all were defenders of right.

What though in our weakness ascending the scale
We strike on a quivering chord?
Remember, the widow "gave more than they all,"—
When weak we are "strong in the Lord."

There are fathers and mothers in Israel, we know,
Old warriors long in the war;
There are babes in the Lord who must gird on their mail,
And fight till the conflict is o'er.

We must work in the vineyard by spreading the truth,
We must work by upholding the right,
In pulling down error, oppression and sin,
In bringing salvation to light.

By feeding the hungry, by tending the sick,
By cheering the heart that's cast down,
By pointing to Jesus, the kingdom to come,
The robes, and the glorious crown.

We must not be weary in doing his will—
The reward 's at the end of the race,
A glory unspeakable, fadeless and pure,
A glory begotten of grace.

What joy and what peace even here he bestows
On those who repent and believe,
And in the bright kingdom of glory beyond,
They shall life everlasting receive.

How many have labored and toiled all the day
Earth's pleasures and honors to win,
Whose reward "everlasting destruction" will prove,
For death is the wages of sin.

Why toil we for perishing pleasures of earth,
When the ravishing prize we may gain,
Of glories unfading, eternal and pure,
Of pleasures unmingled with pain?

Our work must be constant, unflagging our zeal,
Our end is a thorough reform,
To be wrought not in sunshine's bright moments alone—
We must carry it on in the storm.

Oft duty will clash with our feelings, we know,
Our will in rebellion will rise;
Let duty throughout hold absolute sway,
Though it sever the tenderest ties.

Through evil report we must follow the Lord,
And truly the most of the way
Is through clouds and thick darkness, yet, glory to God,
It will end in a glorious day!

As well we must climb up the steep, craggy rocks,
As to feed in "green pastures" below;
As well must we toss on the storm-heaving sea,
As to glide where the "still waters" flow.

We must always abound in the work of the Lord,
No workman must ever turn back;
To-day and to-morrow, unwearied and firm,
We must keep on the enemies' track.

We must never be weary, we know we shall reap
If we faint not nor fall by the way,
When the sheaves are all gathered, the Shepherd shall call,
And the sheep hear his voice and obey.

When the kingdom of Christ is established on earth,
And Satan's dominion cast down,
Thank God! there is rest for the laborers then,
And the cross shall be changed for the crown.

Our labor shall not be in vain in the Lord,—
It is our sweet comfort to know,
That in the great harvest we joyful shall reap
What here, even weeping, we sow.

The christian may know that he toils not in vain,
His faith may insure the reward;
And the bread that he casts on the waters of life,
He shall find again, saith the Lord.

There was never a fruitless expression of love,
And a kindness never was lost;
Each act has a bearing for good or for ill,
Repaying the effort it cost.

In many a sorrowing, sin-stricken soul,
Comes back some encouraging word,
Which spurs him to action, though years have rolled on
Since first the kind warning was heard;

For the love-spoken word of the days that are gone
Has unceasingly haunted his breast,
When the lips that had spoken are silent in death,
And the speaker has gone to his rest.

It has followed him close through the mazes of sin,
Like a monitor always at hand,
It has stirred up his conscience, once latent and dead,
To anguish he could not withstand.

That word is sweet music of late to his ears,
For it proved like a spy on his track;
Till at last up the hill of repentance and faith,
It has brought the poor wanderer back.

Kind words to the sorrowing never can die,
For memory cherishes love,
They are "new every morning, and fresh every eve,"
Like the blessings that come from above.

And though the effects are not instantly seen,
Love never was given in vain,
And kindness gone by is like balm to the heart
When it's throbbing with anguish and pain.

Be not, then, discouraged, though long it may be
Ere the fruits of our labor appear,
We know there's a strength in each love-spoken word,
And a balm in each pitying tear.

The seed that we sow springs not instantly up
Till the showers shall have moistened the soil;
Then mourn not because in a moment of time
We see not the fruit of our toil.

And, oh! when we gain the blest shores of our home,
And join with the numberless throng
In swelling the chorus unspeakably grand
Of the great and the glorious song,—

If there should be those whose unspeakable bliss
Our kindness has helped them to gain,
We'd know when we worked in the name of the Lord,
Our labor was never in vain.

My friends, let us live as a CHRISTIAN should live,
Let us fight as a CHRISTIAN should fight;
For "the night is far spent and the day is at hand"—
Let us gird on the "armor of light."

And oh! may the home of the ransomed be ours,
The robe, and the harp, and the crown;
We'll join the archangel in singing his praise,
When our Master and Savior comes down.

Thank God! that the way-marks are telling e'en now,
That the pilgrim will soon be at rest,
That soon the immortal hosannas shall ring
Through the mansions prepared for the blest.

Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand,
Work always till right is restored,
Forasmuch as we know that no labor is vain
That is wrought in the name of the Lord.

Does Death Kill?

In a previous article I examined the argument of some who suppose that if the first death does not kill the soul, the second will not; and who think that the supposition of a separate existence of the soul implies its immortality. This inference, I endeavored to show, is unfounded; and I intimated that the view of my friendly objectors is even more open to their own objection. Let us see if it is not so.

The view of my objectors is this:—that man consists of a living body only; that when the body is dead, no part of his being remains but a corpse; that in the resurrection either the same body, particle for particle, is raised up; or, so many particles are re-collected as will make the resurrection body the same; or, with different particles, the resurrection body will have the same structure or constitution, so that the character and being may be identical.

Whichever view be taken, so long as the separate existence of the soul is denied, one thing may be said. When the body is dissolved, as it is in thousands of instances, the person no more exists than he did a thousand years before he was born. Our bodies are formed from the food we eat and the air we breathe. These come from the four winds, and from all the quarters of the globe. And most human bodies are mostly, and many human bodies are wholly, scattered thither again whence they came. For aught we know, every cubic yard of the whole atmosphere, and of the sea, and every yard of the whole surface of the earth, may have its portion—its particle—of the same body that lived and moved, forty or fifty years ago, among men.

Now I shall not here at all deny or question the power of God to collect again the same particles of a body, thus diffused over the globe, and to re-form them in the same former body. Whatever difficulties belong to that supposition, they are not the point of my present argument. The question now is, not what God can do, or cannot do; but, what is the deadening and destroying power of Death?

And it seems to me that when the body is thus scattered, if no soul is left, however unconscious and inert or inactive, then the person is just as dead as dead can be. I do not see how the second death, or ten thousand deaths could make him any deader. And the person is not only dead, or lifeless, but just as much out of existence as he was a hundred years before he was born. You may say that the atoms which formed his body exist, that the materials for his resurrection exist, and that the fact will appear in due time. But then I should reply that by the same reasoning he existed a thousand years before he was born, the material of his being existed before the flood, and the fact appeared in due time, for he was born. One style of speech is just as proper as the other. Hence, according to the view of my objectors, either the dead have ceased to exist; or, they have existed ever since the creation. Either they are annihilated; or, they never will be annihilated, except by God's remanding their atoms back to nothingness.

But, although the dead be so utterly dead, as dead as they were a hundred generations before their birth, and as dead as any will be a thousand years after the judgment and the second death, our good friends still believe they will come to life again. Dead as they are, they are not finally dead. Far away from existence and as nearly out of existence as they have been for six thousand years, they will come forth again, and give the most honest account of themselves that ever can be given, in the great day. Death, the great enemy, has struck them down, and trampled them as rudely and as ruinously as he can—and still they live! He has killed and destroyed them temporarily, just as completely as they ever will be killed or destroyed—and yet they bloom out in life again, just as if he had never touched them with the tip of his finger! Is it not my turn to ask of my objectors, Does your death kill? You say that he kills the dead very dead once, but they come to life again. How do you know that he will succeed any better in the second attempt? If the first death does not kill finally, how can you infer that the second death will kill finally? In the view of my friends, the nature of death is precisely the same in both cases. It is as utter an extinction in the first instance as in the second. What logical assurance can they give that the second death may not be followed by life, as well as the first?

Perhaps they will say, the Bible assures us that the righteous alone will live forever. Very well. But this is to abandon logic, and resort to the Scriptures. And I have the same scriptural right to believe that the wicked will not live forever that my friends have. However, I have a way of thinking that my view of the nature of death is more plainly consistent with the declarations of Scripture.

For my view is simply this,—that there are two instalments of death. The death of the body kills it. It is a real, literal, killing death. As the effect of it, the body becomes a corpse at once, and ere long ceases to be even that. This death also deprives the soul of its action, as the mainspring is useless without the watch. This death is also, as a first instalment, the picture of all death, showing that the second death will destroy the soul, as this destroys the body.

But if the first death destroys the body and not the soul, it is easy to see how there may be a resurrection before the second death, but not after it. While a part of the being remains, there may be life again. But when the entire being is destroyed—soul and body—to live again is impossible. My friends, who have feared that death, as I define it, involves immortality, must not wonder now when I tell them that as I understand death, in its two instalments, it seems to me that a resurrection after the second death is beyond the power of God himself. For such a resurrection would be a re-creation, which is impossible, since what is newly created is different from that which before existed.

Hence I think that in my view of death, the second death kills finally and forever, as a logical result of my definition. Whereas I see in the view of my friends no logical security against immortality after the second death. And I have shown that some who held their view of the nature of the first death, as Tatian and Thomkinson, actually held eternal torment nevertheless.

IDLENESS.—Idleness is the bane of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness, the step-mother of discipline, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, the cushion on which the devil chiefly reposes, and a great cause not only of melancholy, but of many other diseases; for the mind is naturally active, and if it be not occupied about some honest business, it rushes into mischief, or sinks into melancholy.—Burton.

For the Crisis.

Family Worship.

BY M. MATHEWS.

Brother, you have a home, I suppose, and in it is your life companion, together with the little ones that God has given you. She is "all your fancy painted her,"—affectionate and godly. She helps you to bear many of life's important cares, and soothes many a sigh, assuages many a pain, either moral or physical. Your little ones have grown up around you in beauty,—

"They grew together side by side."

You were prospered in your merchandise; your flocks and herds multiplied; death never entered your dwelling. Have you knelt down daily with your dear ones and thanked God for these mercies? Have you taught your children to pray, by precept and example? Has "the old-fashioned Bible" been opened by you before them, and have you there given them,—not only their "daily bread,"—but that bread which comes down from heaven? Have you showed them the way of eternal life? Have you told them of Jesus? Have you pointed them to Calvary and directed their footsteps to Zion? Have you said by action, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord"? And when temptations have surrounded your sons and daughters, and they have made known their common trials and difficulties to you, their best earthly friend, have you gone low at the foot of the cross, and with united voices told Jesus? Have you taught them to

"Cast each burden on the Lord,
And peace and comfort find"?

My brethren, my sisters, you that are heads of families, do you know how great a responsibility rests on you? Do you know that you stand as a great connecting link between your children and the Father of all? Have you not need to pray for grace to guide them aright, that this chain may be so cemented by the love of heaven as to abide firm forever around the hearts of your children and the throne of the Eternal? You prayerless!! You, who have in your keeping the hearts and interests of all dear to you in this world! Do you then feel of yourself sufficient for these things? No man is. The necessary wisdom and patience for training these to-be-immortals must come from the true fountain of all strength and goodness.

What looks more like a "heaven begun below," than to see a whole family bowed at the altar of their hearts, and one after another breathing thanks and adoration to God, and supplicating his continued mercies? And then that hymn! How sweetly blend those voices! The parents sing in full melody,—the children lisp from the oldest down to the youngest, and here the lisping becomes more interesting till we exclaim, "Out of the mouths of babes hast thou ordained praise!"

Then let an altar be erected to God, in every family. Let the world know whom you will worship. Let them know that you will pray to the living God. Open your doors, and invite your neighbors in. Like Daniel, leave your windows open. Fill the air with the incense of a broken heart. Pray! It will pay its fare. It will not be lost time. If it may not save others, it will save you, my brother. Keep praying and praising. Pray with all your might. Throw your whole soul into it. Be mighty in prayer. Don't you know there lives a certain character who would rather hear you curse than pray,—he

—"trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees."

Then pray till he trembles like a reed shaken in the wind. Pray!

The Word Spoken by Angels.

"If the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape"? etc.—HEB. 2: 2.

1. The above text teaches us that Angels have at some time in the past spoken, and

2. That their word was sure, steadfast, unchangeable, irrevocable.

3. That somebody disobeyed and transgressed the same. And

4. That all without a single exception who thus disobeyed or transgressed, for so doing received a just recompense of reward.

The Lord in a certain place in the good book declares thus: "Behold, I send an angel before thee. . . . Beware of him and obey his voice, provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions." As much as if he had said, For every single act of disobedience or transgression you shall receive a just recompense of reward, not in a single instance shall you obtain pardon. The word of my angels is sure, steadfast, unalterable.

In considering the subject the following questions naturally arise: When, and to whom have angels spoken, and their word been disobeyed or rejected? What was the reward that all such transgressors received? Was it eternal death? Was the angelic message given to all that lived from Adam to Moses? Was it to all that lived from Moses to Christ? Was it the Law, as some at the present day declare unto us? If so, does it not follow that every single individual without an exception that did not keep every iota of the law has died an eternal death? The text declares that every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, no possibility for a single act of disobedience or transgression to be forgiven there. If then reference is had to the law, and the penalty was eternal death, what possible chance is there for any to be saved before Christ, except Enoch and Elijah and the little ones that did not know and disobey the law?

I have yet to learn that angelic messages have ever, in a single instance, been given to the mass, but, on the contrary, in all cases they have been to individuals. I have also yet to learn that in a single instance the reward for disobeying their word was eternal death, or that any man received his reward for any of his sins except the very identical act of disobedience or transgression then and there committed, leaving the balance in reserve to the judgment of the great day to be settled and rewarded.

But Angels have spoken, and in some instances their word was disregarded and every such disobedience or transgression received a just recompense of reward. Two Angels appeared to Lot and said, "Hast thou here any besides? son-in-law, and thy sons and thy daughters, and whatsoever thou hast in the city, bring them out of this place." Lot went out and rehearsed the warning of the Angels in their ears saying, "Up! get ye out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city." They rejected the message and disobeyed the word. Yet the word of the Angels was steadfast, sure, irrevocable, and those who disobeyed received a just recompense of reward.

Again, remember Lot's wife. When the morning arose, the Angels hastened Lot, his wife and daughters, saying, "Escape for thy life, look not behind thee lest thou be consumed." Lot's wife disobeyed, and, as in every other instance on record for disobeying, received a just recompense of reward, not for all their sins previously committed but for that identical act of disobedience then and there committed, leaving the balance to the judgment to be punished. So in all cases where special angelic messages were sent; if rejected, they received a just reward, no chance left for pardon or forgiveness, but under law as under the gospel, men repented and were repeatedly forgiven. This all can see by examining the 105th Psalm and numerous other places on record. To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no light in them. JOHN F. BAKER.

West Winsted, Ct.

[From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

Dan. 12: 2; "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Here, as in Matt. 25: 46, a contrast is made between "everlasting life" and something opposed thereto. Do the terms which describe this imply an immortal life of the lost?

It is thought by good critics that the word "many" denotes not the general resurrection, but that of the righteous; the "first resurrection" spoken of in Rev. 20: 5. The sense would then be, that these, who awake, rise to everlasting life; while the rest are left to shame and everlasting contempt. This would agree with the Syriac version: "some to death, and the eternal contempt of their companions;" the term "companions" referring to those who live; or, in a dramatic way, to the fellowship of death, as in Isa. 14: 9–20; Ezek. 32: 24, 25, 30.

But in any case the resurrection foretold gives great prominence to the literal sense of the phrase "everlasting life." And the contrasted expressions confirm this view. The word rendered "shame" (dira-ron) is the same which is rendered "abhorring" in Isa. 66: 24, where, says Dr. Wintle, it denotes "a kind of spectacle, show, or nausea;" and it is translated "nausea" by Buxtorf in his Concordance. The allusion is to the putrefaction of death. And thus, not only is Isa. 66: 15 a parallel passage here, but those above cited in connection with it, and also those in Matt. 13: 8, 9; Mark 9: 43-48, where "life" is contrasted with the punishment of gehenna. And the word "contempt" brings to mind such passages as Prov. 10: 7, "The name of the wicked shall rot;" and, with [illegible]

3, Mal. 4: 3; "Ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be as ashes under the soles of your feet;" Matt. 13: 40-43; 2 Pet. 2: 9-12; and Ps. 92: 7; "When the the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever;" where Hengstenberg remarks: "The annihilation of the wicked comes into notice as the basis of the deliverance of the righteous, which is the proper theme of the Psalm." This commentator doubtless means an earthly annihilation; and yet, as typical, if not in its proper import, it is a plain and direct argument for a final extinction.

We are left to such parallel passages because the phrase "everlasting contempt" does not explain itself. One of them is cited in the Talmud, which gives a Jewish doctrine of punishment thus: "Those who sin and rebel greatly in Israel, as well as gentile sinners, shall descend into gehenna, and there be judged during twelve months; at the end of which the body is consumed, the soul is burned up, and the spirit is scattered beneath the feet of the just, as it is said in Mal. 4: 3." (Rosh Hashana, f. 17, 1.)

Matt. 8: 12; "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. 13: 42; "And shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Comp. ver. 50, ch. 22: 13; 24: 51; 25: 30; Luke 13: 28, and Rev. 22: 15.

These are some of the expressions supposed to describe anguish as a continuous finality with the lost. But the illustrations given in Matt. 13: 30, 40, from the burning of tares, and in ver. 48 from the refuse fishes of the net, with the remark, "So shall it be at the end of the world," certainly indicate that the pain described may not be undying. And the passage just cited from the Talmud shows that the Jews at an early day supposed these pangs were mortal; as also their use of the terms "second death" and "gehenna."

But the Scriptures may here explain themselves, for they contain elsewhere the very expression on which the argument turns. The passage in Ps. 112: 10, is parallel with those last cited, and reads thus: "His righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honor. The wicked shall see it and be grieved; he shall gnash his teeth, and melt away, the desire of the wicked shall perish." These words, and what is said in Matt. 8: 12 of the disappointed "children of the kingdom," show that the "gnashing of teeth" is a picture not of mutual rage among the lost, but of vexation at being finally excluded from the kingdom of light and life.

Matt. 18: 8; "Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off and cast them from thee; for it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than, having two hands or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire." Matt. 25; 41; "Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Jude 7: "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

Here the same phrase, (pur aionion,) is rendered by the like expressions, "everlasting fire," and "eternal fire." It is manifestly equivalent to the phrase "unquenchable fire," just examined; and in Matt. 18: 8, and Mark 9: 43, 45, if we take the received text, the two phrases are given in different accounts of the same discourse of our Savior. We may therefore reason from either to the other; and if we have found the true import of the one, we have also the import of the other. The "eternal fire" can not preserve that which the "unquenchable fire" consumes and destroys.

But we may also show how the two adjectives denote the same thing. And we shall examine the passage in Jude chiefly, because it is expressly made an "example" from which we may infer what the phrase signifies, and because commentators have here bestowed most of their elucidations.

And here they commonly give what we regard as the true sense of the phrase. It is the eternity of effect, which often appears in the Scriptures. The "eternal fire" is that which consumes utterly and forever. Thus Witsius, after saying that the words here are "not to be restricted to that fire wherewith these cities are burnt, but to be extended to the flames of hell, with which the lewd inhabitants of those cities are at this very day tormented," adds: "But it is true of both, that they were burnt with fire, with which respect to the towns may in some measure be said to be eternal, they being so consumed as that they never shall or can be restored." (Economy of the Covenants, b. 1, c. 5.) But if this sense is good for the towns, why not also for the lewd people, and in their "second death" as well as the first? And why, when the sense is "extended" to the second death, is it also reversed, and a destroying fire made to typify unconsuming flames? Hence Whitby well remarks: "I conceive that they [the inhabitants] are said to 'suffer the vengeance of eternal fire,' not because their souls are at present punished in hell-fire, but because they and their cities perished by that fire from heaven, which brought a perpetual and irreparable destruction on them and their cities." Schlichtingius, whose Socinian views did not hinder the concurrence of others, says: "The sense is, that those cities suffer an eternal overthrow, which came upon them as a punishment by fire, which is called 'eternal' from the effect of the eternal overthrow, by a usual metaphor. Thus death is called 'pale' for it makes men pale; and 'eternal' as destroying forever; so likewise the judgment of the wicked, Heb. 6: 2." Priceus says: "We may understand pur aionion of a destroying fire; a fire, that is, which utterly wasted and reduced them to nothing." And Bloomfield: "On the pur aionion commentators (I think) require too much. Byssus explains it: a fire which burnt till it utterly consumed them. See Whitby. It is not necessary to press on the aionion. We need only suppose the Apostle's meaning is, they are publicly set forth (prokeintai, which is a forensic term,) for an everlasting example (in their fiery destruction) of the punishment God sometimes inflicts for sin in this world, which is but a faint type of that which he hath reserved for the next." (Critical Digest.) Very true; a fire that utterly consumes is a "faint type" of a destruction ever going on and ever incomplete. Hammond, in a passage before cited, speaks of "the utterly irreversible destruction, such as fell on Sodom, called aionion pur, eternal fire, utterly consumptive." (Comm. on Rev. 20: 6.) Episcopius takes the passage in the same sense. (Resp. ad 64: Quæst., q. 62.) Dr. Gill explains the phrase of "a destruction total, irreparable, and everlasting." * Newcome says: "Everlasting in its effects; the cities having been finally destroyed." Adam Clarke takes it as applying either to the inhabitants or to the cities, and says: "In either case the word pur aionion signifies an eternally destructive fire; it has no end in the punishment of the wicked Sodomites, . . . it has no end in the destruction of the cities; they were totally burnt up, and never were and never can be rebuilt. In either of these cases the word aionios has its proper and grammatical meaning." And Rosenmuller: "We may understand pur aionion of a destroying fire; that is, one which utterly wasted and reduced to nothing. But we may also understand a fire perpetually smoking."

Some writers in support of the orthodox view insist on the fact that the participle "suffering" is in the present tense. But their inference does not follow for four reasons: 1. The word is also in the feminine gender, and describes the "cities" as such rather than the inhabitants as individuals. 2. The present tense is ever freely used in historical or lively description. 3. The punishment of gehenna is not suffered until the final resurrection and judgment. 4. Granting that the present tense is used accurately, the verb is often used to denote a condition as well as actual conscious suffering; and this sense of it would be warranted by the last remark of Rosenmuller. But Macknight paraphrases thus: "Having undergone the punishment of an eternal fire."

And in the same view of the cities as an eternal monument of desolation Cajetan remarks: They "were burned with fire from heaven, of which conflagration, the traces still remain and ever will remain to the end of the world; to wit, a continual desolation, a Dead Sea, constantly smoking and exhaling pitch and sulphur wherewith it was burned; admitting neither fish nor any living thing, but speedily destroying them; producing apples of emptiness and ashes; so that Sodom has the appearance of a past fire, and is a vivid example of what will be in gehenna." Estius cites this with approval. Be it so; if the antitype is true to the type, what will be the immortality of the lake of fire and brimstone, the Dead Sea of the world to come?

And [illegible] been an example, in that [illegible] more known and celebrated [illegible] marks, "among authors sacred and profane, Jewish, christian, and heathen writers, the fire that fell down upon Pentapolis, or the five cities of Sodom, they being mentioned still in Scripture as the fire which God overthrew with [illegible]

A Poetical Sermon.

TEXT.—1 Cor. 15: 58.

BY F. P———.

Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand,
Work always till right is restored,
Forasmuch as we know that no labor is vain
That is wrought in the name of the Lord.

(Concluded.)

The weakest must labor as well as the strong,
For all there is something to do;
Improve on the talent the Master bestows,
Remember the interest is due.

We all have a station, an office to fill,
We all have a Master above;
He shows us the labor he'd have us to do—
We work by the promptings of love.

And some he has chosen to lead in the strife,
To be first in the battle array;
And some are to follow and bind up the wounds,
And care for the sick in the way.

There's the bold noble Paul, and the sweet loving John,
And Luther, the lion in might,
And the winning Melancthon,—what contrast is here!
Yet all were defenders of right.

What though in our weakness ascending the scale
We strike on a quivering chord?
Remember, the widow "gave more than they all,"—
When weak we are "strong in the Lord."

There are fathers and mothers in Israel, we know,
Old warriors long in the war;
There are babes in the Lord who must gird on their mail,
And fight till the conflict is o'er.

We must work in the vineyard by spreading the truth,
We must work by upholding the right,
In pulling down error, oppression and sin,
In bringing salvation to light.

By feeding the hungry, by tending the sick,
By cheering the heart that's cast down,
By pointing to Jesus, the kingdom to come,
The robes, and the glorious crown.

We must not be weary in doing his will—
The reward 's at the end of the race,
A glory unspeakable, fadeless and pure,
A glory begotten of grace.

What joy and what peace even here he bestows
On those who repent and believe,
And in the bright kingdom of glory beyond,
They shall life everlasting receive.

How many have labored and toiled all the day
Earth's pleasures and honors to win,
Whose reward "everlasting destruction" will prove,
For death is the wages of sin.

Why toil we for perishing pleasures of earth,
When the ravishing prize we may gain,
Of glories unfading, eternal and pure,
Of pleasures unmingled with pain?

Our work must be constant, unflagging our zeal,
Our end is a thorough reform,
To be wrought not in sunshine's bright moments alone—
We must carry it on in the storm.

Oft duty will clash with our feelings, we know,
Our will in rebellion will rise;
Let duty throughout hold absolute sway,
Though it sever the tenderest ties.

Through evil report we must follow the Lord,
And truly the most of the way
Is through clouds and thick darkness, yet, glory to God,
It will end in a glorious day!

As well we must climb up the steep, craggy rocks,
As to feed in "green pastures" below;
As well must we toss on the storm-heaving sea,
As to glide where the "still waters" flow.

We must always abound in the work of the Lord,
No workman must ever turn back;
To-day and to-morrow, unwearied and firm,
We must keep on the enemies' track.

We must never be weary, we know we shall reap
If we faint not nor fall by the way,
When the sheaves are all gathered, the Shepherd shall call,
And the sheep hear his voice and obey.

When the kingdom of Christ is established on earth,
And Satan's dominion cast down,
Thank God! there is rest for the laborers then,
And the cross shall be changed for the crown.

Our labor shall not be in vain in the Lord,—
It is our sweet comfort to know,
That in the great harvest we joyful shall reap
What here, even weeping, we sow.

The christian may know that he toils not in vain,
His faith may insure the reward;
And the bread that he casts on the waters of life,
He shall find again, saith the Lord.

There was never a fruitless expression of love,
And a kindness never was lost;
Each act has a bearing for good or for ill,
Repaying the effort it cost.

In many a sorrowing, sin-stricken soul,
Comes back some encouraging word,
Which spurs him to action, though years have rolled on
Since first the kind warning was heard;

For the love-spoken word of the days that are gone
Has unceasingly haunted his breast,
When the lips that had spoken are silent in death,
And the speaker has gone to his rest.

It has followed him close through the mazes of sin,
Like a monitor always at hand,
It has stirred up his conscience, once latent and dead,
To anguish he could not withstand.

That word is sweet music of late to his ears,
For it proved like a spy on his track;
Till at last up the hill of repentance and faith,
It has brought the poor wanderer back.

Kind words to the sorrowing never can die,
For memory cherishes love,
They are "new every morning, and fresh every eve,"
Like the blessings that come from above.

And though the effects are not instantly seen,
Love never was given in vain,
And kindness gone by is like balm to the heart
When it's throbbing with anguish and pain.

Be not, then, discouraged, though long it may be
Ere the fruits of our labor appear,
We know there's a strength in each love-spoken word,
And a balm in each pitying tear.

The seed that we sow springs not instantly up
Till the showers shall have moistened the soil;
Then mourn not because in a moment of time
We see not the fruit of our toil.

And, oh! when we gain the blest shores of our home,
And join with the numberless throng
In swelling the chorus unspeakably grand
Of the great and the glorious song,—

If there should be those whose unspeakable bliss
Our kindness has helped them to gain,
We'd know when we worked in the name of the Lord,
Our labor was never in vain.

My friends, let us live as a CHRISTIAN should live,
Let us fight as a CHRISTIAN should fight;
For "the night is far spent and the day is at hand"—
Let us gird on the "armor of light."

And oh! may the home of the ransomed be ours,
The robe, and the harp, and the crown;
We'll join the archangel in singing his praise,
When our Master and Savior comes down.

Thank God! that the way-marks are telling e'en now,
That the pilgrim will soon be at rest,
That soon the immortal hosannas shall ring
Through the mansions prepared for the blest.

Beloved, be steadfast, immovably stand,
Work always till right is restored,
Forasmuch as we know that no labor is vain
That is wrought in the name of the Lord.

Does Death Kill?

In a previous article I examined the argument of some who suppose that if the first death does not kill the soul, the second will not; and who think that the supposition of a separate existence of the soul implies its immortality. This inference, I endeavored to show, is unfounded; and I intimated that the view of my friendly objectors is even more open to their own objection. Let us see if it is not so.

The view of my objectors is this:—that man consists of a living body only; that when the body is dead, no part of his being remains but a corpse; that in the resurrection either the same body, particle for particle, is raised up; or, so many particles are re-collected as will make the resurrection body the same; or, with different particles, the resurrection body will have the same structure or constitution, so that the character and being may be identical.

Whichever view be taken, so long as the separate existence of the soul is denied, one thing may be said. When the body is dissolved, as it is in thousands of instances, the person no more exists than he did a thousand years before he was born. Our bodies are formed from the food we eat and the air we breathe. These come from the four winds, and from all the quarters of the globe. And most human bodies are mostly, and many human bodies are wholly, scattered thither again whence they came. For aught we know, every cubic yard of the whole atmosphere, and of the sea, and every yard of the whole surface of the earth, may have its portion—its particle—of the same body that lived and moved, forty or fifty years ago, among men.

Now I shall not here at all deny or question the power of God to collect again the same particles of a body, thus diffused over the globe, and to re-form them in the same former body. Whatever difficulties belong to that supposition, they are not the point of my present argument. The question now is not what God can do, or cannot do; but, what is the deadening and destroying power of Death?

And it seems to me that when the body is thus scattered, if no soul is left, however unconscious and inert or inactive, then the person is just as dead as dead can be; I do not see how the second death, or ten thousand deaths could make him any deader. And the person is not only dead, or lifeless, but just as much out of existence as he was a hundred years before he was born. You may say that the atoms which formed his body exist, that the materials for his resurrection exist, and that the fact will appear in due time. But then I should reply that by the same reasoning he existed a thousand years before he was born, the material of his being existed before the flood, and the fact appeared in due time, for he was born. One style of speech is just as proper as the other. Hence, according to the view of my objectors, either the dead have ceased to exist; or, they have existed ever since the creation. Either they are annihilated; or, they never will be annihilated, except by God's remanding their atoms back to nothingness.

But, although the dead be so utterly dead, as dead as they were a hundred generations before their birth, and as dead as any will be a thousand years after the judgment and the second death, our good friends still believe they will come to life again. Dead as they are, they are not finally dead. Far away from existence and as nearly out of existence as they have been for six thousand years, they will come forth again, and give the most honest account of themselves that ever can be given, in the great day. Death, the great enemy, has struck them down, and trampled them as rudely and as ruinously as he can—and still they live! He has killed and destroyed them temporarily, just as completely as they ever will be killed or destroyed—and yet they bloom out in life again, just as if he had never touched them with the tip of his finger! Is it not my turn to ask of my objectors, Does your death kill? You say that he kills the dead very dead once; but they come to life again. How do you know that he will succeed any better in the second attempt? If the first death does not kill finally, how can you infer that the second death will kill finally? In the view of my friends, the nature of death is precisely the same in both cases. It is as utter an extinction in the first instance as in the second. What logical assurance can they give that the second death may not be followed by life, as well as the first?

Perhaps they will say, the Bible assures us that the righteous alone will live forever. Very well. But this is to abandon logic, and resort to the Scriptures. And I have the same scriptural right to believe that the wicked will not live forever that my friends have. However, I have a way of thinking that my view of the nature of death is more plainly consistent with the declarations of Scripture.

For my view is simply this,—that there are two instalments of death. The death of the body kills it. It is a real, literal, killing death. As the effect of it, the body becomes a corpse at once, and ere long ceases to be even that. This death also deprives the soul of its action, as the mainspring is useless without the watch. This death is also, as a first instalment, the picture of all death, showing that the second death will destroy the soul, as this destroys the body.

But if the first death destroys the body and not the soul, it is easy to see how there may be a resurrection before the second death, but not after it. While a part of the being remains, there may be life again. But when the entire being is destroyed—soul and body—to live again is impossible. My friends, who have feared that death, as I define it, involves immortality, must not wonder now when I tell them that as I understand death, in its two instalments, it seems to me that a resurrection after the second death is beyond the power of God himself. For such a resurrection would be a re-creation, which is impossible, since what is newly created is different from that which before existed.

Hence I think that in my view of death, the second death kills finally and forever, as a logical result of my definition. Whereas I see in the view of my friends no logical security against immortality after the second death. And I have shown that some who held their view of the nature of the first death, as Tatian and Thomkinson, actually held eternal torment nevertheless.

IDLENESS.—Idleness is the bane of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness, the step-mother of discipline, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, the cushion on which the devil chiefly reposes, and a great cause not only of melancholy, but of many other diseases; for the mind is naturally active, and if it be not occupied about some honest business, it rushes into mischief, or sinks into melancholy.—Burton.

Family Worship.

BY M. MATHEWS.

Brother, you have a home, I suppose, and in it is your life companion, together with the little ones that God has given you. She is "all your fancy painted her,"—affectionate and godly. She helps you to bear many of life's important cares, and soothes many a sigh, assuages many a pain, either moral or physical. Your little ones have grown up around you in beauty,—

"They grew together side by side."

You were prospered in your merchandise; your flocks and herds multiplied; death never entered your dwelling. Have you knelt down daily with your dear ones and thanked God for these mercies? Have you taught your children to pray, by precept and example? Has "the old-fashioned Bible" been opened by you before them, and have you there given them,—not only their "daily bread,"—but that bread which comes down from heaven? Have you showed them the way of eternal life? Have you told them of Jesus? Have you pointed them to Calvary and directed their footsteps to Zion? Have you said by action, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord"? And when temptations have surrounded your sons and daughters, and they have made known their common trials and difficulties to you, their best earthly friend, have you gone low at the foot of the cross, and with united voices told Jesus? Have you taught them to

"Cast each burden on the Lord,
And peace and comfort find"?

My brethren, my sisters, you that are heads of families, do you know how great a responsibility rests on you? Do you know that you stand as a great connecting link between your children and the Father of all? Have you not need to pray for grace to guide them aright, that this chain may be so cemented by the love of heaven as to abide firm forever around the hearts of your children and the throne of the Eternal? You prayerless!! You, who have in your keeping the hearts and interests of all dear to you in this world! Do you then feel of yourself sufficient for these things? No man is. The necessary wisdom and patience for training these to-be-immortals must come from the true fountain of all strength and goodness.

What looks more like a "heaven begun below," than to see a whole family bowed at the altar of their hearts, and one after another breathing thanks and adoration to God, and supplicating his continued mercies? And then that hymn! How sweetly blend those voices! The parents sing in full melody,—the children lisp from the eldest down to the youngest, and here the lisping becomes more interesting till we exclaim, "Out of the mouths of babes hast thou ordained praise!"

Then let an altar be erected to God, in every family. Let the world know whom you will worship. Let them know that you will pray to the living God. Open your doors, and invite your neighbors in. Like Daniel, leave your windows open. Fill the air with the incense of a broken heart. Pray! It will pay its fare. It will not be lost time. If it may not save others, it will save you, my brother. Keep praying and praising. Pray with all your might. Throw your whole soul into it. Be mighty in prayer. Don't you know there lives a certain character who would rather hear you curse than pray,—he

—"trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees."

Then pray till he trembles like a reed shaken in the wind. Pray!

The Word Spoken by Angels.

"If the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape"? etc.—HEB. 2: 2.

1. The above text teaches us that Angels have at some time in the past spoken, and

2. That their word was sure, steadfast, unchangeable, irrevocable.

3. That somebody disobeyed and transgressed the same. And

4. That all without a single exception who thus disobeyed or transgressed, for so doing received a just recompense of reward.

The Lord in a certain place in the good book declares thus: "Behold I send an angel before thee. . . . . Beware of him and obey his voice, provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions." As much as if he had said, For every single act of disobedience or transgression you shall receive a just recompense of reward, not in a single instance shall you obtain pardon. The word of my angels is sure, steadfast, unalterable.

In considering the subject the following questions naturally arise: When, and to whom have angels spoken, and their word been disobeyed or rejected? What was the reward that all such transgressors received? Was it eternal death? Was the angelic message given to all that lived from Adam to Moses? Was it to all that lived from Moses to Christ? Was it the Law, as some at the present day declare unto us? If so, does it not follow that every single individual without an exception that did not keep every iota of the law has died an eternal death? The text declares that every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, no possibility for a single act of disobedience or transgression to be forgiven there. If then reference is had to the law, and the penalty was eternal death, what possible chance is there for any to be saved before Christ, except Enoch and Elijah and the little ones that did not know and disobey the law?

I have yet to learn that angelic messages have ever, in a single instance, been given to the mass, but, on the contrary, in all cases they have been to individuals. I have also yet to learn that in a single instance the reward for disobeying their word was eternal death, or that any man received his reward for any of his sins except the very identical act of disobedience or transgression then and there committed, leaving the balance in reserve to the judgment of the great day to be settled and rewarded.

But Angels have spoken, and in some instances their word was disregarded and every such disobedience or transgression received a just recompense of reward. Two Angels appeared to Lot and said, "Hast thou here any besides? son-in-law, and thy sons and thy daughters, and whatsoever thou hast in the city, bring them out of this place." Lot went out and rehearsed the warning of the Angels in their ears saying, "Up! get ye out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city." They rejected the message and disobeyed the word. Yet the word of the Angels was steadfast, sure, irrevocable, and those who disobeyed received a just recompense of reward.

Again, remember Lot's wife. When the morning arose, the Angels hastened Lot, his wife and daughters, saying, "Escape for thy life, look not behind thee lest thou be consumed." Lot's wife disobeyed, and, as in every other instance on record for disobeying, received a just recompense of reward; not for all their sins previously committed but for that identical act of disobedience then and there committed, leaving the balance to the judgment to be punished. So in all cases where special angelic messages were sent; if rejected, they received a just reward, no chance left for pardon or forgiveness; but under law as under the gospel, men repented and were repeatedly forgiven. This all can see by examining the 105th Psalm and numerous other places on record. To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no light in them. [From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

Dan. 12: 2; "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Here, as in Matt. 25: 46, a contrast is made between "everlasting life" and something opposed thereto. Do the terms which describe this imply an immortal life of the lost?

It is thought by good critics that the word "many" denotes not the general resurrection, but that of the righteous; the "first resurrection" spoken of in Rev. 20: 5. The sense would then be, that these, who awake, rise to everlasting life; while the rest are left to shame and everlasting contempt. This would agree with the Syriac version: "some to death, and the eternal contempt of their companions;" the term "companions" referring to those who live; or, in a dramatic way, to the fellowship of death, as in Isa. 14: 9–20; Ezek. 32: 24, 25, 30.

But in any case the resurrection foretold gives great prominence to the literal sense of the phrase "everlasting life." And the contrasted expressions confirm this view. The word rendered "shame" (diraron) is the same which is rendered "abhorring" in Isa. 66: 24, where, says Dr. Wintle, it denotes "a kind of spectacle, show, or nausea;" and it is translated "nausea" by Buxtorf in his Concordance. The allusion is to the putrefaction of death. And thus not only is Isa. 66: 15 a parallel passage, but those above cited in connection with it, and also those in Matt. 18: 8, 9; Mark 9: 43–48, where "life" is contrasted with the punishment of gehenna. And the word "contempt" brings to mind such passages as Prov. 10: 7; "The name of the wicked shall rot;" and, with ver. 3, Mal. 4: 3; "Ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be as ashes under the soles of your feet;" Matt. 13: 40–43; 2 Pet. 2: 9–12; and Ps. 92: 7; "When the the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever;" where Hengstenberg remarks: "The annihilation of the wicked comes into notice as the basis of the deliverance of the righteous, which is the proper theme of the Psalm." This commentator doubtless means an earthly annihilation; and yet, as typical, if not in its proper import, it is a plain and direct argument for a final extinction.

We are left to such parallel passages because the phrase "everlasting contempt" does not explain itself. One of them is cited in the Talmud, which gives a Jewish doctrine of punishment thus: "Those who sin and rebel greatly in Israel, as well as gentile sinners, shall descend into gehenna, and there be judged during twelve months; at the end of which the body is consumed, the soul is burned up, and the spirit is scattered beneath the feet of the just, as it is said in Mal. 4: 3." (Rosh Hashana, f. 17, 1.)

Matt. 8: 12; "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. 13: 42; "And shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Comp. ver. 50; ch. 22: 13; 24: 51; 25: 30; Luke 13: 28, and Rev. 22: 15.

These are some of the expressions supposed to describe anguish as a continuous finality with the lost. But the illustrations given in Matt. 13: 30, 40, from the burning of tares, and in ver. 48 from the refuse fishes of the net, with the remark, "So shall it be at the end of the world," certainly indicate that the pain described may not be undying. And the passage just cited from the Talmud shows that the Jews at an early day supposed these pangs were mortal; as also their use of the terms "second death" and "gehenna."

But the Scriptures may here explain themselves; for they contain elsewhere the very expression on which the argument turns. The passage in Ps. 112: 10, is parallel with those last cited, and reads thus: "His righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honor. The wicked shall see it and be grieved; he shall gnash his teeth, and melt away; the desire of the wicked shall perish." These words, and what is said in Matt. 8: 12 of the disappointed "children of the kingdom," show that the "gnashing of teeth" is a picture not of mutual rage among the lost, but of vexation at being finally excluded from the kingdom of light and life.

Matt. 18: 8; "Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off and cast them from thee; for it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than, having two hands or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire." Matt. 25; 41; "Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Jude 7: "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

Here the same phrase, (pur aionion,) is rendered by the like expressions, "everlasting fire," and "eternal fire." It is manifestly equivalent to the phrase "unquenchable fire," just examined; and in Matt. 18: 8, and Mark 9: 43, 45, if we take the received text, the two phrases are given in different accounts of the same discourse of our Savior. We may therefore reason from either to the other; and if we have found the true import of the one, we have also the import of the other. The "eternal fire" can not preserve that which the "unquenchable fire" consumes and destroys.

But we may also show how the two adjectives denote the same thing. And we shall examine the passage in Jude chiefly, because it is expressly made an "example" from which we may infer what the phrase signifies, and because commentators have here bestowed most of their elucidations.

And here they commonly give what we regard as the true sense of the phrase. It is the eternity of effect, which often appears in the Scriptures. The "eternal fire" is that which consumes utterly and forever. Thus Witsius, after saying that the words here are "not to be restricted to that fire wherewith these cities are burnt, but to be extended to the flames of hell, with which the lewd inhabitants of those cities are at this very day tormented," adds: "But it is true of both, that they were burnt with fire, with which respect to the towns may in some measure be said to be eternal, they being so consumed as that they never shall or can be restored." (Economy of the Covenants, b. 1, c. 5.) But if this sense is good for the towns, why not also for the lewd people, and in their "second death" as well as the first? And why, when the sense is "extended" to the second death, is it also reversed, and a destroying fire made to typify unconsuming flames? Hence Whitby well remarks: "I conceive that they [the inhabitants] are said to suffer the vengeance of eternal fire, not because their souls are at present punished in hell-fire, but because they and their cities perished by that fire from heaven, which brought a perpetual and irreparable destruction on them and their cities." Schlichtingius, whose Socinian views did not hinder the concurrence of others, says: "The sense is, that those cities suffer an eternal overthrow, which came upon them as a punishment by fire, which is called 'eternal' from the effect of the eternal overthrow, by a usual metaphor. Thus death is called 'pale' for it makes men pale; and 'eternal' as destroying forever; so likewise the judgment of the wicked, Heb. 6: 2." Pricæus says: "We may understand pur aionion of a destroying fire; a fire, that is, which utterly wasted and reduced them to nothing." And Bloomfield: "On the pur aionion commentators (I think) require too much. Benson explains it: a fire which burnt till it utterly consumed them. See Whitby. It is not necessary to press on the aionion. We need only suppose the Apostle's meaning is, they are publicly set forth (prokeintai, which is a forensic term,) for an everlasting example (in their fiery destruction) of the punishment God sometimes inflicts for sin in this world, which is but a faint type of that which he hath reserved for the next." (Critical Digest.) Very true; a fire that utterly consumes is a "faint type" of a destruction ever going on and ever incomplete. Hammond, in a passage before cited, speaks of "the utterly irreversible destruction, such as fell on Sodom, called aionion pur, eternal fire, utterly consumptive." (Comm. on Rev. 20: 6.) Episcopius takes the passage in the same sense. (Resp. ad 64: Quæst., q. 62.) Dr. Gill explains the phrase of "a destruction total, irreparable, and everlasting."* Newcome says: "Everlasting in its effects; the cities having been finally destroyed." Adam Clarke takes it as applying either to the inhabitants or to the cities, and says: "In either case the word pur aionion signifies an eternally destructive fire; it has no end in the punishment of the wicked Sodomites, . . . it has no end in the destruction of the cities; they were totally burnt up, and never were and never can be rebuilt. In either of these cases the word aionios has its proper and grammatical meaning." And Rosenmuller: "We may understand pur aionion of a destroying fire; that is, one which utterly wasted and reduced to nothing. But we may also understand a fire perpetually smoking."

Some writers in support of the orthodox view insist on the fact that the participle "suffering" is in the present tense. But their inference does not follow for four reasons: 1. The word is also in the feminine gender, and describes the "cities" as such rather than the inhabitants as individuals. 2. The present tense is ever freely used in historical or lively description. 3. The punishment of gehenna is not suffered until the final resurrection and judgment. 4. Granting that the present tense is used accurately, the verb is often used to denote a condition as well as actual conscious suffering; and this sense of it would be warranted by the last remark of Rosenmuller. But Macknight paraphrases thus: "Having undergone the punishment of an eternal fire."

And in the same view of the cities as an eternal monument of desolation Cajetan remarks: They "were burned with fire from heaven, of which conflagration, the traces still remain and ever will remain to the end of the world; to wit, a continual desolation, a Dead Sea, constantly smoking and exhaling pitch and sulphur, wherewith it was burned; admitting neither fish nor any living thing, but speedily destroying them; producing apples of emptiness and ashes; so that Sodom has the appearance of a past fire, and is a vivid example of what will be in gehenna." Estius cites this with approval. Be it so; if the antitype is true to the type, what will be the immortality of the lake of fire and brimstone—the Dead Sea of the world to come?

The passage in Jude, we remarked, sets forth an example. And these cities have been an example in fact. "Nothing was more known and celebrated," Whitby remarks, "among authors sacred and profane, Jewish, christian, and heathen writers, than the fire that fell down upon Pentapolis, or the five cities of Sodom; they being mentioned still in Scripture as the cities which God overthrew with a [illegible] desolation; in the Apocryphal writings, "the waste land that yet smoketh.'"

* On Matt. 25: 41, Dr. [illegible]

They are made an illustration of God's threatenings in Deut. 29: 23; "The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger and in his wrath." Compare Isa. 1: 9; 13: 19–22; "Babylon . . . . shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah," etc. Jer. 20: 16; "And let that man be as the cities which the Lord overthrew." Jer. 23: 14; 49: 17, 18; "Edom shall be a desolation, ... as in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; . . . . no man shall abide there." Ch. 1: 39, 40; Lam. 4: 6; Ezek. 16: 41–55; "When Sodom and her daughters shall return to their former estate" (a proverbial way of saying, Never; implying their irrevocable destruction.) Hos. 11: 8; Amos 4: 11; Zeph. 2: 9; Matt. 10: 15; Mark 6: 11; Luke 10: 12; 17: 29, 30; "It rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Rom. 9: 29; 2 Pet. 2: 6: "Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample to them that after should live ungodly." "Overthrow," not "torment," is the favorite word; and this passage in Peter is specially similar to, and illustrative of, that in Jude.

Thus the Scriptures. See also Wisd. 10: 6–8; "When the ungodly perished, she delivered the righteous man, who fled from the fire which fell down upon the five cities. Of whose wickedness even to this day the waste land that smoketh is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness; and a standing pillar of salt is a monument of an unbelieving soul. . . . They left behind them to the world a memorial of their foolishness." 2 Esdras 2: 8, 9; "Remember what I did unto Sodom and Gomorrah; whose land lieth in clods of pitch and heaps of ashes." 3 Macc. 2: 5; "Making an example for posterity of the haughty Sodomites, signalized for their crimes, with fire and brimstone didst thou consume them." Philo (De Vita Mosis, 1: 2;) "The cinders, brimstone, and smoke, and the obscure flame as it were of a fire burning, yet appearing about Syria, are memorials of the perpetual evils which happened to them." Josephus (Antiq. 1: 1, c. 11, § 1.) Clement of Rome (ad Corinth. c. 11:) "Lot was saved out of Sodom, when all the country round about was judged (or, burned, destroyed) by fire and brimstone." Strabo (Geog. 1; 16; "Many signs indicate that this is a burnt district; for we find burnt rocks and an ashy soil, and drops of pitch distilling from the rocks, and bubbling streams of fetid odor." Tacitus (Hist. 1: 5, c. 7;) "Not far hence are the plains which they say were formerly cities, and were struck with a thunderbolt, and were afterwards burned with fire from heaven." Solinus (Polyhist 1: 35;) Diodorus Siculus (Hist 1: 19, c. 98.)

And so notable was the example of this destruction, that it furnished the Jews a proverbial way of execration. "Whatever was useless, or rejected, or abominable, or accursed, they used to say, to show their rejection and detestation of it, 'Let it be cast into the sea of salt,' or the bituminous lake; thus, for instance, 'any vessels that had on them the image of the sun, or of the moon, or of a dragon, let them be cast into the salt sea.' Talm. Bab., Avoda Zara, f. 42: 2; 49: 1; 53: 1; 71: 2; Nazir, f. 24: 2; 26: 1, 2; Bava Metsia, f. 52: 2; Zemura, f. 22: 2; Meila, f. 9: 3; 10: 1." (Gill, on Rev. 20: 15.)

We may here also notice one or two instances in which the classic writers have used expressions very similar to that in hand. Cicero speaks of the "eternal fire" (ignis æternus) preserved in a temple, as one which might be negligently allowed to become extinct. (Pro. Fonteio, c. 17.) And Ovid speaks of Telephus as perishing by an "eternal disease" (æterna consumptus tabe.) This phrase is precisely equivalent to that in which we found a fever called "an unquenchable fire;" and it plainly means "a mortal disease."

But a far more significant instance of the phrase in question occurs in the writings of Libanius, of the fourth century, some of whose letters are addressed to Basil and Chrysostom, they having been his pupils. Speaking of the city of Troy, he says: "It lies an example of the calamity of an eternal fire." The expression is so nearly identical with that in Jude as to indicate Libanius' familiarity with the epistle. He virtually compares the sack of Troy to the overthrow of the cities of the plain. But he certainly did not conceive of Troy as still burning; and no more did he think of the Trojans as living in the flames of hell. Hence, until it is shown that he used the phrase without warrant, his expression must be added to the above numerous proofs that "eternal fire" utterly destroys; and the famous proverb, *Ilium fuit, becomes a symbol of the doom of the lost. "They shall be as though they had not been."

If all these witnesses can not explain Jude's allusion to a signal "example," we must despair of its explanation altogether. But we readily agree with Hengstenberg: "As the fire and brimstone point to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, so it is very natural to suppose that allusion is made to the dead sea as the earthly image of hell. (Comm. on Rev. 19: 20.) And if the Dead Sea be truly a picture of the doom of the lost, the following words of the Talmud may be applied: "The men of Sodom have no part or portion in the world to come, and shall not see the world to come." (Sanhedrim, f. 29: 3.)

Some of the expressions we have cited are specially pertinent to our exegesis of the word "everlasting" (aionios) confirming the sense which orthodox writers have allowed: the eternity of effect. And if the great "example" of the doom of the ungodly is an "overthrow" or destruction by a so-called "eternal fire" in such admitted sense, then where is the argument for taking the same phrase in Matt. 18: 8; 25: 41, in an infinitely different sense? We find no reason for this whatever. Rather the equivalent expression already noted in Mark 9: 43, 45, would of itself warrant the remark of Whately: "It would follow, if the correspondence [between literal fire and worms and their antitype] hold good, that the fire figuratively so called, which is prepared for the condemned, is something that is really to destroy and put an end to them; and is called 'everlasting' or 'unquenchable' fire, to denote that they are not to be saved from it, but that their destruction is to be final." (Future State, Lec. 8.)

The examples from the Scriptures of the eternity of effect will be given in connection with Mark 3: 29 and Heb. 6: 2. But one parallel passage should here be noted: "For ye have kindled a fire in mine anger, which shall burn for ever." (Jer. 17: 4.) Calovius, Grotius, and the Assembly's Annotations, explain "for ever" as meaning "for a long time." But Lowth, one of the best commentators on Jeremiah, says: "That is, 'Till you be consumed,'" and refers to ch. 7: 20; 15: 14; 21: 2; on the first of which places, "And it shall burn and not be quenched," he says: "It shall make a total destruction," referring to Deut. 32: 22: Ps. 89: 46, and other places.

Wilbraham Campmeeting.

If a campmeeting is appointed with the general consent of the brethren all over the land, it is highly consistent that it should be fully attended. Well, the campmeeting at Wilbraham, which seems to exist by the consent of all our brethren, is to occur the 20th of August. Now, my dear brethren and sisters, let us all make special and abundant provision to be there at the time. The great question, that our Lord is soon to come, and the kingdom of God immediately to be "set up," must not be lost sight of. We, not knowing when the "time is," are to ever watch and pray, inasmuch as we live in the "time of the end." I must regret that some of our dear friends seem to forget the great question, and turn aside to "hobbies," and "vain jangling." Perhaps by coming together we may be able to stir each other up to the great practical question itself—"The coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

I have made up my mind to be present at the Wilbraham meeting, if I am permitted, and do my part of the preaching this year; for the obstacles which have been in my way heretofore are now removed. Come, let us rally once more in earnest. It may be this is the last time. If not, it will do us good to be in prayer and praise together a week or so. Let us come together, not to criticise and speculate, but to worship God and seek the salvation of men. Let us not bring our dear peculiar hobbies to preach, but let us come together to preach Christ, the resurrection, the inheritance, and other great, awful, practical questions.

It is time that we look the day of God solemnly in the face, and prepare to meet our Judge. The signs of the times speak as never before. Their tones are tones of thunder. Let us heed the alarm. O for a heart to feel the force of the Word of God! O for faith to drink the full cup of holy truth! Edwin Burnham.

Love Supreme.

Men are not to have their christian graces like revolving light-houses, that flash a white light, then a red light, and then a space of darkness, to be followed by separate flashes. This love is to be revolved, but it is to have no changes of color. It is to be like the broad light of morning, that carries in itself all the separate colors which the rocks, the flowers, the wood are allowed to separate the light into its constituent elements, and feed upon some parts while reflecting others. As the great atmosphere through the hemispheres holds the fullness of the light in all its parts, and carries it, unanalyzed and undivided, in the full glory of its whole unity, round the world and through the eternal ages, so the soul is to carry this great spirit of love. It is to dwell supreme, not only but without intermission. It is to rule the ruler of the mind. It is to be in us, Lord of lords.—H. W. Beecher.

☞ You will perhaps be amazed when I tell you that it is not so necessary to watch against great crimes as against faults which may appear to us small and indifferent.—Chrysostom.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 4, 1860.

Castleton.

This place still affords good news. We have great reason for praising the Lord for his wonderful works among this people. Many, who had been considered past all hope of reformation, are now rejoicing in the Lord. They had lost their confidence in popular theology and the fashionable, lukewarm religion of the day, and with sadness had turned away, seeing no hope of anything better; but when the plain Bible truth was presented to them, they reformed at once, and embraced it with joy. They could see the "goodness of God" in the destruction of the wicked, and it led them to repentance. This great truth has had a powerful effect upon the minds of the people in removing infidel objections against the Bible, and has produced the most happy results. Scores are now happy in the love of Jesus, who had been hardened under the preaching of eternal torment, till it had no effect upon them, only to excite disgust. Now they see the consistency and harmony of the Scriptures, and ardently love the pure doctrine which they contain.

Our sectarian enemies stand confounded at the glorious work here accomplished by the Lord, but think it cannot be genuine because it did not come through their organ. As they cannot meet the evidences of our blessed hope, they spare no pains in circulating false reports against us for the purpose of keeping others away from the meetings, and to neutralize the effect of the truth; but in spite of all their efforts, the work still goes on. Last Lord's day, June 24th, seven more were baptized, making ninety-five in all.

This church, of about one hundred members, is a growing one. It is soul-cheering to hear them speak in their meetings. Their common saying is, "The past week has been the happiest one of my life." Every day seems to open to them new beauties in the word of the Lord, and new joys in the christian's hope. Many more are almost persuaded to join the happy company.

They are building a commodious house of worship, which they purpose to have occupied in about two months. The prosperity of the Lord is with them.

Lord's day evening, nearly a hundred gathered around the table of the Lord to commemorate his death and sufferings. It was a heavenly season. At its close, we bade them a reluctant farewell, hoping finally to meet at "the marriage supper of the Lamb."

Questions.

Bro. Grant:—A scientific Spiritualist, that is, a Spiritualist versed in the modern science of Geology, has been giving a course of lectures in this place to full audiences on his favorite topics. He simply announced "Lectures upon the structure of tha earth, illustrated by various charts" etc., and thus many attended with a desire for information. But the closing lectures were upon the origin of man, and the future destiny of the earth. In them he discarded the Bible wholly, ridiculed the idea of creation as therein expressed, exalting the laws of nature, and harping upon the Spiritualists' favorite theory, progressive development.

I could not but think that this was truly the day of "false teachers," when many are being turned away from the truth by fables, or the "oppositions of science falsely so called," and that it is indeed a dangerous time to live. Here were the beautiful unfoldings of nature, speciously entwined with the poison of infidelity, and the young mind was receiving it with its wonted avidity for knowledge. God and his sacred word were set at nought, while man's reason and philosophy were placed in the ascendant. The Lord be praised, that simple faith humbles the pride of man, making him feel his own insufficiency, and that God is all in all. Enough for him to know that the "worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things that do appear;" that "He spake and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast."

I should like to have some friend of the Crisis, who is posted in the science of Geology, answer through the paper these questions:—

1. Does this science militate against the Bible account of the creation?
2. Is it inconsistent with Scripture to believe that the work of creation occupied successive ages, and that these were the days specified?
3. Are the statements of geologists facts, or only fancies?

Some light on this subject might be acceptable to many others as well as to the writer, and aid the cause of truth.

Lockport, N.Y. A. C. J.

Answers.

1. It does not. True science and the Bible are ever in harmony. It may be laid down as an axiom in morals, that no two truths clash with each other.

2. It is not. In Gen. 1: 5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31, we read, "The evening and the morning were the first day . . . the second day . . . the third day . . . fourth day . . . fifth . . . the evening and the morning were the sixth day. There is no intimation, nor any chance for a legitimate inference to be drawn, that the sixth day was any shorter than the first, nor that any of them were longer than the days now. When the Lord instituted the Sabbath among the children of Israel, he gives as a reason the following: "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is."—Ex. 20: 11. He does not say six long periods, but these days are defined by a revolution of the earth upon its axis, causing morning and evening, as at the present time. In Ex. 31: 17, we read again, "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed." Why does the Lord repeat this declaration if it is not true? Who knows best about this matter, the Creator, or puny man? Has man become so wise as to correct the Lord? Who are these geological wiseacres that pretend to know more at forty than "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity?" A few years since, they did not know enough to keep out of the fire, or to feed themselves! Are they now so learned as to instruct the Almighty? Were they present at the creation, so that they can correct the Most High? Well might the language of the Lord to Job be applied to these: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? . . . Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare if thou hast understanding . . . Knowest thou it because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great?"

3. In answer to the third inquiry, we would say, some of the statements are facts and some are fancies; and on the latter are based their evidences brought against the Mosaic account of creation.

Many geologists assume that the different strata and their modifications have been produced by such forces as are now in operation; and that consequently, their formation must have required many ten thousands of years. It is assumed by geologists, that the primary strata were formed from vast mountains of granite, that gradually wore away by the action of chemical and mechanical forces, and then carried by rivers into the ocean and deposited in layers; but they fail to prove the existence of any such mountains; or even if they could, that the current of rivers extends across the ocean so as to deposit what earthy matter might have been mingled in their waters when passing some rapids, hundreds of miles before they reached their calm movement at the entrance of the great deep. It is well known that the waters of the ocean continually resist the influx of the rivers, thus causing them to deposit at once what little granite or other minerals they may bear to its shores.

We dispute the causes which geologists claim have produced the various strata of the earth, because they are sheer assumptions, and inadequate to effect the specified results. Our Creator could have made all the various strata during the first day of creation, as easily as he could make man the sixth. And when the Bible affirms a fact, shall we receive man's contradictory and baseless assumptions, and thus make God a liar, and throw away the Bible? The geological theories contradict each other, and many of them are irreconcilable with the known laws of matter. Many of their conclusions, as they freely admit, are based on assumptions, and hence not reliable. They are mere conjectures—suppositions. Shall we reject the Bible for theories resting on such a basis? If the various strata of the earth were formed in accordance with the operation of natural laws, by deposits in the ocean of particles of granite carried by the rivers from obliterated granite mountains; why do we not find new strata still forming by the same process from the existing mountains? Nature's laws must have been changed, or become inactive, if the strata were formed as geologists claim. In either case, their argument for the great age of the world becomes like "the baseless fabric of a vision." They argue that the laws of nature are unchangeable, but facts demonstrate that new strata are not now forming in obedience to those laws; hence we come to the legitimate conclusion, that the strata of the earth were not formed as geologists affirm, and consequently are no index to the age of the world.

In relation to the argument based on the vegetable and animal remains found imbedded in the strata of the earth, as proof of the long periods intervening between the creation of the different orders of animals; it is equally unsupported by facts, and cannot be reasonably brought against the Bible account of creation. For if the strata were produced, as geologists affirm, by particles worn off from granite mountains, and washed into the sea, it would take thousands of years to form a layer a few inches deep; hence, while a small part of an animal or vegetable was being covered, the greater portion would turn to dust, and be wholly obliterated; but instead of this, they are found petrified in their complete forms, thus showing that they were covered up in these strata in a very short period.

Again, why should the bones of animals withstand, for thousands of years, the action of agents which would wear off granite or other hard mineral substances from the mountains, sufficient to cover them up by the very slow process affirmed by geologists? It will be seen at once that their assumptions are unreasonable and wholly unphilosophical.

On the other hand, as soon as they admit changes in the physical structure of the earth that would accomplish such work in a short time, their arguments for the great age of the world fall to the ground, and the Mosaic account of the creation stands firm as the Rock of Ages. Hence, taking either view, they are opposed by the Bible, facts and philosophy.

Says one of the ablest writers of the age, David N. Lord, when speaking on the system advocated by geologists: "That so mistaken a system should have gained the assent and advocacy of so large a body of studious and talented men, is truly a matter of astonishment."

"The Kingdom of Heaven."

Some one asked "the spirits" what is meant by the "kingdom of heaven"? and they have given the following in their answer as published in the Banner of Light:

"He who is satisfied within himself is not out of the kingdom of heaven. . . . The kingdom of heaven is within you, and the King of Glory is thine own soul. This King of Glory will not point the way among the battles of theologians, but he will go before and lead thee to peace.

The God of olden times, such as was once worshiped by a Moses or Elias, is not the God for you to serve. He is not the King of Glory to you; and the kingdom of heaven that was so to the ancients, is not so to you of to-day. You have a kingdom of your own, a God of your own, and there are as many kingdoms of heaven, and as many different Gods as there are individuals."

According to the teaching of the spirits every man is his own God, lawgiver and judge. Hence, said Henry C. Wright, at the Melodeon in Boston, May 6th, "If I obtain the approbation of Henry C. Wright, I can withstand the opposition of God and the world."

In answer to the question, "Is it right for man to yield obedience to civil law?" the spirits say, "Call in thine own judge, thine own law of right, and allow him to be thy God, and when he decides, abide by the decision, no matter what it may be."

Napoleon III.

It is in vain that the French Emperor and the French press attempt to reassure Europe, and especially England, as to the Emperor's pacific intentions by appeals to the past. However loyal a neighbor and faithful an ally the Emperor may have been for ten years past, that affords very little security as to what he may be for ten years to come. Apart from any innate loyalty to his promises and engagements which as the past abundantly shows, he only considers binding so long as he esteems it convenient to keep them, he had reasons for moderation and peaceable behavior in the past, which no longer exist. The tenure by which he held his power was as yet uncertain, and it was necessary to strengthen and confirm his authority at home before undertaking to extend his dominions abroad. To have engaged at that time in enterprises which might embroil him with his neighbors, would have endangered his hold upon the dominion he had usurped. Being weak, he adopted the policy of the weak. He courted the alliance of England, and carefully abstained from any thing which might revive the antipathies of the past.

Since the Crimean, and more especially since the Italian war, his necessities in this respect have totally changed. He has no longer any occasion to confine his attention so exclusively to home affairs. He has an immense army and navy, whose taste for military glory has only been whetted by the short Crimean and Italian campaigns. He is a man of dark and secret designs which at any moment, as in the case of the Italian war, may lead to movements calculated to make the most material changes in the map of Europe. So long as he continues to keep up his army on its present footing, so long as every effort is made to extend and increase his already formidable naval power, it is not possible that his neighbor should look on without some serious misgivings as to what he may do next. The annexation of Savoy and Nice now just completed, however the Emperor and his ministers may seek to explain that away as an exceptional case, inevitably draws attention to possible designs upon Belgium and Prussia. The boundary of France having been extended to the Alps, by a natural association of ideas, the Rhine suggests itself as likely now to become an object of desire, at least the left bank of it, on the part of the Emperor. Who knows how soon this late faithful ally and royal neighbor, after the example of his uncle, which he so much affects to make the basis of his policy, not content with being merely Emperor of France, may set up as dictator of Europe? It cannot be pretended that France is in any danger of invasion or attack. The immense military and naval preparations which the Emperor keeps on foot naturally suggest the idea of offensive operations. If he wishes to quiet the apprehensions of Europe, let him reduce his arms, and put a stop to the building of steamships of war, which is pushed on with as much energy as if he had on the tapis some great naval expedition. This would go a thousand times further than all the protestations of peaceful intentions which the Emperor and his ministers may make. In fact, these protestations, under the circumstances, tend rather to confirm than to allay existing apprehensions. Next to an actual attack upon his neighbors is the attitude in which the Emperor now stands, of being prepared, at any moment and without warning, to strike a deadly blow.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Grant and Loveland Discussion.

(FROM NOTES BY J. F. COTTON.)

(Concluded.)

Mr. Loveland. No doubt my brother thinks that he has made a very strong point of Christ taking upon him and dwelling in the form of man. If he only took upon him the seed of Abraham he is in nowise related to us in sympathy or lineage, as we do not belong to the Jews and have no feeling in common with them.

He says that "eternal life is a promised gift." I grant this; but last evening I gave my definition of eternal life, viz: "To know God is life eternal." If man even know God he hath life eternal. Every real believer has eternal life. My brother asks, "What is death?" We answer, "To be carnally-minded is death; but to be spiritually-minded is life." According to these declarations many who are still alive are dead, while the believer has life everlasting given to him. Therefore my brother's arguments go for nothing.

My brother refers to—"Who only hath immortality." He does not seem to understand it. The word rendered here immortality is derived from two Greek words which signify absence of all form of death. Man may get beyond the power of death, yet his body has to die. He asks triumphantly, "What is it which mortality puts on?" My brother surely does not imagine that immortality is a substance like a garment which can be put on or something which can be imbibed. I affirm now, and I have affirmed, that the immortality which man is to have depends upon the resurrection. My brother denies the analogy which Paul is illustrating in the sowing and springing up of the seed. The apostle says, "So is it also in the resurrection." A body shall be raised; not invisible or intangible, but what may be seen and felt, such as many in this audience,—myself among the number—have seen and felt. (Sensation. Cries of assent and dissent.) What does my friend do with Paul's statement when he says that it shall not be the body sown which shall be raised? A natural one goes down, a spiritual one rises. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom." With such a passage as that staring him in the face, I cannot see how he can advocate a physical resurrection. (Applause.) (Here the speaker reiterated his argument to prove that the body which would be raised was not a literal body. He then continued.) My brother again attempted to prove that "if we desire a thing, that is proof that we have it not." Let us examine this further. Do we not desire to live at the very time we are enjoying life? If we had not life we could not desire life or anything else. Therefore the fact that we desire immortality is a proof that we possess it. The yearning after immortality proves that we have immortal faculties. So much for my brother's argument.

I have proved that progress is the order of the day—a great round of cause and effect. The power which called us into existence made us just as we are. I never made myself a sinner; no man ever did. By Adam sin entered into the world; and God makes sinners by continuing the race of man. Man lives, and in accordance with his nature he continues to sin; and sin brings its consequences, which are chastisements. By these chastisements man acquires wisdom which otherwise he never would have had.

Were it so that man ceased to desire happiness his case were hopeless; but so long as he lives he desires happiness. By wisdom he sees and acknowledges that God's chastisements are just, and he begins to love the law, and by the law of progression things go on till Jesus Christ has won all to himself and conquered the last enemy, which is death. When this desideratum, the redemption of the universal body of humanity is arrived at, then shall the kingdom be delivered up to the Father. Till then Christ is our intercessor, and the united prayers of humanity rise up for the blessed consummation. Are we not all brothers? My opponent calls me friend, and well; but I call him brother; for are we not all brethren? (Applause.)

Mr. Grant. These are my last remarks. My opponent instead of meeting my arguments has changed the subject to the resurrection of the dead. He says because we are not Jews we are not Abraham's seed. The Jews can date no further back than Jacob. Abraham was a Gentile and as such we claim relationship. But here is yet a stronger, more intimate bond of kindred: "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. 3: 29. My friend says that "they who know Christ shall have immortality." We thank him for that—it is what we claim. He says that "man may become immortal."

Mr. Loveland. I never said so.

Mr. Grant. You certainly did. I put it down and cannot be mistaken.

Mr. Loveland. Then I shall take back that which I never meant to say.

Mr. Grant. He says that "mortal shall put on immortality," and that "the real body is coming up." Our friend is coming over fast if he would only stay there. But he says again that "the material body is not raised." What! the real body comes up yet there is no physical resurrection. What a contradiction! for which he says he has authority equal with ours.

Mr. Loveland. I have Paul.

Mr. Grant. We claim to have Paul upon our side of the question. If a spiritual body comes up does it leave the literal body in the ground? The same incredulity prevailed in Paul's day as exists in ours. He says, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" What was possible for God to do then is possible now. My friend says he never made himself a sinner. Then God did, or else he is none. As God cannot make any man sin, then by my opponent's reasoning there are no such beings as sinners. And yet we read that the angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth.

He says that by the sin of one man all are sinners. We should like chapter and verse for that. That by one man, sin entered into the world, we admit; but that it made all men sinners, we deny.

Mr. Loveland. I said "all" or "many."

Mr. Grant. I should like proof of it. To make a man a sinner because his grandfather was, we think would hardly be reasonable. Nor would it be justice, which my friend says is to be found everywhere. We are chastened for the sins which we commit, the same as a father correcteth a rebellious child. If the chastisement be profitable, well; if not, the father lets him alone. Rom. 1: 32.—"Who knoweth the judgments of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death." Therefore, the best thing which God can do with them who will sin, is, to put them back again to dust from whence they came.

We have already commented upon the words "death" and "dead." In not a single instance where they occur is the idea hinted that any part of man is alive when he is physically dead. We read of some who died in faith not having received the promise; and yet my friend says they are around us. It seems to us that after hearing the proofs which we have brought forward from the Bible, any one should persist in maintaining such a position, he "would not be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

Mr. Loveland. I don't believe it.

Mr. Grant. There has been a manifest disregard shown to the passages of Scripture which we have brought forward; and we think our opponent has entirely failed to prove the inherent immortality of man.

"The groaning of creation." Man has sinned; and the whole creation groaneth for what man has done. The earth rocks with earthquakes, and her bosom is torn by convulsion. All nature sympathizes and waits for the redemption of the body.

In conclusion we think that we have proved the following, viz.:

First. That man is mortal and must return to dust.

Second. The resurrection of the dead refers solely to the man made from the dust of the ground.

Third. That immortality is a gift to the righteous who are raised from the dead.

Fourth. There is no spiritual man which goes out of the body at death.

Fifth. Eternal life is a synonym for immortality.

Sixth. Demons are an order of beings bearing the following names as found in the Bible: "Familiar spirits," "unclean spirits," etc.

Seventh. All manifestations or communications are the work of these demons.

Eighth. As all men are mortal, and know nothing when dead, it is impossible for them to furnish communications.

Ninth. The fact that we desire immortality proves we have not got it.

Tenth. Immortality is not inherent in man because the wicked are to be destroyed and "be as though they had not been." Therefore we come to the conclusion:

1. That human immortality is not taught by the Bible, science or philosophy, and it is not proved by Spiritualism.

2. That immortality is the gift of God dependent upon the character of the receiver. The negative of the first and the affirmative of the second are sustained by the word of God. O that we may all seek for immortality! It is a noble prize to contend for. Once gained it can never be taken away. May it be ... [illegible] ... it. [Time.]

MR. LOVELAND.—In closing this discussion I wish to notice some of my brother's positions by a few brief remarks. He claims that nothing goes forth from man at death but his breath; and that nothing rises but his body. I have proved that spirits exist in another world, and that Christ preached to them after death. Are the dead not around us? Paul says that we are encompassed by a great cloud of witnesses.

As eternal life is a knowledge of God, it cannot be synonymous with immortality. I will admit that sometimes destruction means annihilation; as for instance, when sin and death are destroyed there will be nothing but life; but substance never can be annihilated. I have proved that the universe is made up of means and ends; and also, I have proved the law of progress. I have proved that punishment is the means used to make better those who are chastised. Annihilation would be revenge without effecting any good, which good would be shown by bringing back those who have gone astray and placing them in a state of joyous existence forever and ever. If it had not been for sin there would have been no Jesus—no ransom—which was greater than the world's creation. But for sin there had been no mercy, no long-suffering; there would not have been scope for the goodness and greatness of God. Sin comes in as a necessity of the universe. Then so far as we are concerned we are made sinners by our Creator. We are all made susceptible to pride, vanity, covetousness, and revenge; not that we may thereby know pain and sorrow, but that we may unite in one band of brotherhood, and we may jointly groan and wail for the one relief. The whole heart of humanity beats together, and together groans for the same final redemption and the same glory. As Jesus writhed in that bloody sweat and agony, so does every human soul vibrate in heaven and in earth until the last throb of anguish gives place to the first thrill of joy. Here is not a cruel tyrant seizing its victim with the grasp of vengeance and crushing him beneath the iron heel of despotism; but the well-timed severity of a father that his child might be reclaimed. Man as a being of progress is used even in his sin as a means to enhance the glory of Him who makes even the wrath of man to praise him. Man shall progress from ages to ages still rising from one grade of honor and glory to another still higher throughout eternity. The cross was not raised in Eden, neither was the cry, "Father, forgive them," heard upon Sinai.

In conclusion let me say that the views which I have presented are the views of the congregated Spiritualists throughout the world, notwithstanding the calumny which blind materialists would throw upon them. To them the universe is no Babel of discord, but a round of harmony and love. They are in advance of all other beliefs and creeds and are sustained and strengthened by the Bible, as is proved by the experience of men and women in the past, and which is sustained by the science and philosophy of these latter days.

P. S. Here ends my synopsis of this important discussion. Of necessity it is much condensed, but I think the readers thereof will see in it another triumph of the Bible over Spiritualism. If my friends think I have been tedious, I can only say I have done the best I could.

Forbear.

Time spent in labor to make people believe that we are the subjects of malicious persecutions, and of placing ourselves in analogous circumstances with the ancient Hebrew children upon whom the fire of the King had no power, and of others that absolutely walked with God, I believe to be time improperly spent, especially when we have given the enemies of the Lord, occasion to blaspheme by our unhallowed course of life. Better to take the example of a repenting David, and as he did wait until asked, then let us act the humble part that he acted, and say, "It is of the Lord let him curse." He knew he had been verily guilty, yet he besought the Lord for forgiveness instead of taking off the reviler's head, and David triumphed through forgiveness; while he that reviled entailed upon himself unhappiness for the whole of his earthly existence. Rather let supplications, giving of thanks, and prayer be made for all men, with especial earnest entreaties for ourselves and our enemies; and when we become absolved, as the Psalmist did, we shall be heard to say to the cities of Judah, "Lift up your voice; yea, lift it up with strength, say, behold your God, behold he cometh with a strong hand; his reward is with him and his work before him."

Correspondence.

From Benj. Spaulding.

BRO. GRANT:—The good work of the Lord is going on in Salmon Brook Plantation. Bro. Corliss baptised two willing converts yesterday, and several more are waiting. The whole neighborhood is under conviction, so much so, that opposition has shut her mouth; almost every person comes out to our meetings; we have them every evening at five o'clock. Last Sabbath held an interesting meeting in No. 12, a new township. Every ear and eye were open, and tears showed that hearts were affected. The subject presented was new to most of them. Found two believers in the faith once delivered to the saints. The prospect is very good for that neighborhood. Blessed be God, there is yet power in the gospel to convert sinners and enlighten christians.

The truth is doing wonders here. This is a good field to work in. My health is good, and I enjoy the work. Tracts have been distributed in every house as far as we have been, but they will fail before we get over the large field, and we shall want more. I feel grateful for the privilege of circulating these little messengers of truth. May the good Lord bless the givers. This is an economical way of doing good, when we can add some exhortation with the tracts at every house; and it don't cost $500 a year to support the Colporteur or Missionary. If any wish for the privilege of helping to circulate Bible truth in this way, they can have the chance. Let them send in to the World's Crisis office what they please, and let a bundle be made out and sent to Bangor, Me., by express, directed to Lemuel Smith, of Bangor. Bro. Smith will forward them to me.

If any of our Advent brethren wish to come to Aroostook, let them come, it is a good country, smooth, well watered, well timbered with maple, birch, beech, pine, spruce, hemlock, fir and cedar. It is easy land to cultivate, and very fast settling. The townships around Presque Isle are mostly filled up, but there is plenty of land yet a little back. It is being settled mostly with Yankee farmers, and, if time should continue, must be a great place. The St. Andrews Railroad comes within fifteen miles of Presque Isle. It probably will be completed this fall; and the probability is, that some day there will be a railroad from Bangor through Aroostook to intersect with the St. Andrews, then the communication will be easy to every part of the country. The price of the State land is fifty cents an acre, and that can be paid in work upon the road. Those who are pleasantly settled, I would not recommend to move here, but to such as are unpleasantly settled, and to young men who have no families, I can recommend this country. Let them come with habits of industry, frugality and economy, and they can do as well here as in any state in the Union. The great productions of the country must be live stock, sheep, butter, cheese, oats, barley, wheat, and potatoes. Any amount of roots can be raised, as well here as anywhere.

If any wish to come into a neighborhood of Bible christians, let them come to Salmon Brook Plantation, or No. 13, Third Range. Here they want a preacher to settle down with them, and a man of God would find plenty of work. He could work part of the time on the land, and the brethren would be very ready to help him. Let some of our Advent preachers come this way. It is an encouraging field for labor. But let them come calculating to endure hardness like good soldiers of Jesus Christ; no lazy ministers are wanted here. It does not hurt a minister to work with his hands; it does him good; it is for his health.

Pray for me, all ye who love the Lord.

From Bro. Robert Chown.

BRO. GRANT:—In compliance with the Master's injunction to Peter, "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren,"—Luke 22 : 32, we may be Peter-like, willing to go to prison, or death for the truth's sake. Satan is just as busy now as he was in Peter's day, if he can turn us from the one faith, he will have achieved a great work. The promise of the Master was, "that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." It is conclusive, if we are "children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."—Rom. 8 : 17. "It is a faithful saying, for if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him. If we suffer, we shall also reign with him."—2 Tim. 2 : 11, 12. John tells us, "Now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him."—1 John 3 : 2.

The new heavens and new earth are sure, for God hath promised them. The Sabbath of rest is sure for God's people, when Jesus shall bring them into the land where Abram dwelt with Isaac and Jacob, heirs of the same promise. Paul says, "Now to Abram and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one and to thy seed, which is Christ." The land of Canaan was promised to the Christ. If this is overlooked, or supplanted, it sappeth the very life of the gospel. If we have no faith in God's promises, or have another faith, we are on dangerous ground. We are almost to the time when Jesus, the Christ, will commence his reign on his father David's throne, and take possession of his Father Abraham's promised land.

The Savior must return to raise the dead before it can be accomplished. Moses shows that the dead will be raised and that God is the God of the fathers. Those that attain unto the resurrection will die no more, for they will be equal to the angels, being the children of the resurrection. It is evident that the seed of Abraham were cut off because of unbelief; they rejected the messenger. It is to be feared that many will fail because of their rejection of the message of the gospel. Many are trying to obtain righteousness some other way; some by the law which only gave the knowledge of sin. Now "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, to every one that believeth."

Let us live in love to God and man, having "charity, which is the bond of perfectness." Let us, dear brethren, who are looking for the Master's return soon, make another trial of our ownselves, both as it regards our faith and practice; and be sure that all is right, having our loins girded about with truth, and having on the whole armor, and we like men that wait for their Lord, that an abundant entrance may be administered unto us into his everlasting kingdom.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

The Naples (June 6th) correspondent of the London Morning Star writes:

"Garibaldi is organizing the insurrection in both its civil and military departments. He has ordered a levy which in the course of two months will give Sicily an army of 50,000 men. Each province will have a Governor, nominated by Garibaldi, with a Council chosen by the people. He has already nominated a Committee of Defense for the town and the island. Ammunition is being manufactured in the island, and muskets are arriving every day. About 2000 political prisoners have been liberated, and 800 galley slaves have set themselves free. The Neapolitan Government expect that the next attack will be upon Messina.

The Sicilian campaign has cost up to the present time about 3700 lives; the wounded amount to about double that number.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR GARIBALDI.

In the evenings of the 8th and 9th, three thousand volunteers left Genoa to join Garibaldi. Each of them had a ticket, directing him to be, at 9 o'clock in the evening, at Cornigliano, at a villa on the sea-shore. On the 8th three steamers, and on the 9th two others left the port, and proceeded, it is said, off that villa, where they remained in waiting. They towed as far as Cornigliano some large boats, which were employed for embarking volunteers and ammunition. A great number of those volunteers wore the uniform of Piedmontese riflemen, having formed part of the corps which had been disbanded. One of the steamers was deeply laden with stores; she had on board, among other things, six pieces of field artillery.

A letter from Genoa, in giving an account of the departure of several vessels laden with volunteers, arms and stores, for Garibaldi, states that, as an instance of the enthusiasm of the population, eighty boatmen, who had been engaged to embark the cargo of the above mentioned vessels, unanimously refused to accept any remuneration, and all the others, one hundred and sixty in number, on learning what was to be done, earnestly desired to take part in the work on the same conditions.

ALARM IN NAPLES.

NAPLES, June 10. Everything wears a war-like aspect here, and there is no lack of energy in making preparations for putting down the almost universal rising of the nation. Steamers come and go day and night—ammunition in great abundance and provisions are sent without ceasing; and that there is any necessity for the latter, shows how completely the government has lost the command of the island. From one magazine alone—that of Scafati—one hundred and eighty cantaris of powder have been brought over this week to Baia, for the manufacture of bombs—those amiable persuaders, those favorite counsellors, of the Bourbons.

ANOTHER BATTLE.

Another great battle is said to have taken place near Catania. Much blood is said to have been shed. Naples is full of reports, as usual, among which are that there has been another disembarcation of foreigners at Rossano in Calabria; that the Queen Mother has left, or is about to leave, for Vienna; that Gen. Letizia has returned again from Palermo with fresh dispatches for the King.

RUSSIA.

A letter from St. Petersburg, dated the 5th of June, says: "Anybody who wishes to be well received at the Court of St. Petersburg, must not speak ill of the Emperor Napoleon or of his subjects. I cannot describe the joy felt among all classes when it was known the French Government was in accord with the Emperor Alexander on the Eastern question."

THE BADEN CONFERENCE.

It is stated on good authority that the Emperor Napoleon, in his conversations with the German Sovereigns, repeated pacific assurances, without alluding to questions regarding the interior or exterior policy of Germany, or to the Italian question.

The Turin (June 17th) correspondent of the London Times says.—

"Everywhere in Sicily the royal troops are giving way, and fall back on their last stronghold of Messina. But it seems almost certain Garibaldi will waste no time in a siege. He will leave Medici and others to organize the Sicilians for that final work, and will himself strike some great blow in his own style on the main land. In their present buoyant frame of mind people here feel sure both that the King of Naples can offer no resistance, and that no finger will be held up to stay his downfall. I have pressed the hand of a great and good man here this morning, and he told me, with that confidence which arises from positive knowledge, that 'the Bourbon and his dynasty have passed away.' As he took leave of the Neapolitan General, Garibaldi assured him 'he would never rest till he saw the Italian tri-color waving on the bastion of Castel St. Elmo at Naples.'

LATEST NEWS PER GREAT EASTERN.

Paris, Saturday, June 16th. The Emperor Napoleon was received at Baden by the Grand Duke, and met with a good reception in the town.

MESSINA, June 10th. A secret committee in the city is in correspondence with Garibaldi. The alleged insurrection in Calabria is denied. Catania has been evacuated. Several officers and a party of Neapolitan soldiers had deserted and returned to Palermo, whence they were sent to Calabria.

The Great Eastern Safely Moored.

NEW YORK, June 28. The Great Eastern passed the Battery at 4.30 this afternoon. She crossed the bar as easily as a pilot boat. An immense fleet, composed of crafts of all descriptions, crowded with passengers, attended her. The Battery and all the piers on North river were crowded with spectators, the mammoth vessel being greeted by them with cheers as she passed. Salutes were fired from different quarters and vessels. She was decked with flags, and moved very swiftly, only one of the hundreds of steamers being able to keep alongside of her. The steam frigate Niagara, which is lying in the stream, looks small by comparison.

The Great Eastern is moored at the foot of Hammond and Troy streets, in the North river, and she extends two entire blocks. Immense crowds are flocking to see her. On her way up, she was saluted by all the forts, steamships and other vessels, which were returned from her. Staten Island, Long Island and all available points were crowded by people. It is estimated that nearly a million of people witnessed her arrival.

A PRICE PUT ON THE HEADS OF NAPOLEON AND GARIBALDI.—A Florence letter in the Providence Journal, referring to matters at Rome, says that some surprising revelations are being made in an investigation which is now going on under the direction of the Commandant Bellot of the French garrison. A plot has been discovered, in which several of the Roman prelacy are said to be implicated, with no less an object than to cause the assassination of the Emperor Napoleon and General Garibaldi. The head of the former, according to the testimony, was valued as high as 500,000 francs, and that of the latter 100,000 francs. Two individuals, with the names of Franchi and Mariani, were the ones to put the design into execution.—Traveller.

Obituary Notice.

Another "flower" "cut down."—Job 14 : 2.

In Portland, Me., June 23d, 1860, sweet little EDWIN T., youngest son of Capt. Joseph and Lucinda Kinsman, yielded to the cold grasp of the "King of terrors," and fell asleep in Jesus aged nine months and twenty days.

As dies the choicest, fragrant flowers,
So Edwin passed away,
But soon he'll bloom in "Eden's bowers,"
Forever there to stay.

☞ The following Circular has been sent to various towns and cities of New England:—

Circular.

As a number of brethren have expressed the desire for a more efficient system of action, whereby the cause of truth may be advanced, and especially those great principles with which we as a people are more particularly identified; therefore,

Resolved, That we will, and hereby do, call a Convention of brethren, to be holden at Providence, R. I., commencing Wednesday, July 25th, to take into consideration the wants of the cause, and to adopt some measures which shall serve as a more successful plan in carrying on this work.

F. H. BERICK,	J. HEMENWAY,
H. L. HASTINGS,	W. PRATT,
D. T. TAYLOR,	H. MUNGER,
C. F. HUDSON,	J. S. WHITE,
J. COUCH,	M. GRANT.

Convention.

The convention already announced by the above Circular, to be holden at Providence, R. I., commencing July 25th, bids fair to be one of considerable interest.

It is well known that for a number of years the belief of the immediate coming of the Lord, and especially the different time arguments, has resulted in a disposition to have little or nothing to do with any thing like a systematic plan by which to advance the peculiar interests of our cause. The conviction that no system was needed, has been very much strengthened by the supposed evil effects that would result from an organization; hence, while there has been no unanimity as to a plan of operations, we have been perfectly unanimous in having none. Time and experience have shown the error of this course; nothing else, however, could have done it. Many brethren, who have had to work single handed, with no aid and but little sympathy, have inquired whether something cannot be done. Some there are who cannot succeed without help. Shall they be aided? Shall we come together with hearts disposed to work—to act? or shall we, by our absence and silence, say we will do nothing?

The invitation is extended to all who are interested to attend.

F. H. BERICK, for the Brethren.

To the Brethren in New York.

Brethren: We are requested by Bro. John Stevenson, C. W., to inform you that the small chronological chart, forwarded about sixteen months ago to Bro. Lederer, of "The Israelite Indeed," and afterwards in the hands of Brn. Green, Doolittle and others, is expected to be forwarded to the office of the World's Crisis, Boston, at as early a date as possible. Will they see to it?

Grove Meeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a grove meeting on land owned by Newman Briggs, by the side of Peach Pond, in the town of North Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y., about four miles southeast of Brewster's Station, on the Harlem R. R. The meeting will commence Aug 9th, 1860, and continue over the Lord's day. We expect to have a tent to sleep in, and we want the brethren and sisters to bring beds, blankets, etc. If any have tents, bring them. We invite all to come and labor with us to the glory of God. We want the preaching brethren to follow the Lord and come in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. Brethren and sisters, pray for this meeting, that God's signal blessing may attend our efforts.

GEORGE L. TEEPLE.

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. BOUTELL, Groton; M. H. CORLISS, Lowell; E. HEATH, Lynn; S. AYERS, Worcester; M. M. YOUNG, East Boston, Committee.

Tent Meeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a Tent Meeting held on the farm of Uriah Ladd, near the Burrough's Bridge, in Stanstead, C. E., to commence July 6th, and continue over two Sabbaths. Come, brethren, to this meeting; bring your beds and provisions, and there will be rooms prepared for you. Elders S. W. Thurber and H. S. Reynolds are expected to be present. All the ministering brethren are invited to attend and labor for the salvation of those out of Christ.

Committee of Arrangements, JOSEPH WHITCOMB, T. MORRILL, WILLARD AYER, A. CRANNE.

Grove Meeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a grove meeting the 14th and 15th of July, on land of Mr. Dale, at the White Oak Mills, (on the Alleghany river) Warren Co., Pa., two and a half miles below Tidioute. Bro. Geo. Bush will be with me to aid in presenting the truth. J. T. ONGLEY, Evangelist.

Notice.

The Advent brethren in New York meeting at the corner of Grand and Elizabeth Streets, wish to say to the preaching brethren who wish to visit them and preach to them, that before they send their appointments to the Crisis, they first communicate with Eld. Wm. Roworth, 354 Pearl Street, so that their appointments may not conflict with others.

Dedication in Vernon, Vt.

Our new chapel will be dedicated to the service of God on Saturday, July 7th, at half-past ten o'clock, A. M. Bro. Himes and Grant are expected to attend, and remain with us over Sunday. E. G. SCOTT.

☞ The "Voice of the Prophets." The second No. of this work will be published about the 10th of July. It will contain the Table of Sacred Chronology, by Mr. Shimeall, for the 6000 years, with his views of the Great Sabbath. It will be an important number to circulate. 50 cts. per dozen; $3.00 per 100. J. V. HIMES.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as TUESDAY MORNING, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

We'll Sing.

[illegible]

[illegible], who love to sing,
And tune your harps with me;
[illegible] our chain
Of joyous liberty.

Our weary hearts have wandered long
O'er Time's tempestuous sea,
Our aching hearts have sought in vain
For some calm, sunny lee.

We've steered by faith and not by sight,
For oft Hope's star grew pale,
But courage take as wanes the night,
We'll soon outride the gale.

The beacon lights are just ahead,
[illegible] the breakers' foam,
The sea-weeds float, we near the shore,
Thank God! we're almost home.

Then sound again a joyous strain,
As glide the fleeting hours,
The conflict o'er, the victory won,
The Heritage is ours.

The Popular Church Illustrated.

To-day, I learn that a —— minister of ——, abruptly left off preaching to his society, a few months since, under circumstances which illustrate the lamentable corruption of the professed church of these times.

It seems that in hiring their preacher, the church promised him a certain salary, and the proceeds of one or more Fairs or Festivals, which they proposed to hold during the year. But when the first Fair came off, it proved more successful than they anticipated, and the penurious church refused to let the Rev. Director of this grab game have the profits, except as a part of his stipulated salary; thus setting at nought his own services in the trick, as well as their own promises in hiring him. It seems, that he had a "call" immediately.

Since this devoted church is now deprived of their worthy pastor, I can but appreciate, somewhat, their reverse of fortune in the loss of his services; and feeling a disposition to help the needy, I will volunteer to advertise for a pastor for them, one after their own heart:—A —— minister is desired at ——. Since we have man's person in admiration, he must possess a "fine manly figure" of perfect symmetry, neither too short nor too tall; graceful in his movements, and especially his gestures; gentlemanly in his address, and especially gifted in the possession of that trait aptly styled "a winning way."

And since the progress of the age forbids a continuation of the custom, quite proper in the age of our fathers, to "preach the word"; he must be enabled therefore to give us a literary entertainment, or an intellectual feast, according to our taste, and furnish such a popular discrimination of topics for discourse from week to week, as shall create itching ears among the more intellectual and wealthy of our citizens; that we may be not less respected in society than our neighbors, and may find our burdens eased by their abundant purses.

In order to this, we consider it essential that he be gifted of nature with a fine oratorical delivery, reflecting, also, a well conducted education in rhetoric and logic, as well as other accomplishments of the age. He must be copious in his diction, rich in illustration, lively in imagination, and fertile in his resources of general knowledge,—in this latter respect, a mirror of the times. He must possess noble and lofty conceptions of human nature,—no devotee at the shrine of the doctrine of total depravity.

We would have him preach future punishment as a restraint against scandalous sins, and an inducement to flee to the church for refuge, but not too frequently. We would have him preach against immorality, but not "as one having authority," lest seeming severity might occasion worthy members to take offence. We would have him speak respectfully of all of our sister churches, in good standing in society such as Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, etc.; but he must not spare such enthusiasts as Millennarians, Materialists, etc. This point we must insist upon. We would not have him go to the Scriptures, and thus meet them on their own favorite ground; but show by a discriminating sense of propriety, and a refined popular taste, the ridiculous absurdity of their position as manifest in their doctrine and history. He must show that evil men and seducers do not wax worse and worse, as they affirm, but rather, that this is an age of reform; that the "good time coming" is soon to be introduced, and the world converted instead of destroyed.

If we can get one answering to our wishes as herein expressed, we will pay him a good salary, and give him $2.00 per head, for each member united to the church during the year, being the price paid to a noted revivalist in Ill., and will give him the proceeds of each quarterly Fair, with the privilege of conducting it.

Sealed proposals will be received in behalf of the church, by Deacon Worldly Gain, at Portland. L. K. L.

New Hampshire State Conference for 1860.

Was holden at North Barnstead, June 7th-10th. Conference convened at 2 o'clock, P. M., and after the usual devotional exercises, proceeded to business by the choice of Elds. John Morse, Moderator; T. M. Preble, Clerk; and B. Locke, Treasurer. Called for, and heard the minutes of the last session. Accepted. On motion, agreed that the names of the ministers belonging to this conference be now read, which were as follows:—

Elds. Peter Clark, Joseph Harvey, James Morrill, Wesley Burnham, John Morse, Benj. Locke, T. M. Preble, John Knowles, O. G. Smith, Noah Glidden, S. S. Mooney, C. S. Page, D. F. Leavitt, I. H. Shipman, W. H. Eastman, B. P. Manning, J. H. Clark, N. Davidson, (now dismissed,) W. B. Davis, (rejected,) T. W. Piper, C. S. Emerson, Levi Allen, Seth Goodhue, E. J. Brown, I. Edgerly, and C. H. N. Green.

On motion, agreed that the following brethren be a committee to prepare business for the conference, viz.: T. M. Preble, J. H. Clark, J. Harvey. Visiting brethren were now invited to a seat, to take part in the deliberations of conference. On motion, agreed that the ministerial committee of last year be continued for the year ensuing; viz., Elds. J. Harvey, Pittsfield; T. M. Preble, Concord; I. H. Shipman, Sugar Hill. Adjourned till 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 5 1-2 P. M., ministers met in conference according to previous notice. After devotional exercises, on motion of Bro. Harvey, Bro. Charles H. N. Green was received as a member of conference. Ministers were now called on by the Moderator as their names appeared on the list, and each one that were present reported himself according to usual custom. Eld. N. Davidson was not present; but as he withdrew himself from us last Feb.,—as the following notice will show,—and he also having made a request to the clerk to have his name dropped from the records; on motion, agreed that Eld. Nathaniel Davidson be dismissed from this conference. The following is the notice above referred to, which was thought advisable to have published with the minutes of conference, that no one might be misled in regard to the reason why Bro. D. was dismissed from us:—

"RELIGIOUS NOTICE.—The Lord willing, I will open a meeting of public worship at a hall in Brown's building, up one flight of stairs, at the south end of Glen street, a few rods below the Freewill Baptist Church, Feb. 5th, 1860. Under a sense of duty, I have recently dissolved my connection with the Adventists, and feel it my duty to preach Christ to perishing sinners in Manchester. And although in this move alone, still compelled from a sense of duty, I venture forth, trusting only in God, I earnestly desire the prayers of christians that God will direct me, and this effort be blessed to the salvation of sinners. SEATS FREE. Those who do not attend meetings elsewhere are invited to attend.

NATHANIEL DAVIDSON."

Adjourned till 8 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Friday, June 8th, ministers met in conference as per adj. Opened by prayer and singing, and then spent an hour of mutual and happy exchange of thought on various topics connected with the interests of the church. Adjourned to meet at the close of the P. M. meeting of worship. At 9 o'clock, conference of business met as per adj. Business committee called on and reported the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That the time of holding our State conference be changed from the 1st to the 3d Thursday in June.

2. Resolved, That on the first day of the conference the services commence with a social meeting; and following this, a session of the minister's conference.

3. Resolved, That on the second day, the conference of business commence at 9 o'clock, A. M.

4. Resolved, That the fourth resolution which was passed at the last session, be so amended as to read: "The ministers are expected to report themselves," etc., instead of, "shall report," etc. The whole resolution as thus amended will then read as follows:—

"Resolved, That this conference shall hold its sessions annually, on the 3d Thursday in June, at such place, and to commence at such hour of the day as may be appointed from year to year; at which the ministers are expected to report themselves personally or by letter; and the churches by delegates or by letter."

The foregoing resolutions were unanimously adopted; but the following was laid on the table, to be taken up at a future session:

Resolved, That the officers of this conference issue a certificate of the present standing of ministering brethren among us who have either lost, or surrendered their ordination credentials to other denominations.

The remainder of the A. M. was taken up in hearing reports from the churches, and of the state of the cause generally among us. From the reports, it did not appear that we were losing ground, as a people; but, as far as heard from, the prospect was still encouraging for us to press forward;—"Always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord." But inasmuch as very few churches were reported by regularly appointed delegates, and none by letter, the clerk deems it inexpedient to attempt even an outline of the reports. Will not our brethren report themselves by letter in the future? Voted, that the minutes of this session be published in the Herald and Crisis. Adjourned to the call of the clerk.

At the close of the P. M. meeting of worship, ministers met in conference as per adj. At this session, Wesley B. Davis being present, his case was called up, and after spending some time in hearing remarks from several brethren in relation to this sad case, Eld. J. Harvey introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the case of Wesley B. Davis be taken into the hands of this conference, and thereby discharge the council from further duty in this case.

Then, on motion of Bro. Harvey, Voted, that Wesley B. Davis be rejected as a disorderly walker. Adjourned to the call of the clerk.

Meetings of worship well attended, and especially on the Sabbath. Although the weather was quite unfavorable, yet it was expressed by many that from seven hundred to one thousand were probably in attendance, and with marked attention gave heed to the word preached. Some fruit of this meeting will no doubt be seen in "the world to come." Many testified to the great blessing they had received during the meeting. Numbers confessed their backslidings, and at the third meeting on the Sabbath some eight or ten came forward for prayers, and hope was entertained of some that they were converted. May the Lord bless all who covenanted to live henceforth to the glory of God, and especially those young persons who presented themselves for prayers. And may our "whole spirits, and souls, and bodies, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

JOHN MORSE, Moderator.

For the Crisis.

A Few Questions.

Is it true that the Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground?

Is it true that by man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men?

Is it true that by man's disobedience many were made sinners?

Is it true that Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance?

Is it true that by repentance and baptism through our Lord Jesus Christ, we receive the remission of sins?

Is it true that Jesus died and rose again according to the Scriptures?

Is it true, after his resurrection he said to his disciples, "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have?"

Is it true, that if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection?

Is it true that this same Jesus that was taken up into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as he was seen to go into heaven?

Is it true that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, and see him as he is?

Now if these are Bible facts, they are unquestionable. If they are "thus saith the Lord," what business has flesh and blood to cavil, and bicker, and garble about their import? Such a course is unwarranted, unchristian-like and wicked; and implies loss of confidence, and a superficial trust in the Savior.

The apostle says, "It is good to be zealously affected in a good thing"; but he does not say, use zeal for a cloak of dishonesty, making the Word of God of none effect through tradition. What I understand by believing in Christ, is, trusting in him, —relying upon him—placing implicit confidence in him; hence he says: "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in me." If those who hope or profess to have been grafted into Christ, and have become branches of that vine from which issues christian character, would abide by that admonition of Jesus, when he says, "As I have loved you, so ought ye also to love one another," there would be less bigotry, contention and strife, and more harmony and peace, and a manifest disposition to take God at his word.

All I have to say is, "Beware, lest any man spoil us through vain philosophy, and vain deceit, after the tradition of men." Stick to the Bible, and let it be the chart that shall guide us over the sands of the desert of life, and that will furnish us a passport between the gates of the New Jerusalem.

For my own part, I have neither time nor disposition to rack my brain about the consistency or reasonableness of God's commandments; only so far as I am summoned to defend my Savior's character and the Bible as the Word of God. All my physical and mental powers are brought into requisition to keep myself from the rudiments of this world, and prepare for that moment when this mortal shall put on immortality. I have many hopes and associations that bind me to earth; but amid them all I dwell with unutterable joy upon that day when these eager ears shall catch the sound of that anthem as it breaks the silence of Heaven's courts: "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" When lungs made immortal shall inhale the perfume from ever-dying verdure, as it is wafted by ambrosial zephyrs o'er earth's perennial bloom. Such is a glimpse of my hope. Let us prove true to our trust; and though we now look through a glass darkly, then we shall see face to face. Now we know in part; but then we shall know even as we are known. C. G. CARR.

ON THE DEATH OF MARY E. YOUNG.

Thou art gone to the grave, oh! thou fairest of sisters,
And it grieves us to know that death is thy doom,
We can no longer look on thy mild, loving features,
For we have laid them away in the cold, dismal tomb.

Thou hast gone to the grave, we no more behold thee,
Nor hear thy light footsteps so oft round the room,
But the angels of heaven bright watches keep o'er thee,
And the Spirit of God is our guide through the gloom.

Thou hast gone to the grave; we no longer can see thee,
Or hear thy sweet prattle around our fireside;
But Jesus is coming from heaven to free thee,
And open the graves to take home his dear Bride.

Thou hast gone to the grave; yet we love thee as ever,
And trust we shall meet thee on that blissful shore,
At the coming of Jesus—ah! then we shall greet thee,
And in his blest kingdom all dwell evermore.

My Longing Heart cries, Come!

Oh! come, sweet Savior. Come, with thy bright retinue of holy angels. Come, and let these eager eyes behold thee in thy glory and loveliness, and with thy kind yet powerful hand erase the written sorrow of the heart, and change, refine and fashion this frail form like unto thy glorious body, and gather my soul with the righteous, the holy, the just, the innocent, the lovely, and the good and faithful of all nations, both quick and dead, and lead us to that bright and beautiful home, the New Jerusalem—great capital of Paradise restored, when all the sad variety of ills that so embitter this mortal life shall pass away, hope change to glad fruition, and the ransomed of the Lord sing for joy, as they enter through the pearly gates into that sweet and lasting rest that remaineth to the people of God.

Home at last! oh, happy home!

Aye, come! my precious Savior, come, for I am weary and would rest 'neath the healing tree of life, and quench these earnest longings of the heart in the deep fountain of eternal love, and bask forever in the smiles of our Father, who is so beautiful in his perfection, lovely in his attributes, and in whose presence is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures forevermore. "Spiritualism."

NEW BOOK.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—While others are pleading in behalf of their books and tracts, I am prompted to do the same. In the first place, I wish to state why I wrote a pamphlet against Spiritualism. It was because we had no cheap work on this subject. I thought if a pamphlet giving a condensed argument from Scripture, and a brief examination of the foundation of Spiritualism was written, that would sell for ten or twelve cents, it might thus find its way to hundreds who would not purchase a larger and more expensive work. A few friends encouraged the undertaking, and thirteen dollars were given in the beginning for the furtherance of it. It cost about $35.00, and as yet only enough have been sold to pay one half the cost. The publisher approved the work, and desiring it to be circulated, was willing to incur the risk of its being sold, and thus obtaining his pay. It has been read, and recommended by minds competent of judging respecting its merits.

Now I want this widely circulated, and had I the means to pay the remaining sum due, I would place it free in the hands of every Spiritualist whom I could find and induce to read. If a few friends would interest themselves sufficiently to aid, by purchasing one or more dozen, and circulating them in their vicinity, or wherever the fatal delusion is found, it might be the means of saving some. To those who are admirers of Mr. A. J. Davis' writings, it will be shown by ample quotations that, according to his own statements, the foundation of Spiritualism is wholly unreliable, for he declares that the impressions coming from a mind in the celestial, and in the terrestrial sphere, are precisely identical, and that a medium sitting in a circle may receive communications from a mind present, or in a far distant portion of the globe, and yet suppose them to be from a spirit out of the form. Several such admissions are extracted from his writings, going to show the deluded Spiritualist the uncertainty of those revelations which he so confidently receives as coming from some dear, departed friend. The pamphlet will be furnished for half price to those who will take seventy-five or one hundred copies.

One mistake not noticed in the Errata, I will mention, lest I be thought appropriating the labors of others without due credit. The arrangement given in parallel columns contrasting the Spiritualist creed with the Bible, was given as an extract, but the printer omitted the quotation marks. In correcting the proof, I re-marked them, but they were still omitted, so that as it now stands, it is not embraced in the note of acknowledgement at the end of the book.

MARY D. WELLCOME.

Bible Clerks.

We somewhere read of an incident that transpired some years ago in Boston, which beautifully illustrates the importance of decision on the part of young men who would establish a character, and become useful members of society. We will present the substance of the incident. The narrator subsequently became a clergyman, as did other leading members of the party. At the time this incident occurred, he was a clerk in Boston, and roomed with two young men, also clerks. The first Sunday morning, during the intervening hours, from getting up to the hour for church service, he felt a desire to get his Bible, which his mother had given him on leaving home, from his trunk, and read it, as he had been accustomed to do on Sabbath mornings; but he feared the ridicule of his room mates. Such, however, was the agony of his feelings, that he went to his trunk for the purpose, but his dread of ridicule overpowered him. After a few minutes he again opened his trunk, took his Bible in his hand,—and again his fears overpowered him. Closing his trunk, he walked the floor in distress of mind. His companions, who were reading some miscellaneous books, noticed his agitated manner, and asked him the cause. At first, he evaded a direct answer, but after a few moments' reflection frankly told them all about it. They each confessed a similar state of feeling, each having a Bible in their trunks which they dared not get and read for fear of each other. They then mutually agreed to read the Bible on Sunday mornings. While thus engaged the first morning, two other clerks of the same boarding house came in. They stated their agreement to their visitors, one of whom said he had a Bible in his trunk, but had not read it since he came to the city. The other said he would remain with them, and listen to the word of God. The first three of them agreed that they would have a chapter read by one of their number at nine o'clock every night. Soon after, four or five young men were in their room, when the nine o'clock bell reminded them of their engagement. The visitors were frankly informed of their custom, and they at once desired to remain and hear the reading of God's word. The result was, sixteen young men in the house spent the Sabbath morning, as well as a season at night, in reading the Bible; while the moral effect upon the whole household was of the happiest character.

This incident, though simple in itself, shows how much good may be done by decision of character, and fixedness of purpose to perform all known duty, at all times, and under all circumstances. It shows what an influence one person, even a youth, may exert for evil or good. No person should ever be afraid to do right; he knows not the secret feelings of those around him, whatever be the air of levity they may assume. The hearts of a multitude may throb with a desire to do right, who only want a leader,—some one to step forth, and unhesitatingly brave whatever opposition they may meet from the reckless and profane. The young men referred to above, were called the "Bible clerks,"—a rich and splendid eulogy. They all became useful citizens and active christians; some of them were called to the dignified work of the christian ministry.

There is nothing lost, on the part of young men, by strictly observing an upright, conscientious, fearless course of independent decision, but much to be gained. In every aspect in which such a line of conduct may be viewed, it assumes a beauty and a dignity that commends itself to the admiration of every honest, intelligent, mind. It is the only course by which young men can fully establish a character, and secure the esteem and confidence of an intelligent, virtuous public. Honesty, sterling integrity, combined with industry, is important to permanent success in this life, and the young man who reads his Bible attentively, is more likely to become a useful, respected citizen,—to say nothing of its direct influence upon his future destiny,—than he who neglects its divine instruction.—St. Louis Observer.

A Changed Island.

At the Fulton street prayer meeting, New York, a short time since, a ship's officer said he had just returned from a long voyage. He had called at an island, in the course of the voyage fourteen thousand miles sailing distance from here; one which he had known well in former times as an island of cannibals. He stood off and on for some time, uncertain whether to land or not. He considered it dangerous to attempt it. Finally, one evening he ventured to land with a few of his men; and what do you think we found? We found a prayer meeting. It was a meeting of sixty young people—all the children of heathen parents,—but thirty of these were now christians. They had been visited by missionaries from some of the neighboring Christian Islands, and I found them and heard them singing the same tunes I have heard here to day; and I doubt not the same hymns, though in a language which I could not understand.

The Book of Job.

I call that book of Job, apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with pen. A noble book; all men's book! It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending problem—man's destiny, and God's ways with him here on this earth. And all in such free, flowing outlines; grand in its sincerity, in its simplicity, in its epic melody, and repose of reconcilement. There is the seeing eye, the mildly understanding heart. So true, every way; true eyesight and vision for all things; material things no less than spiritual: the horse—"hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?"—he "laughs at the shaking of the spear!" Such living likenesses were never since drawn. Sublime sorrow, sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody, as of the heart of mankind;—so soft and great—as the summer midnight, as the world with its seas and stars!—Carlyle.

"It is only a Prayer Meeting."

"Yes, it is only a prayer meeting, and therefore, if it be a little cold, or wet or snowy—or if it be a little disagreeable traveling—or if I feel a little averse to traveling out, that is sufficient excuse. If it were a sermon, I should not think of remaining at home, but it is but a prayer meeting. Few will be present, and it is so dry and uninteresting, I shall not attend." Is this the language of a christian? Can it be that the prayer meeting is an uninteresting place to the follower of Jesus? Yet is it not too evident that the conduct of many professors of religion, if put into words, would speak plainly the above sentiments? Why is this? Can that church be in a prosperous condition, where a large majority of the members feel and act thus in these matters? We leave the reader to judge.

LIVING DEVOTION.—"I love to see a strong man, and hear his voice in prayer. I like to hear a healthy man sing songs—a man who is a strong worker, a strong thinker, a man inside and out. I love to see the union of the spiritual and the physical. But these thin, lath men—these long-drawn-out men, who have no industry, no work, no life at home—I never love to hear them sing, nor pray, nor think, nor talk. These spiritual do-nothings, these spiritual busy-bodies, these religious flies, going about into every house, in at every window—buzz, buzz, buzz—in at every chamber and every apartment—these miserable insects of devotion are good for nothing at home, neither as parents or children; they are good for nothing, because they say they are serving God. They are of summer life, and when the autumn comes, and all the other insects go, they go too, and nobody cares for their going. They were of no benefit, and their release is our release. They were nothing but mere spiritualism—no benevolence, no philanthropy, nothing but mere pretensions to religion."—H. W. Beecher.

For the Crisis.

Specific for the Suffering.

Though many institutions have been recommended, and many prescriptions given for the sick, I give the following, unrivalled in many particulars.

1. The balm is at hand. No fatiguing or impracticable journey to be performed.

2. It is available for the POOR. No five or ten dollars per week, or advice, are demanded.

3. There is no manifest distrust in God in practising it, and

4. Those just ready to die need not despair. The remedy for ALL sickness I will now give in the author's own words:

"If ANY be sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of FAITH shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." Whatever might have been the pretensions of the author to medical science I know not, as he simply gives his address—thus: "James, the servant of God;" but this one thing I do know, and to which many can attest, that there has been no failure in any case where the prescriptions have been strictly observed in faith. The Uses of the Lungs.

BY H. A. ARCHER, M. D., BROOKLINE, N. Y.

With reference to the anatomy of the lungs, I have but little to say, further than that they are air bags located in the chest, one on each side, the right being one-third larger than the left. In structure they are made up of cells, bloodvessels, and the ramifications of the bronchial tubes.

To the uses of the Lungs, I would more especially direct your attention; for this is a subject upon which the masses are in the dark; and yet there is no function more intimately connected with our physical well being, or that is more wickedly neglected.

In all the mechanism of nature, we find some leading purpose, followed by other subordinate purposes. Thus the first great purpose of the sun is to keep the planets in their places; its subordinate design is to give them light and heat.

So the first great purpose of the lungs is to impart power and motion to our bodies, their subordinate purpose is to eliminate effete elements, or in other words, to ventilate and purify the blood.

The lungs hold the same relation to the body that the wheel does to the mill which it moves. Shut off the water and the wheel stops, and all the machinery with it; shut the air off from the lungs, and how soon all the faculties of the body are brought to a stand.

The power of a wheel is proportioned to its size or diameter, other things being equal; so, man's strength is proportioned to the size of his lungs, everything being in harmony. A man may have large lungs, but if his muscular system is not developed in due proportion by exercise, he will be weak, because there is no ability in the muscle to respond to the lung power acting upon it. In order to be strong and athletic, then, we must develop our muscular system in proportion to the size of our [illegible] to the other.

Why is man, as a general rule, stronger than woman? Because his lungs are a third larger. Why is a horse with a deep, broad, full chest, stronger than one with a thin, flat, hollow one? Because his lungs are larger. From these simple illustrations, is it not evident that the strength of a man or animal is proportioned to the size of lung, or the amount of oxygen he is capable of taking into his body? If a man is about to strike a hard blow, or lift a heavy weight, his last act, before undertaking the feat, is to fill his lungs to their utmost capacity. Why does he do this? Nature instinctively prompts him to take a full inspiration, because this large supply of pure oxygen imparts extra power to his system. Thus it is further evident that our strength depends upon the size of the lungs, or the amount of oxygen consumed. But, says one, I thought our strength depended upon the quantity of food we eat. If this be so, how does it happen that consumptives, who often eat as much or more than men ordinarily do, have no strength? If the food imparts strength, they certainly ought to possess it. Scores of them have said to me: "Doctor, if I only had strength, I should be well. My appetite is good; my bowels are regular; I have no pain; I sleep well: but I am weak." The truth is, the food does not impart strength directly—it simply supplies waste, builds up and renews tissues, and furnishes combustible material in the lungs for generating heat. But it possesses no power to do even this, until in the form of chyle it comes up to the lungs, and is there spread out in the blood vessels upon their expansive surface, (which is several times larger than the surface of the whole body,) and is exposed to the vitalizing and life-giving power of the oxygen of the atmosphere. Up to this point, the food is of no service; it cannot supply a waste or build up a tissue. But after being vitalized,—redolent with life, it returns to the heart from the lungs, and is sent by it bounding and leaping upon its errands of supply, to build up and renew the wastes of the system wherever needed.

Now, you readily see why the consumptive has no strength. He has no healthy lung surface upon which to spread out his chyle, and thus expose it to the oxygen of that amosphere, which is the vital principle, and the result is, it is destitute of its life-giving energy, and is circulated through his system with no power to build up tissue or supply waste; and the system, no longer renewed from without, wastes and consumes away, until the fire of life goes gradually out for want of fuel, and the poor victim sinks into the silence of death.

From these few hints, you will perceive that there is no function so important in developing the health and strength of our bodies, as that of proper, healthful respiration or breathing.—Household Magazine.

Night Air.

An extraordinary fallacy is the dread of night air. What air can we breathe at night but night air? The choice is between pure night air from without and foul night air from within. Most people prefer the latter. An unaccountable choice. What will they say if it is proved to be true that fully one-half of all the disease we suffer from is occasioned by people sleeping with their windows shut? An open window most nights in the year can never hurt any one. This is not to say that light is not necessary for recovery. In great cities night air is often the best and purest air to be had in the twenty-four hours. I could better understand shutting the windows in towns, during the day, than during the night, for the sake of the sick. The absence of smoke, the quiet, all tend to make night the best time for airing the patient. One of our highest medical authorities on consumption and climate, has told me that the air in London is never so good as after ten o'clock at night. Always air your room, then, from the outside air, if possible. Windows are made to open, doors are made to shut,—a truth which seems extremely difficult of apprehension. Every room must be aired from without,—every passage from within. But the fewer passages there are in a hospital the better.—Florence Nightingale.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year............$2.00
For a single copy 6 months............1.00
For a single copy 3 months............50
Five copies to one address for 6 months...4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months...[illegible]
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months...15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months..[illegible]

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters, write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to Eld. Miles Grant, Boston, Mass.

The postage on the Crisis, if prepaid, quarterly or yearly, at the office where it is received, will be 13 cents a year to any part of Massachusetts, and 26 cents to any other part of the United States.

[illegible] CANADA SUBSCRIBERS have to PRE-PAY the postage on their papers, 26 cents a year, in addition to the above. [illegible] The same to all the Provinces.

"The Heir of the Crown."

BY VESTA E. CODWORTH.

The cold moon lights up the mountain height,
Gilding spire and dome,
And softly peeps with her silvery light
Through the chinks of the poor man's home;
And an angel bends with a snowy wing
O'er a form of want and care,
That sits like a watcher pale and thin
By the fire in his old arm-chair.

And vigils long has the poor man kept,
Nobly battling sin;
And while he's suffered, and watched and wept,
Has his youthful eye grown dim;
And his home looks old in the pale moonlight,
Long has it needed repair;
"A few days more (he's musing to-night)
I shall weep in my old arm-chair."

He might have sat in the halls of state,
His coffers filled with gold;
With noble ones of earth, and great,
His name might have been enroll'd;
But he's heard of a land where gold cannot rust,
And laid up a treasure there,
Though all is gone of the shining dust,
And he starves in his old arm-chair.

But the moon has set and cold 's the night,
Still he muses on:
"A city shines in its pearly light,
I know 't is my blessed home;
And all the loved and lost I see,
My little ones, oh how fair!
Welcome! thou beautiful home to me,"—
And he dies in his old arm-chair.

Sovereignty of God.

"Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?"—Amos 3: 6.

The great source of joy to the angels in heaven and to the saints on earth, has ever been, is now, and forever shall be, that "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth;" for though "clouds and darkness may be round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Although his judgments are "unsearchable," and "his ways past finding out" by creatures of yesterday who know comparatively nothing, they are, without exception, the developments of His infinite wisdom and the varied modifications of infinite Love.

There is no truth more clearly revealed in the sacred volume, than the universal sovereignty of Almighty God. "See now that I am he, and there is no God with me: I kill, I make alive: I wound, I heal; neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand."—Deut 32: 39. "I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things."—Isa. 45: 7. "Afflictions come not out of the dust," etc." he maketh sore and bindeth up."—Job 5: 6. The evils of war, pestilence, etc., are all under his control. See 2 Chron. 21: 16, 17; 36: 15—17; 2 Kings 24: 2, 3; Ps. 105: 25; Judges 2: 20—23; Deut. 28: 21. See the whole of this chapter, which of itself is proof ample, and perfectly conclusive, in respect to this important doctrine.

The doctrine of a special providence of wisdom and love, has ever been the joy and confidence of the people of God. The precious truth, that their "times are in (the) hand" of their covenant-keeping God and Father (Ps. 31: 15,) has sustained them, when passing through the deep waters of affliction, and enabled them to sing,—

"Sweet affliction, sweet affliction,
That brings Jesus to my soul."

What an instructive exemplification of the doctrine of special, providential care and love, is found in the history of the patriarchs. Who can rise up from the perusal of the divine record of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, with the shadow of a doubt on this subject? With what gratitude did their holy faith recognize, that what man intended for evil, "God meant it unto good."—Gen. 50: 20.

He is "the Savior of all men (amid the dangers of mortal life), especially of them that believe." "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge, and my fortress, my God, in him will I trust." What is the divine answer to this blessed confidence? "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day. Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee."—Ps. 91: 1—16.

Faith looks beyond sense, takes God at his word, who causeth "the wrath of man" to "praise" him, and "the remainder of wrath" restrains.—Ps. 76: 10. "He turneth the heart of kings as the rivers of water."—Prov. 21: 1.

The Ruler of the universe, who "is wonderful in counsel and mighty in work," accomplishes his purposes by means of his own appointment. Thus all the antecedents which resulted in Joseph's exaltation to the chief magistracy under Pharaoh, and David's accession to the throne of Israel, were most manifestly the providences of God.

The glorious fact that our Father overrules evil for good, gives us no authority to do evil that good may come. The divine precepts to man in the Holy Word are the standard of duty. These precepts require us to use all appropriate and lawful means for the accomplishment of natural and moral good, and, consequently, for the prevention of natural and moral evil. Although it may be the purpose of God that my sickness shall be unto death, it is my duty to obey his command, "Thou shalt not kill" and use all proper means in my power for my recovery to health. If I knew that it was his will to restore me, it is equally my duty to use these means. Means are as much ordained as the end. God gave Paul all the lives in the ship; but they could not be saved except the men should abide in the ship.—Acts 27: 31. So God has given his elect to Jesus Christ, John 17: 2; but they cannot be saved, except they repent, believe, and abide in Jesus Christ, "the true vine."

Most glorious is the truth that God, our God, who is above all gods, ruleth among the nations, and makes one nation the rod of his anger to punish another. "Wicked men" are his "sword." Not only did he thus use the king of Assyria, sending him against Israel for their idolatry, and subsequently punishing the Assyrian monarch, for his pride and haughtiness; but he has so dealt with the nations of Europe, which have shed the blood of his saints; and will continue to do so, overturning, overturning, and overturning until He whose right it is, shall possess, with his saints, "the reign under the whole heaven." "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

We should be cautious, my beloved brethren, in making inferences from premises which, in some respects, transcend our finite capacity. Reason itself teaches us that the ways of an infinite being must be "past finding out" by us, to perfection. While the sacred scriptures, throughout, teach the doctrine of our Father's wise and benevolent control over all things in his universe, it teaches us that all moral evil is a detestable thing which his righteous soul hateth. For the sake of it, he never tempts any intelligent being. In this sense, "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man." Neither doth he willingly afflict any man with natural evil. In all these things, in all parts of the divine administration, Love, holy love, is the ruling, predominant principle. This blessed principle shall soon be perfectly developed, in a holy, happy universe, from which all sin, and misery, and death, shall be forever excluded, to the eternal glory of God and the Lamb and the happiness of all holy intelligences.—1 John 3: 8; Rev. 5: 13.

The New Birth.

What did the Savior mean when he said, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God?" If we cannot see the kingdom without a new birth, it is certainly necessary that we have a correct understanding of the nature of that birth, how, and when it is to take place. Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, and a teacher in Israel, did not understand the import of this language; his mind was in the dark in reference to the matter, and, if I am not mistaken, some of the teachers in Israel at the present day are as much in the fog as was Nicodemus, in respect to this subject.

We are told that conversion and the new birth are synonymous. I am inclined to think that there is some mistake in that proposition. What inference do we naturally draw from that language? I can draw no other than this; if we are born again, we will see the kingdom of God. If that inference is correct, and conversion and the new birth are the same, then it follows, if we are converted, we are safe; and that almost forgotten doctrine, "once in grace always in grace," will have to be revived. I read of no necessity for more than one new birth, neither do I believe that a man will be born again more than once. Jesus said, in connection with this subject, or rather in explanation of it, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit is spirit." I understand by the term "flesh," the body which Paul says "is sown in weakness," "sown in corruption," the "natural body," the "living soul," the "earthy" man; and, by the term "spirit," the body that "is raised in power," that "is raised in incorruption," the "spiritual body."

I see here two classes of beings, two kinds of bodies. I look around me; I see one of these classes—living souls, natural bodies, flesh—but I see no incorruptible bodies, no spiritual bodies. I know that class of bodies is real, tangible and visible; for Christ had one after the resurrection. The people saw it, or rather Christ was one, and the people saw him. These bodies are to be like him, yet I never saw one; so I conclude they are yet to be born.

Did not God constitute Adam a living soul? or natural body? Did he not constitute Christ a quickening spirit? or spiritual body? Is not Adam the father of one class? Will not Christ be the father of the other class? Must not the birth of the living soul, or natural body, be preceded by generation? Must not the birth of the incorruptible or spiritual body be preceded by regeneration? Is not the natural birth coming into life? and will not the new birth be coming into life? Is generation sure to produce a natural birth? Is regeneration sure to produce a spiritual birth? Are there not thousands of causes to prevent the seed sown from producing a harvest? Is not this the time to sow the seed? When is the harvest? Jesus has told us. Is not Adam the father of the natural age? Is not Christ the father of the everlasting age?

I think I begin to see when, and how, this new birth is to take place. If we would be born again, or reap in the harvest life everlasting, we must sow to the Spirit; we must receive the word of the kingdom in good and honest hearts; we must till the ground, keep down the weeds, eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ; we must ask of him, and receive that which shall be in us a well of water, springing up unto everlasting life.

God grant that we may have the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwelling in us; that we might know him and the power of his resurrection; that we might awake with his likeness; that we might be redeemed from the power of the grave; that we might be born again, by a resurrection from the dead, or by that change which will affect the living when Christ our Life-giver shall come to give his children eternal life.

For the Crisis.

"He Died Rich."

"Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted and your garments moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth, and the cries of them which hath reaped have entered the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth."

Did you ever read this, ye professed stewards of the Lord? You may have been abundantly blessed with this world's goods, but are these words ever echoed through your drawing rooms? Do you hear the breezes singing them in grand solemn anthems through the courts of cloud—do you hear their echo in the wail of the poor and the moan of the dying—are they ever chanted by the choir through the lofty domes of your splendid cathedrals,—or are they only known to the paper moths that feed upon the leaves of your Bible far up in the corner of the closet? Ah! you may not see them now, but rest assured they will rise from the mouldy graves to which you have consigned them and testify against you when you would give worlds to have your Bible in your favor.

Let me whisper one confidential word to you, my friend, who love so well the silver chime of the dollar. You may offer rich incense on the altar of mammon, for you may there lay down your talents, your energies, your hopes, and your honor; these were given you by the strong hand of a loving father but still you can offer them up at the shrine of gold. You may shut your eyes upon the beauties of earth and your heart to its suffering children. You may turn away from the moan of the dying and bury your energies in stocks and mines, in railroad shares and richly frieghted ships. Your name may be bright upon the record of twenty banks, but there is a shadow around your path and soon a cold finger will be laid upon your heartstrings and you will know that it is the touch of the death-angel,—his footsteps pass over every threshold and they will pass over yours, and enter your chamber—that princely room where rare pictures flush the walls with the glory of Arcadian summers, where the fairest flowers of a southern May are piled heavily upon the rich carpet, where lofty ceilings and marble tables whisper plainly, "gold."

Ah! you shudder now, but why need you tremble before the grim monster? Surely you are a good man, your saintly name is on a silver plate on the pew door of a splendid church, whose velvet cushions every Sabbath day groan beneath the weight of respectability, broadcloth, and brocade. You are a benevolent man, for every thousand dollars which you have unjustly wrung from the hands of the poor you have given at least ten dollars to some benevolent institution. You are a just man, for the gallows and the jail have always found in you a faithful, unwavering advocate. To pursue a debtor, to distress a tenant, to turn a few thousands by some sharp speculation have been your chief objects in life. And now your heirs will sit down with dry eyes and think of the hundreds of thousands all their own; and there will be a hearse followed by a long line of carriages, and an eloquent sermon on the virtues of the deceased; there will be a fluttering of black crape and the rolling of carriages and—no tears, and they will leave the dead millionaire and return to the mansion where sorrow died when the crape was taken from the silver door knob.

You have succeeded in your efforts, you have reached the goal for which you started, viz., to die rich. People will say, "He died rich." They will say it on Wall street, where they count wealth by hundreds of thousands; they will say it in splendid drawing rooms, by luxurious breakfast tables, and in lofty corridors, all over the squares and avenues of the great city; and they will say it too in narrow alleys and dark homes where all your wealth cannot buy back one hour of the life that is to them a burden and a misery.

But is this all? Ah! no, for lo! through the vista of time another scene approaches. The white war-horses come marching down the parted skies, the clouds of judgment are gathered, the Judge of all the earth is there; the notes of the Archangel's trump have broken your granite tomb and you are summoned before the bar of eternity; and there, thou traitor to thy trust, what hast thou to give? You have wasted your Lord's money, broken his commandments, robbed his children and withheld the tithes from his storehouse. There is in all thy life history, no generous, noble deed—no self-sacrificing act which would have been pearls, and gold and precious jewels now. Your dark doom is written and sealed in the strong records of eternity, and over against it are the words, "He died poor." Your rich, luxurious home availeth you nothing now, and if you have denied yourself the comforts of earth, if you have not allowed yourself the comforts of life that you might hoard up the wealth which will be wasted by your heirs, oh! where has your gain been?

Remember that whether ye have little or much ye are stewards in your Lord's household; then see to it well that ye do your duty faithfully. Perhaps the cold, iron hand of poverty has been laid upon your heartstrings drawing them with painful convulsions when ye would fain relieve the needy. Its bitterness may be eating your flesh like a canker, and drinking your life-blood, but even here we find enough to do! we can drop a tear of sympathy where we cannot relieve—we can give a mite when we can, and a smile where it is needed; we can bind up an aching heart-wound with the gentle touch of mercy. If ye do this, when the silent enemy enters your room and lays his chill finger across your lips, you can quietly yield to his touch; kind friends will be around you, who love you for yourself alone; in the world's cold ear will be heard the words, "He died poor"; but over against your name in the radiant book of life, will be found the bright entry, "HE DIED RICH"; every letter will glitter like some rare setting of diamonds, and you will realize its truthfulness when you stand at the silver gate of the eternal city and see the inheritance which God hath prepared for those who love him.

☞ Education is a companion which no misfortune can depress—no crime can destroy—no enemy can alienate—no despotism can enslave. At home a friend—abroad an introduction—in solitude solace—in society an ornament. It chastens vice; it guides virtue; it gives at once grace and government to genius.

☞ The fountain of content must spring up in the mind; and he that has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition, will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the griefs which he purposes to remove.

[From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

Mark 3: 29; "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." Heb. 6: 2; "The doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."

In Mark 3: 29, there are various readings, of which hamartematos (sin or guilt) is adopted by the best critics. Thus Mr. Green, with the remark: "The expression aionion hamartematos is peculiar, though possessing some special force in its peculiarity. By the word hamartama no more is properly signified than a single faulty act; and, accordingly, aionion could not be combined with it in this its strict meaning." (Developed Criticism, p. 40.) Yet the sense may be, not eternal sinfulness, or sinning, but a sin or guilt that is never remitted; or, as Mareschall says: "Since the sinner hath never forgiveness, as the preceding words declare." If eternal death in the literal sense is forgiveness, then, and not otherwise, does the passage imply the immortality of the lost.

The parallel passage in Matt. 12: 32, brings out more plainly the Jewish distinction between forgiveness here and forgiveness hereafter. "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." We have already noticed the persuasion of the Jews that death would expiate for them all the sins of life, and give them a part in the world to come. This hope was not unlike the Romish doctrine of extreme unction. Yet against this fallacious hope protest was made not only by Christ, but in those fundamental principles of the Jewish faith to which appeal is made in Heb. 6: 2. There was to be an "eternal judgment," a final and irreversible sentence. But in neither passage is any thing said of eternal pain. The sin which incurred an adverse judgment might be strictly the "sin unto death" for which we are not bidden to pray, (1 John 5: 16.) And the writings of the Jews sustain this view. Thus, in the Talmud, Jochanan Ben Zaccai speaks of the power and judgments of an earthly king as only temporary: "If he should slay me, that slaying would not be eternal." "But if the King of kings shall be angry with me, his wrath is eternal; if he shall bind me, his bands are eternal; if he should slay me, his slaying is eternal." (Berachoth, f. 28: 2.)

Again it is said those guilty of certain sins "shall descend into gehenna, and shall there be judged for ever." (Rosh Hashana, f. 17: 1.) On which Abarbinel, in his work on the "Summary of the Faith," remarks: "Such are enormous sins and perverse deeds, which blind the eyes of the mind, and subvert the soul, so that he who commits them shall be cast out from the inheritance of the saints, which is the life of the world to come." "He that denies the resurrection of the dead shall not have part in the resurrection of the dead; for God rewards him with the same measure" (c. 25.) He had already said: "Now the greatest reward is the world to come; and the heaviest punishment is extermination" (c. 1.) In the same chapter he makes a distinction much like that between the interest and the principle of a debt, of which the latter might be either remitted or exacted: "A sinner who is an Israelite shall be punished according to his sin, yet shall have part in the world to come. But if a man shall not believe all these articles, he is already excluded from the lot of Israel, as a heretic and an Epicurean [infidel."] So the Talmud (Peyiah, § 1:) "There are four things which are avenged of a man in this world, and yet the capital [of the sin] is reserved for the world that is to come." And Maimonides: "The sages say, For three transgressions punishment is inflicted upon a man in this world, and moreover he has no share in the world that is to come; viz; idolatry, adultery, and bloodshed; but a bad tongue is equivalent to all these." (Yad Hachazakah, Of the Temper, c. 7: § 3.) Again: "On all wicked [Israelites,] though their sins be numerous, judgment is pronounced according to their sins, but they have a share in the world that is to come, though they have sinned; for it is said, 'Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land for ever;' which means, the land of life, or the world that is to come. Also, the pious of the Gentiles shall have a share in the world that is to come. These, however, [viz., heretics, they who deny the law, etc.,] have no share in the world to come, but they are cut off, destroyed, and condemned for ever and ever." (Ibid., Of Repentance, c. 3: § 11, 12.)

Thus speaks "The Eagle of the Jewish Doctors," of whom it is said, with allusion to his given name: "From Moses to Moses there was none such as Moses;" and who notoriously held the immortality of the righteous alone. Some reader may ask for his scriptural warrant in speaking of these "destroyed" as "condemned forever and ever."

The phrase "eternal judgment" in Heb. 6: 2, is explained by Theophylact, a Lapide, Newcome, Bloomfield, and Tholuck, by metonymy, as that of which the consequences ever continue. Tholuck refers to the phrases "eternal redemption" and "everlasting covenant," ch. 9: 12; 13: 20. The first of these is past all doubt an example of the eternity of effect; for the act or work of redemption is complete, and it is eternal strictly in its results. And if we turn to one of the many parallel passages in the Old Testament, Num. 18: 19, we shall find how readily and freely the Jews used the word eternal. Because salt was the token of a sacred, inviolate covenant, it is here called "eternal" by the Septuagint translators, who render by halos aionion, "eternal salt." Again, if the word "salvation" (sotaria) be taken in its strict sense of "deliverance," we may add the phrase "eternal salvation," Heb. 5: 9, and Isa. 45: 17, (t'shuath'olamim, Sept. sotarian aionion.) In Rev. 14: 6, we read of the "everlasting gospel," which certainly is not to be forever preached; and hence, as Poole and Barnes remark, is so called for its blessed and eternal effects; or, as De Wette explains, as "grounded upon the eternal decree of God and the eternal destiny of man." In Ps. 9: 6 is a clear example of an equivalent word (lanetsach) in the sense of final: "Destructions are come to perpetual end; and thou hast destroyed cities; their memorial is perished with them."

These are examples in which the word "eternal" denotes finality, rather than the endless continuance of the subject to which it is applied. It is very aptly applied to the Greek word for "judgment," which may be in the literal sense critical, or decisive. Thus a writer cited by Wetstein (on Jude 7) speaks of Constantine as having gained an "eternal victory" (æterna victoria;) by which he plainly means a decisive victory, "conquering with the sword once, for a testimony without end." So in Mark 3: 29 the guilt is aptly called aionion because decisive of one's destiny, mortal, fatal. The word then means, not to all eternity, but strictly, for ever. And this phrase often appears in equivalent instances. Thus Ps. 9: 5; "Thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name forever and ever." Job 14: 20; "Thou prevailest forever against him, and he passeth." Ch. 23: 7; "So should I be delivered forever from my judge." Ch. 4: 20; "They perish forever." Ch. 20: 7; Ps. 9: 18; 44: 23; "Cast us not off forever." (Comp. Ps. 74: 1; 77: 7; 1 Chron. 28: 9; Lam. 3: 31.) Ps. 69: 8; "It ceaseth forever." Ps. 52: 5; "God shall likewise destroy thee forever." (Comp. 92: 7.) Ps. 77: 8; "Is his mercy clean gone forever? doth his promise fail forevermore?" Ps. 83: 17; Let them be confounded and troubled forever: yea, let them be put to shame and perish." Obad. ver. 10: "Thou shalt be cut off forever." Mic. 2: 9; Philem. ver. 15: "Receive him forever."

In the book of Enoch are several very plain instances of the eternity of effect, some of which Dr. Laurence has specially noted in his translation. Thus, "Even to the day of judgment, and of consummation, until the judgment the effect of which will last forever, be completed" (ch. 10: 15; comp. 19: 2; "A judgment with which they shall be judged until they are consumed.") "Until the period of the great judgment, when all shall be punished and consumed forever" (24: 9.) "They shall be cast into a judgment of fire; they shall perish in wrath, and by a judgment overpowering them forever" (90: 11; comp. ver. 13: "And blasphemers shall be annihilated everywhere"). "An everlasting judgment, which shall be executed" (92: 16.) "The great judgment shall take effect forever and ever" (103. 5.) "Ye shall not be found like sinners; and eternal condemnation shall be far from you, so long as the world exists" (104. 3).

However we explain Jude's reference to Enoch (ver. 14,) the above expressions show that the following text proves no eternal suffering:

Jude ver. 6: "The angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day."

On which we may add Enoch 10: 6-9: "Bind Azazyel hand and foot, cast him into darkness; and, opening the desert which is in Dudael, cast him in there. Throw upon him hurled and pointed stones, covering him with darkness; there shall he remain for ever; cover his face that he may not see the light. And in the great day of judgment let him be cast into the fire." And ch. 10: 17; "There shall they be taken into the lowest depths of the fire in torments, and in confinement shall they be shut up for ever. Immediately after this shall he (Samyaza,) together with them, burn and perish."

The phrase "everlasting chains" evidently denotes a confinement from which there is no release during one's life or existence, but not an eternal state. It is equivalent to the phrase, "chains that cannot be broken." In a similar sense Apuleius speaks of "eternal fetters of deep love" (pedibus æternis alligat, Metam. 1: 2.) Josephus Wars, b. 6, c. 9, § 4) uses almost the same words in speaking of the tyrant John as condemned by the Romans to "eternal imprisonment." Valerius speaks of "punishment with eternal chains" in the same manner. And Cicero (Orat. iv. in Catil., c. 5) says that Catiline does not hesitate to commit Publius Lentulus to eternal darkness and chains (æternis tenebris vinculisque.") (See Wetstein, in loco.) Surely neither the orator nor the conspirator thought of hopeless chains in immortality.

Do the Scriptures recognize Social and Public Prayer?

In this age of the world, when mind refuses to be ruled by an ecclesiastical dynasty, it may not be strange that such a question should arise for discussion. Did it originate with unbelievers in our holy religion, it might address itself less strongly as worthy of investigation; but there are individuals in whom we have the highest confidence as christians, who understand the Savior's words, "When thou prayest enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly," as the direct rule for all prayer, to deviate from which is religious ostentation or Phariseeism! That secret prayer is herein enjoined, all must admit; but that social or public prayer is thereby prohibited, is not so clear.

The example of Christ and his followers must be our guide in the decision of the question, since neither he nor they would deny in practice, what was enjoined by precept.

Luke says, that when Christ gave directions to his disciples how to pray, it was—"As he was praying, when he ceased one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray."—Luke 11: 1. When he was baptized,—"And praying the heaven was opened."—Luke 3: 21. He prayed before the people in view of his trial,—"Father, save me from this hour, but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven saying, I have both glorified it and will glorify it again. The people, therefore, that stood by and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spoke to him."—John 12: 27—29. The memorable prayer recorded by John, the 17th chap., was uttered in the presence of his disciples. See the first verses of the 17th and 18th chapters. As he hung upon the cross he prayed, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."—Luke 23: 34.

After Christ's ascension, when his followers returned unto Jerusalem, "They went up into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew," and others. "These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus and his brethren."—Acts 1: 13, 14. When the apostles made choice of one to take the place of Judas Iscariot, "They prayed and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen."—Acts 1: 24.

After Peter and John had been reprimanded by Annas, and commanded not to teach in the name of Jesus, "And being let go, they went to their own company and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them. And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord and said;" etc.—Acts 4: 23, 24. The six verses following give a record of their prayer, and the 27th verse reads, "And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together."

When Peter had been confined in prison and the angel had released him, "He came to the house of Mary the mother of John whose surname was Mark, where many were gathered together praying."—Acts 12: 12. When Paul was going to Jerusalem, after commending his brethren to God, "He kneeled down and prayed with them all."—Acts 20: 36.

"At another time it is said, "We kneeled down on the shore and prayed."—Acts 21: 5. In Paul's epistle to the church of Corinth, he says, "Every man praying or prophesying having his head covered, dishonoreth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head."—1 Cor. 11: 4, 5. "For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful."—1 Cor. 14: 14. He is speaking here of customs in the church, not in the closet. Says James, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."—James 5: 14.

The past history of the church shows that she has been spiritual and successful according as she has been prayerful. Doubtless there is much social and public talk called prayer, which is as offensive to God as the long, street-prayers of the Pharisees! How displeasing to the ears of the great Jehovah, must be an eloquent array of words addressed to him as a petition when the heart is "like the fool's eye to the ends of the earth," or seeking for itself adulation from the lips of men! But when the soul is humble, meekly desiring both to know and do the will of God, its nature not only demands private prayer where it pours out all its griefs. "When none but God is nigh," but it craves the privilege of mingling with the saints around the mercy seat. Filled with the Divine Spirit, no fear of man or thought of man will intrude upon the acts of devotion; and where two or three of such unite in social worship, Jesus is ever near according to his promise.

May not the lack oftentimes of the holy unction in prayer lead some to abandon for themselves and discourage in others all social prayer? May not the frequent want of effectual social prayer, lie in the neglect of true, heart-searching, fervent, secret prayer? Let both, or either of these means of grace be staid, and where are the channels through which God can, consistent with his revealed word, edify and bless his church? Let us humbly ask for light upon this subject, and with the Bible in our hands, decide our duty as unto God and not unto men. S. H. Brown.

Contrast between Sunday, June 24th, and Sunday, July 1st.

Sunday, June 24th, I was at Sandy Hill, N. Y., where Bro. Grant has labored hard, amid opposition, to sow the seed, and has seen it spring up and bring forth glorious fruit. Having read with much interest Bro. Grant's statements of Sandy Hill, as I was passing near there I concluded to remain, attend meeting and get acquainted with some of the friends. I think I have not enjoyed myself any better in a long time than I did there. Oh! how comforting such seasons are to the weary pilgrim o'er life's uneven way toward the kingdom. I never saw a more loving band in my life. All seemed to be united, heart and hand, to serve the Lord and advance his glorious cause. It reminded me of the time long to be remembered, when I first sought the Lord—when love and union reigned, and brethren would almost lay down their lives for each other and the cause. O! I pray that nothing may occur to wound the cause at Sandy Hill. I pray the Lord to watch over and protect them, and keep them from pride and popularity, and that the love of rule may not show itself in any of the brethren. Situated as they are, having so much talent and wealth combined, they will have to "watch and pray continually," lest pride and popularity take possession of their hearts. How my heart was comforted in the forenoon and afternoon while listening to the "word" held forth by their pastor, Bro. Mathewson, and at their social meeting in the evening, while listening to the heartfelt testimonies and stirring exhortations; how my heart was filled with gratitude to God for the enjoyment of such a season.

One would conclude by the "fruit" seen, that their religion is "pocket deep." They are building a good house for worship, and they cling not to the "almighty dollar," while their pastor goes hungry, as in some places. On the whole we think we could not enjoy ourselves much better this side the kingdom.

Sunday, July 1st. To-day I have been to a pious theatrical performance at the English Church. I see no difference between some parts of the exercises and the theatre or opera, save that they are carried on under the pretension of worship. O the contrast between last Sunday and to-day! In the one case all seemed to seek to honor and glorify God, and in the other to seek popularity and self-exaltation. There humility,—here pride; there the women adorned themselves as "women professing godliness,"—here they seemed to be on a strife to see who should wear the most costly apparel. There the singing was "with the Spirit and with the understanding also,"—here with the organ grinding out opera music. There Bro. Mathewson preached the "word" in its purity without knocking off the sharp edges for fear of offending the rich; here tickling of the "itching ears" of the wealthy with smooth things to "the blind, lest the blind" to perdition. There they "fight" if they would reign; here they "sail on flowery beds of ease." There they prayed; here they said their prayers. There they reverence the Lord Jehovah; here the Queen. There they "come out from the world;" here all seem to be of the world" as the "world loves its own." There they expect soon to see Jesus as their king; here they expect soon, by going to Quebec, to see the Queen and her son Albert. There their whole affections seem to be on eternal things;" here on things "seen," that are "temporal," and fast passing away. O how great the contrast! How different the "hope" and aspirations! O how great will be the rejoicing of the one soon, having brought forth "fruit unto holiness," and receive the end thereof, "everlasting life;" while the other having sown to the flesh, gratifying the lusts thereof, must "of the flesh reap corruption" and disappointment. O that their blindness might be exchanged for the light of God's word, and they arrested ere they are drowned in "perdition!" Beloved brethren, let us who have a knowledge of the right way "walk in it" and live nearer to the Lord.

I ask the prayers of the Lord's children in behalf of the church at Sandy Hill, that they be "preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord." Pray for me that I be kept from the evil of the world, and do the will of the Lord, and be saved in the kingdom at last, where all will be love and peace perfected. Amen.

For the Crisis.

Is Sunday a Sabbath?

Those who claim that Saturday, the original Seventh day Sabbath, is now obligatory upon christians, assert that it is not; and that there is no particular sanctity attached to it. If I mistake not, and my eyes and judgment do not lead me astray, I do find that Sunday is really a Sabbath; and hence there is more or less sanctity attached to it. Various and multiplied have been the arguments used to destroy the influence which exists in the minds of the human family, relative to the first day of the week as a Sabbath. In my judgment, the naked truth relative to the Seventh day Sabbath is this: First, it is one of the ordinances of the Jewish church. Second, that it constitutes one item of the law which God gave to Moses. Third, Christ became the end of that entire law when he bowed his head and gave up the Ghost. So that since the crucifixion not a ray of light shines, either from the Old or the New Testament, favoring the observance of the Decalogue Sabbath.

The question immediately arises, have we no Sabbath in this dispensation? I answer, yes, assuredly. Sunday, or the first day of the week, is a Sabbath, and so called in the New Testament Scriptures, at least eight times; but not in the English translation. Take the Greek Testament and turn to Matt. 28: 1, and there you will find two Sabbath days, Saturday, and the first day of the week; the original for both days is Sabatton. In Mark 15: 1, 2, 9, you will find both days referred to again; Sabattou, or Sabatton, occurring three times, and the phrase, first day of the week, is found twice. See also Luke 24: 1, John 20: 1, 19, Acts 20: 7, and 1 Cor. 16: 2. Wherever then we find this phraseology, "The first day of the week," the original word is Sabbaton, which signifies Sabbath, or rest. Which Sabbath shall we observe then? Not the shadowy Sabbath, which reached to the Substance—Christ, and there ceased its obligation; but the one written on the day of Pentecost, by the Spirit of truth, "not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart;" one that the twelve Apostles and primitive christians, and christians of succeeding generations and centuries have observed, in consequence of the transcendentally glorious purchase that was made by Christ for fallen man, when he became a victorious conqueror over death and hell, as he was raised into life upon the first day or Sabatton of the week.

"The Israelite Indeed: a periodical devoted to the illustration and defence of the Hebrew Christianity, which is founded on Moses and the prophets and the apostles." I wish to call the attention of the readers of the Crisis to the above publication. It is issued in New York monthly. It is a magazine of about twenty-four pages, with covers. Its editor, Bro. G. R. Lederer, is a converted Israelite, and is laboring among the Jews for their conversion. He waits for the Messiah to come and give immortality to those who serve him.

This is a very interesting magazine, containing experiences of converted Jews; extracts from Jewish writings; expositions of Scripture, and intelligence of the conversion of persons from Judaism to christianity. Those who are interested in the ingathering of the "Remnant according to the election of grace," will peruse this publication with pleasure. Now is the time to subscribe, as a new volume begins with July. To obtain "The Israelite Indeed" enclose $1. with your address, in a letter directed to "Editors of the Iraelite Indeed, No. 234 East 10th St., New York." Agent in Boston, H. J. The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 11, 1860.

The Fourth of July.

The eighty-fourth anniversary of the declaration of American Independence is past. How vast the changes since 1776. Nearly all, then alive, are now asleep in death. When as many more years are passed, where, dear reader, shall you and I be? Shall we stand side by side, immortalized in the kingdom of God, surrounded only by the pure and the holy, enjoying the glory of the Lord; or shall we be asleep in the grave, awaiting a resurrection to condemnation and death? The thought is thrilling, when we consider how near we stand to the great day of the Lord.

While the crowds assembled in the cities and villages to pass the time in noise and confusion, forgetful of God and the approaching judgment; we spent the day very pleasantly with the children of the Lord, in Harmony Grove, about a mile from Palmer Depot, Mass. This pleasant spot is on Bro. A. M. Higgins' land, and near his rural home, on the banks of the Quabaug. We thought and talked of freedom, and enjoyed it; not that of which many boast, while they trample down their fellow men, and bind them with the galling chains of slavery; but the freedom that a christian feels when delivered from the Bondage of error and sin. Instead of roaring cannon, sweet songs echoed around, to cheer the hearts of weary pilgrims, bound for the land of the free, and the home of the blest. No glistening bayonets and military parade, with rolling drums, were there to awaken thoughts of bloody scenes; but there were bright beaming faces that spoke of joy and peace within, and high hopes of life to come in the land of glory.

Ours was a happy Fourth. It was joyful, because "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity" was pleased to comfort us by the hallowed influence of his Holy Spirit. When the day was spent, we looked back upon it with satisfaction, as a bright spot in our pilgrimage way. How unlike the trashy pleasures found in fashion's gay circles was the sweet peace we felt when assembled in Harmony Grove, with the friends of Olivet's King. The common saying was, "This is the happiest 4th of July I ever enjoyed."

Instead of an oration upon deeds of blood, in praise of warriors brave; we spoke of the Prince of Peace—his speedy return and his glorious reign, where the print of the oppressor's foot shall be seen no more, where sorrow's tears never flow, and wasting disease is forever unknown. These thoughts cheered us, and we felt that we were made better for having met.

We dined under the trees, at a well spread board, prepared by Bro. Higgins. We thought of the time when Jesus taught in the groves, and fed the multitudes seated around, and longed for his return, when in Eden restored we may, if faithful, eat the fruit of life's fair tree, and mingle in love and song with angels and all the pure, where no intruder will ever come to mar our eternal peace.

We had two social meetings during the day, which were truly heavenly. Six rose for prayers; five of whom publicly expressed their determination to become followers of Christ. We can truly say, this was the happiest 4th of July we have ever enjoyed since we have had an existence. How different was our joy from that which worldlings and formal professors experience in the popular celebrations and festivities of the day. We had the substance, they only the shadow. Ours was "peace like a river," that passeth all understanding; theirs but an empty sound. While memory remains, this happy day will never be forgotten. The tears of joy that glistened in many eyes looked far more precious than sparkling diamonds in monarchs' crowns. We felt satisfied that we were the happiest company assembled within the entire state.

Sandy Hill.

We have just enjoyed the high privilege of visiting our dear friends at Sandy Hill, N. Y. We would say to those whom we met at Bro. Parry's and Bro. Matthewson's, that this was the most delightful visit we ever enjoyed. How could it be otherwise? Look at the place. It was "Pine Avenue"—a secluded spot on the banks of the noble Hudson—made beautiful by nature, adorned by art, and occupied by the happiest family we ever met. We need not say it was Bro. Parry's. Then the time. It was at the close of a pleasant summer day, when all around was calm and peaceful as a paradise evening. Then the company. Besides Bro. Parry and his affectionate family, there were present Bro. and Sr. Howell and Bro. and Sr. Austin from Poultney, Bro. and Sr. Mathewson and our own dear companion. Years ago, we had labored together in the gospel, but had been long separated by hills and vallies, while engaged in different sections of the Lord's vineyard, and hardly dared to hope for another union in this world; but through the mercy of God, we were once more permitted to unite in love, in hope of meeting soon in our Eden home. Our visit was sweetened with song and hallowed by prayer. We shall long remember that delightful scene. But few such are enjoyed in one's life time.

The next day, June 26th, we assembled again in company with several other dear saints, at Bro. Mathewson's pleasant home. During the afternoon, we had the privilege of assisting in the raising of their new, commodious meeting-house.

The church at Sandy Hill is flourishing under the faithful labors of Bro. Mathewson. Many who have been bitterly opposed, are now friendly in consequence of the good examples of those who love the "blessed hope." The people are satisfied that what some call heresy is truly the doctrine of the Bible, and are turning from theological fables to embrace it. There is great power in a living church like the one in this place. One such has more influence for good than scores which are conformed to the world, uniting with its fashions and mingling in its pleasure scenes, endeavoring to sip the insipid joys of the world. He who has given all up to Christ never needs to go to any other source for comfort. His peace is constant and "like a river."

We bade these dear friends a reluctant farewell, with a strong hope of meeting them soon in the kingdom, where we can mingle forever in their delightful company. How pleasing the thought of being with such friends in such a home. No wonder the poet said,

"I long to be there."

The Anniversary of the West Townsend, (Mass.) Female Seminary, under the care of Bro. F. G. Brown, occurs on Tuesday, the 17th inst., at 9 A. M. Those who wish to find a good school for their daughters, will do well to be present and satisfy themselves of its merits.

Plainfield Grove Meeting.

June 25th, we returned from our delightful visit at Sandy Hill, N. Y., and spent the night at Bro. Sherman's in Castleton Vt. We shall long remember the kindness of this lovely family, who have cheerfully borne reproach with us for the truth's sake, and done all in their power to make us happy in their hospitable home. May the sweet peace of God be their constant portion in this life, and an eternal weight of glory in the world to come. It was hard parting with such warm friends, to mingle with a cold and wicked world again, but duty called, and we hastened to obey, and engage in another conflict with the enemy of all righteousness.

At Bellows Falls, my companion took the road to Boston, and I to Greenfield, where I found a hearty welcome at Bro. D. W. Spear's. This is the most pleasant village we have found in all our travels. While passing through its beautiful streets, 'neath the wide spreading elms, we could not help thinking of paradise, and the dear friends from whom we had just parted, and longing for the time to come when we might greet them in Eden's bowers of fadeless green, to sing the triumphant song of Moses and the Lamb.

After resting for the night, Bro. Spear conveyed me to the Plainfield grove meeting, some twenty-two miles west of Greenfield, where we met Bro. H. Pratt, Sr. E. Fenn, and Bro. J. Blanchard, through whose faithful labors many have been brought to Christ, and are rejoicing in his love. The meeting was on high land, where we had pure air and excellent water. It was a good place for one to work who was rested. The meeting was not large, but profitable; exerting a sanctifying influence upon the friends of Jesus, and alarming his enemies. There were some devoted christians present who are living letters, "known and read of all men." Their testimonies were heart cheering.

Our meeting, Lord's day, July 1st, was deeply interesting. At 8 1-2 o'clock, we assembled for a love-feast, which was excellent. In about one hour, between eighty and ninety spoke of their love for Jesus, and their determination to endure to the end. At 10 o'clock, Sr. Elvira Fenn entertained us with an instructive sermon on the gospel, which was followed by appropriate remarks by Bro. H. Pratt, showing that the consummation of our blessed hope is near at hand. There was a solemn and deep impression made upon the minds of the people.

At the close of the morning meeting, we repaired to the mountain pond to witness the ordinance of baptism, and to show our faith in the burial and resurrection of Christ. At the commencement of the afternoon meeting, Bro. Rufus Starks was ordained for the work of the ministry. We hope the church will stay up his hands, and cheer him on his cross-bearing way, and may he be instrumental in leading many to the fountain of life. We shall expect to hear good tidings from his fields of labor.

The scene of parting from this happy company was both sad and cheering. The big tear drops fell freely at the thought of separating for a time, to struggle again with a cold, heartless world; but the hope of soon meeting again where we shall part no more, caused a beam of joy to illumine the sadness, and strengthen our resolution to be christians in earnest, that our home may be in glory forever.

War in Syria.—A very bloody war is in progress in Syria, which is a part of Asiatic Turkey. It is said, "Mount Lebanon is now one vast funeral pile." Sixty villages are burnt. Hundreds of thousands are engaged in the sanguinary conflict. The combatants are Druses, Mohammedans and Moslem Arabs, against the patrons of the Greek Church and the Roman Catholic. It is thought that the war will result in "the end of the Ottoman empire." In our next, we hope to be able to lay before our readers further particulars.

The State of Europe.

The most careless observer is now satisfied that great events are at hand. Europe is like a mighty volcano just before it bursts forth with its streams of resistless lava. The eruption must come, and no mortal arm can stay its progress. Garibaldi's movements and success in Sicily seem but a prelude to what is behind the curtain. Soon, we think, the great drama will be opened, when Napoleon will become a prominent actor in the scene that ends in "perdition." We feel warranted by the best of evidences to say, the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. "The end of all things is at hand." It is high time to be upon our watch towers, waiting for the return of the coming bridegroom. "Let us not sleep as do others."

We gather the following from foreign correspondents: "Military preparations are continued on a large scale in all the German States."

"The time for hesitation is gone by. All Italy, save La Farini & Co., is resolved that Italy shall be won by Italian hands. Let Victor Emanuel be king of Italy, say even the most radical of radicals, but not of a portion. He shall not halt—we will not let him tarry until the goal be reached. . . . . . Oh, we are in for it now! During the last fifteen months one has not felt any reality in the talk of Italian independence; but now one's blood tingles and one's pulses throb as in 1848; one delicious bit of popular initiative has set the wheels in motion; one feels it possible to live and see a united Italy."

"As the 'sick man' [Turkey] is now dead, it is to be hoped that the Russian Bear will modify his manners a little in the presence of the cadaver, and at least substitute a black dress-coat for the claret frock.

The popularity of Garibaldi has so much increased during the late events in Italy that his name has become as much a bye-word at Paris as in Italy even. His biography and exploits in all forms imaginable are selling by the hundred thousand in France, and it is questionable whether the poor do not buy more of these productions than the upper or middle classes. But while millions of the people throughout Europe are cheered and overjoyed at his success, there are others higher in the social scale who tremble as each new step in the forward march is announced, and still others—ambitious monarchs and Generals—who burn with envy and jealousy. But not only is Garibaldi a man born to success, but he represents a great principle which can be no more crushed out than himself."

"One of the best evidences of the altered condition of things here is the fact that we have such a man as Gavazzi in Florence, preaching against the abuses of the Romish Church, and the temporal power of the Pope. Language of denunciation, such as would cause this eloquent and fearless man to be mobbed out of Montreal, or Dublin, or other cities in half Protestant countries, is here listened to by crowds of Italians and rapturously applauded. . . . . One of the rooms in the vast Pazzi Palace is the place where the meetings are held, but is not sufficiently large to accommodate the number of those who wish to hear Rome condemned. A great many young men are among the audience, and all, apparently, of the more intelligent part of the population."

"The intentions of Louis Napoleon form the ground of well founded terror throughout Europe . . . . Louis Napoleon's money is poured out like water here in England, in the press, among statesman, business men, ship owners and other classes. He has an army concentrating on the borders of Belgium and Rhenish Prussia . . . . Russia has from 60,000 to 80,000 men on the borders of Turkey, and the English, French and Russian Ambassadors at the Porte are particularly active. There is now only one question, and that is, whether Russia and France have a distinct understanding as to their future operations and designs. It is fully agreed here that England cannot sit quietly by and see Sicily or Naples seized by France, Prussia attacked on the Rhine, or Constantinople besieged, without interfering. It is evident that Garibaldi's successes are looked on favorably both in Paris and London. Whatever may be the designs of Louis Napoleon, he would rather have the rough work done for him by a daring, dashing fellow like Garibaldi than do it himself. . . . . No event whatever, domestic or foreign, need excite surprise; or, rather, I think, we may be prepared for any surprise."

An Inquiry.

Will one of the following brethren: J. S. White, H. L. Hastings, T. S. Canfield, M. D. or I. C. Wellcome, harmonise with their views of Jesus being in existence as a being before he was born of Mary his mother, the following texts:—"But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law."—Gal. 4: 4. "Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh."—Rom. 1: 3. "Jesus Christ, of the seed of David."—2 Tim. 2: 8. "Till the seed should come to whom the promise was made."—Gal. 3: 19. "And to thy seed, which is Christ."—Gal. 3: 16.

"The Light Ship."

This tract, the publication of which has been so long delayed, is now in the hands of the printer. The issue is only known to God.

I have often feared that a Being so holy, so pure, would not accept a work at the hands of one so unworthy, even although it was an effort to spread the word of truth; and that perhaps, even if the Light Ship were launched, she would go down at her moorings ere her light shone upon the waters of unbelief which heaved around her.

The responsibilities which I have assumed in publishing this little book are very great. It is the pioneer of a faith almost unknown among that class of men for which it is solely intended. Every other denomination which calls itself christian, has sent out its agents and missionaries; and thousands upon thousands of their tracts have been scattered among seamen with a profusion which told that there was earnestness in the work. I will not dare to say that much good has not been done; but the mass of sailors have stumbled over, and refused to accept, the fiery argument to every faith.

Upon land, for some years past, there have been many sharp and well sustained attacks upon the grim strongholds of priestcraft and tradition; and the old walls are letting in daylight through the shot-holes made by a "well served" gospel. Divines, at their wits' end, are hurrying hither and thither, thrusting musty books and articles of faith into the apertures through which the destroyer of their theology is brightly shining. The recklessness of defiance and palsy of fear, begotten by teachers who make the superstition and terror of their disciples a source of profit, are giving way to a faith which recommends itself to man's reason and his appreciation of love and justice.

There is no one loves fair play more, deserves it better, and receives it less often, than a sailor. He has little respite from his life of toil save his short "run ashore," when his hard-earned pittance is either scattered with prodigality, or pilfered by the scores of pimps and rascals who dog his every footstep. He now looks for no better treatment from the landsman's hand, and he is very seldom disappointed. If perchance he meets with one who will not wrong him, he regards the rare exception with a sort of wonder, and with a "You're a queer fellow" turns away with a half chuckle at your lack of smartness to avail yourself of a chance. Thus thousands pass away from year to year, unknown and uncared for, save by the mother, wife or sister, who

> Expectant longing, wondering how or where
> Those darling lost ones, whom they long for, are.

In opposition to this careless, sinful course, which at its worst is devoid of the mean wickedness of the evil dweller upon earth, I have seen where religion has brought out of the rough quartz gold of the purest kind. I have heard tongues once loudest in revelry and fiercest in blasphemy, take up the song of praise and the voice of prayer, with a heartiness characteristic of the genuine tar, moving hearts as obdurate and tough as well-seasoned oak, and drawing from eyes

> Tears which the briny deep
> Never knew before.

If such good has been done by "creeds" as imperfect as those offered to seamen, how much more may be done when the Word, cleared of the horrid parasites which deform its beauty and hide the light thereof, shines brightly on the path of the ocean-child. How many rejecters of everything divine, will succomb to a love which casts out the fear which hath torment.

It was with the hope of a consummation like this that I undertook to throw the first shell into the fortresses on the sea board. I debated with myself in what form I should present some of our truths; and at last came to the conclusion, which met the approbation of a few brethren whom I consulted, that it should be by dialogue. I dare not expect that all who read it will be satisfied, for, indeed, I am not entirely satisfied myself; but I would say to one and all, that I have used my best jugdment, so far as I have gone, to arrest the attention of sailors to the glorious tenets of our Bible faith. I shall not be surprised if I come in for a share of the righteous (?) abuse which is heaped upon us as a people generally, especially as I have encroached upon a territory which the self yclept divines of the day had all to themselves. I have baited the hook so that the reader may be caught before he smells the theology, which at all events will not suffocate him with smoke from "the everlasting bonfire."

I had hoped that without much importunity I should have received a sum sufficient to have issued the first edition. I still lack twenty dollars, which must be raised somehow in two weeks from now. I have been prevented from making the pamphlet as large as I wished, from the fear of incurring expenses which I could not meet. But if ever I be able to publish it on my own hook, I will write a sequel to the "Light Ship."

In the necessity of the case, I now make my final appeal to those whom I shall name; from others than these I expect and wish for, nothing. I appeal to all who having received the light of the gospel, would seek to enlighten those who are wandering in the mazes of blind unbelief and bewildering superstition. I appeal to the father who from his mountain home or city mansion looks out towards the sea, and thinks upon that son whose waywardness has levelled every hope he had in him. I appeal to that mother whose heart yearns day and night, and whose prayers follow her sailor boy, with a love unshaken by neglect, unwearying and unflagging in its intensity; and who yet hopes that some remembrance of her affection will urge the wanderer home. I appeal to all who have brother, friend or acquaintance "whose calling is the sea." I appeal to those who think that seamen are of sufficient importance in the scale of humanity to deserve attention. I appeal to those who do not think they have done more than enough for God already; who do not look back at '44 or '54 or any other period of injudicious lavishment, and buttoning up their pockets say, "I'll not give another cent." I appeal to those who, having been to sea, know what the seaman needs. I appeal to all who love the Lord with all their heart and their neighbor as themselves.

I have said enough to move the willing: more would not move the sordid lover of his money. Jno. F. Cotton.

Correspondence.

From R. V. Lyon.

Bro. Grant:—Our Conference at Seneca Falls was the best that I ever attended. Subsequent to its close, I called at Rochester, spent part of two days with Bro. Marsh and had a delightful visit with him and his family. Crossed Lake Ontario into C. W., my field of labor, and with renewed energy, zeal and courage, commenced my labor of love with both families, by presenting a whole gospel to them. And the result has been good. Have preached in Toronto, Port Whitby, Brooklyn, Port Perry, Darlington, Coburgh, and in the township of Mariposa I held a grove meeting.

In most of these places the attendance was large, and in all the attention was good. I had the honor of baptizing thirteen intelligent believers in the things concerning the Christ and the kingdom of God.

Northern Railroad, N. Y., July 5, 1860.

From Bro. R. Bush.

Bro. Grant:—The Crisis comes to me like a winged messenger laden with the rich truths of the gospel. May the Lord sustain it till Jesus comes. Dear Brn. and Srs., my lot is at present in a remote place, where the Midnight Cry has never been proclaimed. The truths for which I earnestly contend being regarded as heresy, it gives me great satisfaction to hear from those who love the Lord and are looking for his speedy coming to receive his saints to himself, that where he is, there they may be also.

Although I am deprived of your company, and the conference meetings which you enjoy, yet I hope, by the grace of God, to be able to meet you in the coming kingdom. I desire an interest in your prayers.

Honey Grove, Texas.

From C. C. Stevens.

Bro. Grant:—We are having good meetings here. I have been holding them for some time. There is great interest. Yesterday I led two happy converts down into the water and buried them with Christ in baptism; they came out of the water praising God. One was my little son, fifteen years of age. None but a parent can know the gratitude and joy consequent on such a scene. To see one so young cheerfully bearing the cross was enough to move the hardest heart. Never have I witnessed a scene so affecting as this. O, may God sanctify it to the good of all present!

So. Berwick, Me., July 2.

From Sr. B. L. Clark.

Bro. Grant.—I have had strong impressions that it was my duty to publish to the world my experience while changing from my former errors to my present belief in scripture truths. I was converted when a child, and joined the Baptist church in W. Colby, Vt. My name was enrolled in the church book years before my eyes began to be opened to the great truths of the Bible. I was ever taught by my parents and my ministers, that I had an immortal soul, which was a part of God, consequently it could not die. Four years ago, I was requested to prove from scripture, that spirits did exist after the body was dead. I verily thought I could. I searched and failed in the attempt. How great the failure! While trying to prove the soul lived, I found it died. Souls were born, souls were made, souls went into the pit; fishes and beasts and men, alike had souls, and alike die, and all have one breath, and all return to dust.

Then I saw plainly that I had been clinging to error, and pressing it to my heart as God's truth these many years. I was ashamed to acknowledge that I was defeated in my proof, but I could not sustain my own belief from the Bible. What was to be done? I had only one resort, and that was this; go to God and confess my error, and ask him in meekness to lead me into truth. My prayer was, Lord, what is truth? Lord, teach me thy truth, for I deprophesying having his head covered, dishonoreth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head."—1 Cor. 11: 4, 5. "For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful."—1 Cor. 14: 14. He is speaking here of customs in the church, not in the closet. Says James, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."—James 5: 14.

The past history of the church shows that she has been spiritual and successful according as she has been prayerful. Doubtless there is much social and public talk called prayer, which is as offensive to God as the long, street-prayers of the Pharisees! How displeasing to the ears of the great Jehovah, must be an eloquent array of words addressed to him as a petition when the heart is "like the fool's eye to the ends of the earth," or seeking for itself adulation from the lips of men! But when the soul is humble, meekly desiring both to know and do the will of God, its nature not only demands private prayer where it pours out all its griefs. "When none but God is nigh," but it craves the privilege of mingling with the saints around the mercy seat. Filled with the Divine Spirit, no fear of man or thought of man will intrude upon the acts of devotion; and where two or three of such unite in social worship, Jesus is ever near according to his promise.

May not the lack oftentimes of the holy unction in prayer lead some to abandon for themselves and discourage in others all social prayer? May not the frequent want of effectual social prayer, lie in the neglect of true, heart-searching, fervent, secret prayer? Let both, or either of these means of grace be staid, and where are the channels through which God can, consistent with his revealed word, edify and bless his church? Let us humbly ask for light upon this subject, and with the Bible in our hands, decide our duty as unto God and not unto men.

Contrast between Sunday, June 24th, and Sunday, July 1st.

Sunday, June 24th, I was at Sandy Hill, N. Y., where Bro. Grant has labored hard, amid opposition, to sow the seed, and has seen it spring up and bring forth glorious fruit. Having read with much interest Bro. Grant's statements of Sandy Hill, as I was passing near there I concluded to remain, attend meeting and get acquainted with some of the friends. I think I have not enjoyed myself any better in a long time than I did there. Oh! how comforting such seasons are to the weary pilgrim o'er life's uneven way toward the kingdom. I never saw a more loving band in my life. All seemed to be united, heart and hand, to serve the Lord and advance his glorious cause. It reminded me of the time long to be remembered, when I first sought the Lord—when love and union reigned, and brethren would almost lay down their lives for each other and the cause. O! I pray that nothing may occur to wound the cause at Sandy Hill. I pray the Lord to watch over and protect them, and keep them from pride and popularity, and that the love of rule may not show itself in any of the brethren. Situated as they are, having so much talent and wealth combined, they will have to "watch and pray continually," lest pride and popularity take possession of their hearts. How my heart was comforted in the forenoon and afternoon while listening to the "word" held forth by their pastor, Bro. Mathewson, and at their social meeting in the evening, while listening to the heartfelt testimonies and stirring exhortations; how my heart was filled with gratitude to God for the enjoyment of such a season.

One would conclude by the "fruit" seen, that their religion is "pocket deep." They are building a good house for worship, and they cling not to the "almighty dollar," while their pastor goes hungry, as in some places. On the whole we think we could not enjoy ourselves much better this side the kingdom.

Sunday, July 1st. To-day I have been to a pious theatrical performance at the English Church. I see no difference between some parts of the exercises and the theatre or opera, save that they are carried on under the pretension of worship. O the contrast between last Sunday and to-day! In the one case all seemed to seek to honor and glorify God, and in the other to seek popularity and self-exaltation. There humility,—here pride; there the women adorned themselves as "women professing godliness,"—here they seemed to be on a strife to see who should wear the most costly apparel. There the singing was "with the Spirit and with the understanding also;" here with the organ grinding out opera music. There Bro. Mathewson preached the "word" in its purity without knocking off the sharp edges for fear of offending the rich; here tickling of the "itching ears" of the wealthy with smooth things as "the blind lead the blind" to perdition. There they "fight" if they would reign; here they "sail on flowery beds of ease." There they prayed; here they said their prayers. There they reverence the Lord Jehovah; here the Queen. There they "come out from the world;" here all seem to be "of the world" as the "world loves its own." There they expect soon to see Jesus as their king; here they expect soon, by going to Quebec, to see the Queen and her son Albert. There their whole affections seem to be on eternal things;" here on things "seen," that are "temporal," and fast passing away. O how great the contrast! How different the "hope" and aspirations! O how great will be the rejoicing of the one soon, having brought forth "fruit unto holiness," and receive the end thereof, "everlasting life;" while the other having sown to the flesh, gratifying the lusts thereof, must "of the flesh reap corruption" and disappointment. O that their blindness might be exchanged for the light of God's word, and they arrested ere they are drowned in "perdition!" Beloved brethren, let us who have a knowledge of the right way "walk in it" and live nearer to the Lord.

I ask the prayers of the Lord's children in behalf of the church at Sandy Hill, that they be "preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord." Pray for me that I be kept from the evil of the world, and do the will of the Lord, and be saved in the kingdom at last, where all will be love and peace perfected. Amen.

Is Sunday a Sabbath?

Those who claim that Saturday, the original Seventh day Sabbath, is now obligatory upon christians, assert that it is not; and that there is no particular sanctity attached to it. If I mistake not, and my eyes and judgment do not lead me astray, I do find that Sunday is really a Sabbath; and hence there is more or less sanctity attached to it. Various and multiplied have been the arguments used to destroy the influence which exists in the minds of the human family, relative to the first day of the week, as a Sabbath. In my judgment, the naked truth relative to the Seventh day Sabbath is this: First, it is one of the ordinances of the Jewish church. Second, that it constitutes one item of the law which God gave to Moses. Third, Christ became the end of that entire law when he bowed his head and gave up the Ghost. So that since the crucifixion not a ray of light shines, either from the Old or the New Testament, favoring the observance of the Decalogue Sabbath.

The question immediately arises, have we no Sabbath in this dispensation? I answer, yes, assuredly. Sunday, or the first day of the week, is a Sabbath, and so called in the New Testament Scriptures, at least eight times; but not in the English translation. Take the Greek Testament and turn to Matt. 28: 1, and there you will find two Sabbath days, Saturday, and the first day of the week; the original for both days is Sabatton. In Mark 15: 1, 2, 9, you will find both days referred to again; Sabattou, or Sabatton, occurring three times, and the phrase, first day of the week, is found twice. See also Luke 24: 1, John 20: 1, 19. Acts 20: 7, and 1 Cor. 16: 2. Wherever then we find this phraseology, "The first day of the week," the original word is Sabbaton, which signifies Sabbath, or rest. Which Sabbath shall we observe then? Not the shadowy Sabbath, which reached to the Substance—Christ, and there ceased its obligation; but the one written on the day of Pentecost, by the Spirit of truth, "not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart;" one that the twelve Apostles and primitive christians, and christians of succeeding generations and centuries have observed, in consequence of the transcendentally glorious purchase that was made by Christ for fallen man, when he became a victorious conqueror over death and hell, as he was raised into life upon the first day or Sabatton of the week.

"The Israelite Indeed: a periodical devoted to the illustration and defence of the Hebrew Christianity, which is founded on Moses and the prophets and the apostles." I wish to call the attention of the readers of the Crisis to the above publication. It is issued in New York monthly. It is a magazine of about twenty-four pages, with covers. Its editor, Bro. G. R. Lederer, is a converted Israelite, and is laboring among the Jews for their conversion. He waits for the Messiah to come and give immortality to those who serve him.

This is a very interesting magazine, containing experiences of converted Jews; extracts from Jewish writings; expositions of Scripture, and intelligence of the conversion of persons from Judaism to christianity. Those who are interested in the ingathering of the "Remnant according to the election of grace," will peruse this publication with pleasure. Now is the time to subscribe, as a new volume begins with July. To obtain "The Israelite Indeed" enclose $1. with your address, in a letter directed to "Editors of the Isaelite Indeed, No. 284 East 10th St., New York." Agent in Boston, H. J. The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 11, 1860.

The Fourth of July.

The eighty-fourth anniversary of the declaration of American Independence is past. How vast the changes since 1776. Nearly all, then alive, are now asleep in death. When as many more years are passed, where, dear reader, shall you and I be? Shall we stand side by side, immortalized in the kingdom of God, surrounded only by the pure and the holy, enjoying the glory of the Lord; or shall we be asleep in the grave, awaiting a resurrection to condemnation and death? The thought is thrilling, when we consider how near we stand to the great day of the Lord.

While the crowds assembled in the cities and villages to pass the time in noise and confusion, forgetful of God and the approaching judgment; we spent the day very pleasantly with the children of the Lord, in Harmony Grove, about a mile from Palmer Depot, Mass. This pleasant spot is on Bro. A. M. Higgins' land, and near his rural home, on the banks of the Quabaug. We thought and talked of freedom, and enjoyed it; not that of which many boast, while they trample down their fellow men, and bind them with the galling chains of slavery; but the freedom that a christian feels when delivered from the Bondage of error and sin. Instead of roaring cannon, sweet songs echoed around, to cheer the hearts of weary pilgrims, bound for the land of the free, and the home of the blest. No glistening bayonets and military parade, with rolling drums, were there to awaken thoughts of bloody scenes; but there were bright beaming faces that spoke of joy and peace within, and high hopes of life to come in the land of glory.

Ours was a happy Fourth. It was joyful, because "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity" was pleased to comfort us by the hallowed influence of his Holy Spirit. When the day was spent, we looked back upon it with satisfaction, as a bright spot in our pilgrimage way. How unlike the trashy pleasures found in fashion's gay circles was the sweet peace we felt when assembled in Harmony Grove, with the friends of Olivet's King. The common saying was, "This is the happiest 4th of July I ever enjoyed."

Instead of an oration upon deeds of blood, in praise of warriors brave; we spoke of the Prince of Peace—his speedy return and his glorious reign, where the print of the oppressor's foot shall be seen no more; where sorrow's tears never flow, and wasting disease is forever unknown. These thoughts cheered us, and we felt that we were made better for having met.

We dined under the trees, at a well spread board, prepared by Bro. Higgins. We thought of the time when Jesus taught in the groves, and fed the multitudes seated around, and longed for his return, when in Eden restored we may, if faithful, eat the fruit of life's fair tree, and mingle in love and song with angels and all the pure, where no intruder will ever come to mar our eternal peace.

We had two social meetings during the day, which were truly heavenly. Six rose for prayers; five of whom publicly expressed their determination to become followers of Christ. We can truly say, this was the happiest 4th of July we have ever enjoyed since we have had an existence. How different was our joy from that which worldlings and formal professors experience in the popular celebrations and festivities of the day. We had the substance, they only the shadow. Ours was "peace like a river," that passeth all understanding; theirs but an empty sound. While memory remains, this happy day will never be forgotten. The tears of joy that glistened in many eyes looked far more precious than sparkling diamonds in monarchs' crowns. We felt satisfied that we were the happiest company assembled within the entire state.

Sandy Hill.

We have just enjoyed the high privilege of visiting our dear friends at Sandy Hill, N. Y. We would say to those whom we met at Bro. Parry's and Bro. Matthewson's, that this was the most delightful visit we ever enjoyed. How could it be otherwise? Look at the place. It was "Pine Avenue"—a secluded spot on the banks of the noble Hudson—made beautiful by nature, adorned by art, and occupied by the happiest family we ever met. We need not say it was Bro. Parry's. Then the time. It was at the close of a pleasant summer day, when all around was calm and peaceful as a paradise evening. Then the company. Besides Bro. Parry and his affectionate family, there were present Bro. and Sr. Howell and Bro. and Sr. Austin from Poultney, Bro. and Sr. Mathewson and our own dear companion. Years ago, we had labored together in the gospel, but had been long separated by hills and vallies, while engaged in different sections of the Lord's vineyard, and hardly dared to hope for another union in this world; but through the mercy of God, we were once more permitted to unite in love, in hope of meeting soon in our Eden home. Our visit was sweetened with song and hallowed by prayer. We shall long remember that delightful scene. But few such are enjoyed in one's life time.

The next day, June 26th, we assembled again in company with several other dear saints, at Bro. Mathewson's pleasant home. During the afternoon, we had the privilege of assisting in the raising of their new, commodious meeting-house.

The church at Sandy Hill is flourishing under the faithful labors of Bro. Mathewson. Many who have been bitterly opposed, are now friendly in consequence of the good examples of those who love the "blessed hope." The people are satisfied that what some call heresy is truly the doctrine of the Bible, and are turning from theological fables to embrace it. There is great power in a living church like the one in this place. One such has more influence for good than scores which are conformed to the world, uniting with its fashions and mingling in its pleasure scenes, endeavoring to sip the insipid joys of the world. He who has given all up to Christ never needs to go to any other source for comfort. His peace is constant and "like a river."

We bade these dear friends a reluctant farewell, with a strong hope of meeting them soon in the kingdom, where we can mingle forever in their delightful company. How pleasing the thought of being with such friends in such a home. No wonder the poet said,

"I long to be there."

The Anniversary of the West Townsend, (Mass.) Female Seminary, under the care of Bro. F. G. Brown, occurs on Tuesday, the 17th inst., at 9 A. M. Those who wish to find a good school for their daughters, will do well to be present and satisfy themselves of its merits.

Plainfield Grove Meeting.

June 25th, we returned from our delightful visit at Sandy Hill, N. Y., and spent the night at Bro. Sherman's in Castleton Vt. We shall long remember the kindness of this lovely family, who have cheerfully borne reproach with us for the truth's sake, and done all in their power to make us happy in their hospitable home. May the sweet peace of God be their constant portion in this life, and an eternal weight of glory in the world to come. It was hard parting with such warm friends, to mingle with a cold and wicked world again, but duty called, and we hastened to obey, and engage in another conflict with the enemy of all righteousness.

At Bellows Falls, my companion took the road to Boston, and I to Greenfield, where I found a hearty welcome at Bro. D. W. Spear's. This is the most pleasant village we have found in all our travels. While passing through its beautiful streets, 'neath the wide spreading elms, we could not help thinking of paradise, and the dear friends from whom we had just parted, and longing for the time to come when we might greet them in Eden's bowers of fadeless green, to sing the triumphant song of Moses and the Lamb.

After resting for the night, Bro. Spear conveyed me to the Plainfield grove meeting, some twenty-two miles west of Greenfield, where we met Bro. H. Pratt, Sr. E Fenn, and Bro. J. Blanchard, through whose faithful labors many have been brought to Christ, and are rejoicing in his love. The meeting was on high land, where we had pure air and excellent water. It was a good place for one to work who was rested. The meeting was not large, but profitable; exerting a sanctifying influence upon the friends of Jesus, and alarming his enemies. There were some devoted christians present who are living letters, "known and read of all men." Their testimonies were heart cheering.

Our meeting, Lord's day, July 1st, was deeply interesting. At 8 1-2 o'clock, we assembled for a love-feast, which was excellent. In about one hour, between eighty and ninety spoke of their love for Jesus, and their determination to endure to the end. At 10 o'clock, Sr. Elvira Fenn entertained us with an instructive sermon on the gospel, which was followed by appropriate remarks by Bro. H. Pratt, showing that the consummation of our blessed hope is near at hand. There was a solemn and deep impression made upon the minds of the people.

At the close of the morning meeting, we repaired to the mountain pond to witness the ordinance of baptism, and to show our faith in the burial and resurrection of Christ. At the commencement of the afternoon meeting, Bro. Rufus Starks was ordained for the work of the ministry. We hope the church will stay up his hands, and cheer him on his cross-bearing way, and may he be instrumental in leading many to the fountain of life. We shall expect to hear good tidings from his fields of labor.

The scene of parting from this happy company was both sad and cheering. The big tear drops fell freely at the thought of separating for a time, to struggle again with a cold, heartless world; but the hope of soon meeting again where we shall part no more, caused a beam of joy to illumine the sadness, and strengthen our resolution to be christians in earnest, that our home may be in glory forever.

War in Syria.—A very bloody war is in progress in Syria, which is a part of Asiatic Turkey. It is said, "Mount Lebanon is now one vast funeral pile." Sixty villages are burnt. Hundreds of thousands are engaged in the sanguinary conflict. The combatants are Druses, Mohammedans and Moslem Arabs, against the patrons of the Greek Church and the Roman Catholic. It is thought that the war will result in "the end of the Ottoman empire." In our next, we hope to be able to lay before our readers further particulars.

The State of Europe.

The most careless observer is now satisfied that great events are at hand. Europe is like a mighty volcano just before it bursts forth with its streams of resistless lava. The eruption must come, and no mortal arm can stay its progress. Garibaldi's movements and success in Sicily seem but a prelude to what is behind the curtain. Soon, we think, the great drama will be opened, when Napoleon will become a prominent actor in the scene that ends in "perdition." We feel warranted by the best of evidences to say, the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. "The end of all things is at hand." It is high time to be upon our watch towers, waiting for the return of the coming bridegroom. "Let us not sleep as do others."

We gather the following from foreign correspondents: "Military preparations are continued on a large scale in all the German States."

"The time for hesitation is gone by. All Italy, save La Farini & Co., is resolved that Italy shall be won by Italian hands. Let Victor Emanuel be king of Italy, say even the most radical of radicals, but not of a portion. He shall not halt—we will not let him tarry until the goal be reached. . . . . Oh, we are in for it now! During the last fifteen months one has not felt any reality in the talk of Italian independence; but now one's blood tingles and one's pulses throb as in 1848; one delicious bit of popular initiative has set the wheels in motion; one feels it possible to live and see a united Italy."

"As the 'sick man' [Turkey] is now dead, it is to be hoped that the Russian Bear will modify his manners a little in the presence of the cadaver, and at least substitute a black dress-coat for the claret frock.

The popularity of Garibaldi has so much increased during the late events in Italy that his name has become as much a bye-word at Paris as in Italy even. His biography and exploits in all forms imaginable are selling by the hundred thousand in France, and it is questionable whether the poor do not buy more of these productions than the upper or middle classes. But while millions of the people throughout Europe are cheered and overjoyed at his success, there are others higher in the social scale who tremble as each new step in the forward march is announced, and still others—ambitious monarchs and Generals—who burn with envy and jealousy. But not only is Garibaldi a man born to success, but he represents a great principle which can be no more crushed out than himself."

"One of the best evidences of the altered condition of things here is the fact that we have such a man as Gavazzi in Florence, preaching against the abuses of the Romish Church, and the temporal power of the Pope. Language of denunciation, such as would cause this eloquent and fearless man to be mobbed out of Montreal, or Dublin, or other cities in half Protestant countries, is here listened to by crowds of Italians and rapturously applauded. . . . . One of the rooms in the vast Pazzi Palace is the place where the meetings are held, but is not sufficiently large to accommodate the number of those who wish to hear Rome condemned. A great many young men are among the audience, and all, apparently, of the more intelligent part of the population."

"The intentions of Louis Napoleon form the ground of well founded terror throughout Europe . . . . Louis Napoleon's money is poured out like water here in England, in the press, among statesman, business men, ship owners and other classes. He has an army concentrating on the borders of Belgium and Rhenish Prussia . . . . Russia has from 60,000 to 80,000 men on the borders of Turkey, and the English, French and Russian Ambassadors at the Porte are particularly active. There is now only one question, and that is, whether Russia and France have a distinct understanding as to their future operations and designs. It is fully agreed here that England cannot sit quietly by and see Sicily or Naples seized by France, Prussia attacked on the Raine, or Constantinople besieged, without interfering. It is evident that Garibaldi's successes are looked on favorably both in Paris and London. Whatever may be the designs of Louis Napoleon, he would rather have the rough work done for him by a daring, dashing fellow like Garibaldi than do it himself. . . . . No event whatever, domestic or foreign, need excite surprise; or, rather, I think, we may be prepared for any surprise."

An Inquiry.

Will one of the following brethren: J. S. White, H. L. Hastings, T. S. Canfield, M. D. or I. C. Wellcome, harmonize with their views of Jesus being in existence as a being before he was born of Mary his mother, the following texts:—"But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law."—Gal. 4: 4. "Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh."—Rom. 1: 3. "Jesus Christ, of the seed of David."—2 Tim. 2: 8. "Till the seed should come to whom the promise was made."—Gal. 3: 19. "And to thy seed, which is Christ."—Gal. 3: 16.

For the Crisis.

"The Light Ship."

This tract, the publication of which has been so long delayed, is now in the hands of the printer. The issue is only known to God.

I have often feared that a Being so holy, so pure, would not accept a work at the hands of one so unworthy, even although it was an effort to spread the word of truth; and that perhaps, even if the Light Ship were launched, she would go down at her moorings ere her light shone upon the waters of unbelief which heaved around her.

The responsibilities which I have assumed in publishing this little book are very great. It is the pioneer of a faith almost unknown among that class of men for which it is solely intended. Every other denomination which calls itself christian, has sent out its agents and missionaries; and thousands upon thousands of their tracts have been scattered among seamen with a profusion which told that there was earnestness in the work. I will not dare to say that much good has not been done; but the mass of sailors have stumbled over, and refused to accept, the fiery argument to every faith.

Upon land, for some years past, there have been many sharp and well sustained attacks upon the grim strongholds of priestcraft and tradition; and the old walls are letting in daylight through the shot-holes made by a "well served" gospel. Divines, at their wits' end, are hurrying hither and thither, thrusting musty books and articles of faith into the apertures through which the destroyer of their theology is brightly shining. The recklessness of defiance and palsy of fear, begotten by teachers who make the superstition and terror of their disciples a source of profit, are giving way to a faith which recommends itself to man's reason and his appreciation of love and justice.

There is no one loves fair play more, deserves it better, and receives it less often, than a sailor. He has little respite from his life of toil save his short "run ashore," when his hard-earned pittance is either scattered with prodigality, or pilfered by the scores of pimps and rascals who dog his every footstep. He now looks for no better treatment from the landsman's hand, and he is very seldom disappointed. If perchance he meets with one who will not wrong him, he regards the rare exception with a sort of wonder, and with a "You're a queer fellow" turns away with a half chuckle at your lack of smartness to avail yourself of a chance. Thus thousands pass away from year to year, unknown and uncared for, save by the mother, wife or sister, who

> Those darling lost ones, whom they long for, are.

In opposition to this careless, sinful course, which at its worst is devoid of the mean wickedness of the evil dweller upon earth, I have seen where religion has brought out of the rough quartz gold of the purest kind. I have heard tongues once loudest in revelry and fiercest in blasphemy, take up the song of praise and the voice of prayer, with a heartiness characteristic of the genuine tar, moving hearts as obdurate and tough as well-seasoned oak, and drawing from eyes

> Tears which the briny deep
> Never knew before.

If such good has been done by "creeds" as imperfect as those offered to seamen, how much more may be done when the Word, cleared of the horrid parasites which deform its beauty and hide the light thereof, shines brightly on the path of the ocean-child. How many rejecters of everything divine, will succomb to a love which casts out the fear which hath torment.

It was with the hope of a consummation like this that I undertook to throw the first shell into the fortresses on the sea board. I debated with myself in what form I should present some of our truths; and at last came to the conclusion, which met the approbation of a few brethren whom I consulted, that it should be by dialogue. I dare not expect that all who read it will be satisfied, for, indeed, I am not entirely satisfied myself; but I would say to one and all, that I have used my best jugdment, so far as I have gone, to arrest the attention of sailors to the glorious tenets of our Bible faith. I shall not be surprised if I come in for a share of the righteous (?) abuse which is heaped upon us as a people generally, especially as I have encroached upon a territory which the self yclept divines of the day had all to themselves. I have baited the hook so that the reader may be caught before he smells the theology, which at all events will not suffocate him with smoke from "the everlasting bonfire."

I had hoped that without much importunity I should have received a sum sufficient to have issued the first edition. I still lack twenty dollars, which must be raised somehow in two weeks from now. I have been prevented from making the pamphlet as large as I wished, from the fear of incurring expenses which I could not meet. But if ever I be able to publish it on my own hook, I will write a sequel to the "Light Ship."

In the necessity of the case, I now make my final appeal to those whom I shall name; from others than these I expect and wish for nothing. I appeal to all who having received the light of the gospel, would seek to enlighten those who are wandering in the mazes of blind unbelief and bewildering superstition. I appeal to the father who from his mountain home or city mansion looks out towards the sea, and thinks upon that son whose waywardness has leveled every hope he had in him. I appeal to that mother whose heart yearns day and night, and whose prayers follow her sailor boy, with a love unshaken by neglect, unwearying and unflagging in its intensity; and who yet hopes that some remembrance of her affection will urge the wanderer home. I appeal to all who have brother, friend or acquaintance "whose calling is the sea." I appeal to those who think that seamen are of sufficient importance in the scale of humanity to deserve attention. I appeal to those who do not think they have done more than enough for God already; who do not look back at '44 or '54 or any other period of injudicious lavishment, and buttoning up their pockets say, "I'll not give another cent." I appeal to those who, having been to sea, know what the seamen needs. I appeal to all who love the Lord with all their heart and their neighbor as themselves.

I have said enough to move the willing: more would not move the sordid lover of his money.

Correspondence.

From R. V. Lyon.

Bro. Grant:—Our Conference at Seneca Falls was the best that I ever attended. Subsequent to its close, I called at Rochester, spent part of two days with Bro. Marsh and had a delightful visit with him and his family. Crossed Lake Ontario into C. W., my field of labor, and with renewed energy, zeal and courage, commenced my labor of love with both families, by presenting a whole gospel to them. And the result has been good. Have preached in Toronto, Port Whitby, Brooklyn, Port Perry, Darlington, Coburgh, and in the township of Mariposa I held a grove meeting.

In most of these places the attendance was large, and in all the attention was good. I had the honor of baptizing thirteen intelligent believers in the things concerning the Christ and the kingdom of God.

Northern Railroad, N. Y., July 5, 1860.

From Bro. R. Bush.

Bro. Grant:—The Crisis comes to me like a winged messenger laden with the rich truths of the gospel. May the Lord sustain it till Jesus comes. Dear Brn. and Srs., my lot is at present in a remote place, where the Midnight Cry has never been proclaimed. The truths for which I earnestly contend being regarded as heresy, it gives me great satisfaction to hear from those who love the Lord and are looking for his speedy coming to receive his saints to himself, that where he is, there they may be also.

Although I am deprived of your company, and the conference meetings which you enjoy, yet I hope, by the grace of God, to be able to meet you in the coming kingdom. I desire an interest in your prayers.

Honey Grove, Texas.

From C. C. Stevens.

Bro. Grant:—We are having good meetings here. I have been holding them for some time. There is great interest. Yesterday I led two happy converts down into the water and buried them with Christ in baptism; they came out of the water praising God. One was my little son, fifteen years of age. None but a parent can know the gratitude and joy consequent on such a scene. To see one so young cheerfully bearing the cross was enough to move the hardest heart. Never have I witnessed a scene so affecting as this. O, may God sanctify it to the good of all present!

So. Berwick, Me., July 2.

From Sr. B. L. Clark.

Bro. Grant.—I have had strong impressions that it was my duty to publish to the world my experience while changing from my former errors to my present belief in scripture truths. I was converted when a child, and joined the Baptist church in W. Colby, Vt. My name was enrolled in the church book years before my eyes began to be opened to the great truths of the Bible. I was ever taught by my parents and my ministers, that I had an immortal soul, which was a part of God, consequently it could not die. Four years ago, I was requested to prove from scripture, that spirits did exist after the body was dead. I verily thought I could. I searched and failed in the attempt. How great the failure! While trying to prove the soul lived, I found it died. Souls were born, souls were made, souls went into the pit; fishes and beasts and men, alike had souls, and alike die, and all have one breath, and all return to dust.

Then I saw plainly that I had been clinging to error, and pressing it to my heart as God's truth these many years. I was ashamed to acknowledge that I was defeated in my proof, but I could not sustain my own belief from the Bible. What was to be done? I had only one resort, and that was this; go to God and confess my error, and ask him in meekness to lead me into truth. My prayer was, Lord, what is truth? Lord, teach me thy truth, for I desire nothing else but truth. The Bible was my only guide. I had never read on the subject or heard a sermon preached to lead me in this direction; in fact, it was all new to me. My faith was strong in the word of God. I believed it would lead me out, so that I could see light in God's light, remembering what the Savior said, "I am the way, and the truth and the life." I read and prayed and thought upon his holy word. In so doing, I found that it was strong meat for one so frail. Sleep departed from my eyes, my food refused to nourish this mortal body. The struggle was great and well nigh destroyed me, before I could give up my long cherished error, and believe that (which was so called) new doctrine.

While I was in this study, and had been for three weeks, Elder B. came along and gave a course of lectures on the second coming of Christ. He talked upon the sleep of the dead, and threw some light on my pathway. Still I feared to believe, for I did not wish to believe anything, only what would harmonize with my Bible. I set apart a day for fasting and prayer, and my only desire was to find God's truth. I was troubled and distressed. Every former argument failed me now. I fell on my face before God, and pleaded in faith, believing and trusting in the merits of Christ for light and truth. O how did my heart rejoice, when I heard my Savior say, "This is the way, walk ye in it." O how glorious the plan of salvation to my poor soul. I could see it from Adam down to the resurrection, when Christ should come to restore what was lost in Adam. It was now a paradise restored to Christ,—it was all glorious and all plain to me. It was as an open book before me. I saw such wisdom and power and glory in this great and glorious plan of salvation as I never saw before. Such harmony in my Bible. I could see where I had been taught wrong.

I verily thought that I could tell it so plainly, that all would see it even as I did. But I soon found that I could not do it. I went to the church and gave them my views, and told them that I believed them to be the truths of the Bible, and I was firm in my belief; and they must do as they saw fit, cut me off or let me remain. They waited two years, hoping that I would give it up; but finding me on the same foundation, which is the Word of God, which remaineth sure and steadfast, they labored with me, and finally excluded me from the church, lest I should promulgate my doctrine there.

Thank the Lord, I now have a large field to labor in, and none has any right to say that I shall not do it. I am free from creeds, and stripped of sectarianism. I have tried to do what I could in spreading this glorious truth. I sent to Moline and bought a few tracts, and Bro. Branch sent me a few which I have distributed about among professors of religion mostly.

Bro. Grew sent me a package of tracts, together with a kind christian-like letter, for which I am very grateful. The tracts I have mostly distributed. Now, dear brethren and sisters, I beg your prayers that I may be kept from the errors of the day, and from temptation, and that I may be firm, "unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

[This was mislaid.—Ed.

Bro. J. C. Gilman, Dexter Me. writes:—Bro Spaulding came here last fall, November, I think. He said he heard of me in Corinna, and as he came along, he said about everybody knew me. I asked him if the people said any evil of me? he said no. I then inquired if they said any good? he said no. I told him it was about as I expected; that the people had a right to expect some good from me, and I supposed they had looked till they had become discouraged and given up. Bro. S. replied, that God expected some good of me, and made a prayer and went on his way. I think he found it a cold place.

After he left, I considered on my ways and concluded such a reputation would damn me, and I resolved that when Bro. S. should come this way again, he should hear a different report. I believe he will. Since that time, by the help of the Lord, I have been trying to do good, and the Lord has strengthened my heart. Now if there are any disconsolate ones, my advice is, set about doing good as soon as possible. We might just as well be damned for doing all the good we can, as to be damned for doing nothing.

From Bro. B. Perham.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:—We are taught in the blessed Word, that God seeks such to worship him as will worship him in spirit and in truth. Are we wholly on the side of truth? and does the Word of God dwell richly in our minds? and are we spiritually-minded? or are we rejecting the plain truth of God's Word, and trying to uphold the dreadful error of eternal misery founded on the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which destroys or obliterates the lustre and glory of the resurrection to eternal life? If we are doing thus, are we not changing the Word of God into a lie? I do not mean by this, that any one is dishonest; by no means; but are sadly deceived. I was once there myself and know how to pity you, and sympathise with you; for I hung to the doctrine of immortal-soulism and endless misery as long as I possibly could; but when I saw how the horrid doctrine dishonored God, and diminished the glory of the resurrection, I was heartily sorry that I ever advocated it. I find there is no other way to prove the awful doctrine, only to alter the following and many other passages of Holy Writ, and make them read thus: "Who shall be punished with everlasting" preservation "from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power."—2 Thess. 1:9. "And these shall go away into everlasting" conscious misery, "but the righteous into" eternal happiness.—Matt. 25:46. "Behold the day cometh" "saith the Lord," when the wicked "shall be" as immortal "stubble, and the day that cometh shall" not "burn them up" "root" and "branch"; but they shall be preserved alive in the fire to all eternity.—Mal. 4:1. "His breath goeth forth," his body "returneth to his earth," and his immortal soul to God who gave it; and "in that very day his thoughts" are preserved, so as to be brighter than ever, and his immortal soul knows more than all the living.—Ps. 146:4. "All" immortal "souls are mine; . . . the soul that sinneth it shall" live in eternal, conscious misery.—Ezk. 18:4. If their mortal bodies do not rise and put on incorruption, their immortal souls are alive in heaven, and can cry, "O death, where is thy sting? oh grave, where is thy victory?" 1 Cor. 15:54, 55. "If the dead rise not then . . . . they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are" not "perished," for their immortal souls are alive in heaven, praising God.—1 Cor. 15:16, 18. "For the wages of sin is" eternal life in misery; "but the gift of God is eternal" happiness in heaven!—Rom. 6:23. "And sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth" eternal life in misery!—Jas. 1:15. "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is" eternal life in misery.—Rom. 6:21. "In death," the immortal soul remembers thee, in nobler and brighter strains of praise in heaven.—Ps. 6:5.

And now, dear reader, think for a moment, what dreadful work this would make of the holy Scriptures, to alter it as above; and yet, it exactly accords with the doctrine of immortal-soulism and endless misery. Is it right to tolerate the doctrine in ourselves, or in others? I think it is not; but that it is the duty of every minister of the gospel of the kingdom, to raise his voice in thunder tones against it. Let us all be faithful in the cause of our King, that when he shall appear, we may appear with him in glory.

Hinsdale, N. H.

A Letter from Alabama.

I have often thought, if I could be of any service to any one, I would willingly step forward and tell them of my wanderings from the truth, that others might be careful to shun error concerning the ordinances of God. From my childhood to the fiftieth year of my age I was taught that we go to heaven at death, that the wicked will be eternally miserable, and that the world will be converted.

While perusing a number of the Crisis, I was very much affected by reading a "Letter from abroad." It brought to recollection some of my youthful experience. The writer stated that the rite of baptism confused him. There is where my feet had well nigh slipped. The church presented three modes of administering this ordinance; sprinkling, pouring and immersion. Not being well versed in reading the Scriptures, and following the example of others, I went astray, contrary to my own conviction of the right way.

With others, I suffered the element water to be thrown in my face. O, what a mockery! I was not ignorant of the manner in which Jesus was baptized, therefore my act was the more criminal. I had not answered a good conscience toward God. On the evening of the same day, there fell, suddenly, a sense of horror and consternation on me. I verily thought God had set in judgment upon me for this wicked act. O the remorse of conscience I then endured! I thought that God had left me to myself and the wicked one. I could get no relief; appetite failed, sleep departed, and hope fled. I sometimes found relief in prayer, awakening a little hope, and again the heavens appeared like brass over me. The sound of my voice would return void.

At length, while meditating on the dealings of God with the children of men, the scene was changed. An object was presented to my view, which bore the resemblance of a beautiful personage, looking from behind a curtain of glory. His gaze was on me. O, what a lovely being! I took him to be the One who died for sinful man. My heart relented before him. The tears now began to flow, and the language of my heart was,

"Alas! and did my Savior bleed?"

This was a day of release to me in a measure. Baptism came up at once. What shall I do? Sometimes rejoicing, and sometimes despairing, sometimes hoping, and sometimes doubting.

When there was a door opened I readily accepted, and followed my Savior into the watery grave, where I lost all my despairing feelings.

One word to the young. Obey the Word, pray in faith, trust in God, and prove faithful to your trust.

From one who once despaired, but now can look with the faithful few for the soon coming King. Let us be ready.

Reasons for my Hope is an excellent work. The historic sketches are worth more than double the price of the book. I wish that every person who has an ear to hear what God hath spoken could have one to read. Geo. Dillabaugh.

Obituary Notice.

Died, in Ellington, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., on the 18th of January, 1860, Dea. Ira Gates, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

Having spent the day in reading, Bro. G. went out at evening, took care of his horse, came into the house, hung up his staff, coat and hat, laid down upon his bed, and died without a struggle.

He was born in Ridgeburg, Fairfield Co., Ct., in the year 1777. At the age of thirteen he removed with his parents to the State of Vermont. Three years after his father died, leaving him with his mother to care for and support a family of three brothers and four sisters, which duty he discharged most faithfully. At the age of twenty-three he united in marriage with Clarissa Heath, with whom he lived in peace, harmony and love for fifty-four years, and with whom he brought up a family of seven sons and three daughters. In 1816 he removed with his family to Genesee Co., in the state of N. Y., and while there, at the age of forty years, sought and obtained the forgiveness of his sins. He remained in Genesee County some eight years. Having purchased his farm of the wrong man, fortune seemed to frown upon him, and he lost all of his earthly possession. The wants of a growing family staring him in the face, it called into exercise that indomitable courage and perseverance that always seemed to characterize the man. In the year 1824 he removed with his family to the town of Ellington, Chautauqua Co., at that time a new and wilderness country.

After struggling with poverty and poor health for some time, he finally succeeded in obtaining a competency of this world's goods, the country new, and the inhabitants few. The cause of Christ, upon which he never turned his back, now occupied much of his time. There was no Christian Church within his reach with which he could unite. He longed to unite with a people who acknowledge no master but Christ, and no rule of faith and action except the Bible. Not far from this time Elds Badger and Shaw traveling through the country preaching Jesus unto the people stopped for a time in Ellington. As the result of their labors a Christian Church was organized, and he became one of its most prominent and useful members. A field was now opened wherein he felt he could labor and be useful. He with a few others saw the necessity of having a house wherein they might worship God. They commenced the work unitedly, and with a good will worthy of the cause in which they were engaged. They soon accomplished the object for which they labored. The cause of Christ began to prosper. Shortly a large church was gathered together. His family of children now grown, followed the precepts of their worthy parents, embraced the religion of Jesus Christ, and joined the same church. His soul was now happy in God, and he felt to say with Simeon of old, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." At his house the servants of God ever found a welcome home. The poor and needy were never turned empty away. Religion was his theme—to worship God his delight.

But clouds began to arise; circumstances over which he had no control caused the church which he had helped to gather together to become scattered, and the house for which he sacrificed so much became deserted. He wept over Zion; but he never hung his harp upon the willows. Israel's God was his still. In this condition the writer of this notice found them; and when the old patriarch was with others interrogated whether the cause of Christ could be revived there or not, again joy beamed from the old man's countenance as he remarked, "We can trust." The church revived, and the old man was always in his place. He was anxious to have the meeting-house repaired; the work commenced; he watched its progress with the most intense anxiety, aiding by his counsel and his money. After its completion, at the dedication he was almost overjoyed at the first fellowship meeting after dedication, and the last he ever attended. His cup of joy was filled to overflowing. He exhorted his children and brethren to steadfastness. He thought that would be his last meeting on earth; and so it proved. In a few days he died, as he had lived, a sincere and warm-hearted christian.

May the afflicted family and relatives, and the church to which he was so ardently attached, emulate the same steadfastness and faithfulness in the cause of God and the prosperity of Zion which characterized the life of our dear Father in Israel. His memory will be embalmed in the hearts of surviving kindred and friends, and although dead he yet speaketh.

The above is no eulogy, but the promptings of a heart which enjoyed his friendship in his last days. His funeral was attended on the 21st in the Christian chapel, which he assisted to build and to repair. The house was filled to its utmost capacity. Sermon by the writer from John 11:25. His remains were deposited in the Ellington cemetery, to rest in peace till the last trump shall sound and mortality be swallowed up of life.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

[From Liverpool 23d ult.]

There was no new movement in Sicily. The Neapolitans were fortifying Messina, and had concentrated 8000 troops there and considerable ammunition.

The evacuation of Palermo is completed, and the Neapolitan frigates had left the port.

Garibaldi was forming twenty regiments for operations on the main land.

The Neapolitans are in great force in Calabria.

All of the communes in Sicily had presented addresses requesting annexation to Piedmont.

The American vessel seized by the Neapolitans was the Charles and Jane, of Baltimore, Captain Quain.

The American Minister at Naples had demanded passports for his son and two other persons, with permission to visit the vessel at Gaeta.

Gen. Lamoriciere is said to have issued an order of the day to the Papal troops, announcing that the moment for marching against the enemy was approaching.

There had been sanguinary disturbances in Albania.

The Dragoman of the Austrian Consulate was assassinated at Scutari.

The rumored outbreak at Smyrna and assassination of public functionaries is doubtful.

A revolt in the Turkish army is apprehended, the soldiers being exasperated at not receiving their arrears of pay.

Paris, June 23. The Patrie of to-day states that Garibaldi held a council of war on the evening of the 21st, at which it was unanimously decided that the insurrectional army, after having collected all the necessary military forces, should march on Messina. It was believed the march would commence on the 28th.

The Opinione Nationale says that Garibaldi will soon be at the head of 40,000 men.

The Neapolitans expect large contingents from Austria (Bavarians, as they say.) There are now nine battalions of these, and ten more are said to be preparing.

Further information has arrived confirming the departure of the batch of brigands to assassinate Garibaldi. The confirmation comes from such sources that it is impossible to doubt the truth of it.

Interesting from Sicily.—The following is from the correspondence of the London Morning Chronicle:

"Paris, Sunday evening, June 17th. The news from Naples to-day is of the highest interest. Medici, one of Garibaldi's boldest and most trusted lieutenants, has effected a landing at Catanzaro, in Calabria, which is in a state of insurrection, and the people of Calabria are the bravest of the Neapolitan race. On the 13th a popular manifestation took place in Naples itself, which has excited so much fear that the King's departure for Gaeta is said to be resolved upon. Gen. Lamoriciere has moved troops toward the frontier of Naples, and this movement has excited much suspicion on the part of the government of Turin.

Marseilles, June 20. According to advices received here from Syria, thirty-six villages had been burnt on Mount Lebanon. The Turkish Governor has sent some forces to Derelkanor in order to put a stop to the attacks of the Druses in that locality. At Saidi, however, the Turkish soldiers are said to have supported the Druses, and to have participated in the massacre of the Christians. The Turkish Consul at Saidi is reported to have entrenched himself within the enceinte of the Khan with all Europeans. A French vessel was expected. Fresh advices announce the commission of murders and burning by bashi-bazouks.

THE BADEN CONFERENCE.

The Liverpool Post says: "Various speculations are afloat as to the success of Louis Napoleon's visit to Baden-Baden, but there seems no doubt as to his unpopularity with the German people. It is stated that the population of Baden manifested any thing but sympathy for the Emperor Napoleon during his visits there."

A Paris correspondent writes:—"I am informed on good authority that the attempt to bribe the Prince of Prussia out of the Rhine by holding out a vision of Prusso-Germanic empire has egregiously failed, and that the Emperor has returned from Baden with the conviction that if he wishes to have the Rhine he must fight for it, and that all his benevolent intentions with regard to the 'unification' of Germany have been seen through."

[Three days later. From Liverpool 26th ult.]

The King of Naples is ill.

It is asserted that the Neapolitan Council had resolved to grant a constitution, a general amnesty, a free press, to make an entire change in the Ministry, and to form an Italian alliance with Piedmont, etc., but the king's assent was wanted.

Prince Jerome Bonaparte is dead.

The Austrian Government was making vast military preparations in Venetia.

Canton dates are of May 6. The reply from the Chinese government to the last communication from the British Ministers had been received. The Chinese were actively preparing to resist.

ONE DAY LATER.

St John's, N. F., July 5. The steamship Fulton, from Southampton, evening of the 27th, arrived off Cape Race at 8 o'clock last evening, en route for New York.

Garibaldi's Council of War unanimously decided that the insurrectionary army should march on Messina on the 28th. The National Guard are to occupy different positions in Palermo.

The organization of the troop of marines is progressing.

The Emperor Napoleon will not recognise the annexations of Sicily, Tuscany and Romagna to Piedmont.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe says it is a great mistake to suppose that Murat must necessarily be the candidate of Napoleon III for the throne of Naples. The Duke de Leuchtenberg, being both a Beauharnais and a Romanoff, has far the best chance of occupying any vacant throne in the combined gift of France and Russia.

It is remarked at Paris that the Neapolitan Embassy, which was most prodigal of news a few days ago, now gives none.

Discovery in Egypt.—The interesting discovery, of which further particulars will, no doubt, shortly be given to the the scientific world, was recently made in Egypt in the neighborhood of the Great Pyramid by the celebrated archeologist, M. Augusta Mariette. It would appear that in the course of his explorations he had lighted on the Palace of Cephren, King of Egypt, who is supposed to have been the constructor of the Great Pyramid, and who lived about 3,000 years before Christ. The immense edifice is built of solid granite, and several magnificent colossal statues of King Pharaoh Cephren have already been discovered on it, which leads to the belief that further investigations will bring forth still more curious and interesting remains.

Editorial Notice.

☞ We have an order from a Mrs. Mary A. Hanes for the Crisis, enclosing $1.25; but the lady has not sent her address.

Also, an order for the Loveland Discussion, enclosing 24 cents, without name, state, or address. It is difficult to fill such orders.

Notice.

A meeting will be held at the school-house near Bro. Whitaker's, two miles north of Edenboro, Erie Co., Pa., Saturday, July 28th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 29th at 9 o'clock, A. M.

Also, a grove meeting in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Edenboro, Erie Co., Pa., August 25th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Ongley, Evangelist.

☞ I expect to preach at the Clark Meeting-house in Barnstead, N. H., on Sunday, the 29th of July; and, if it should appear to be duty, may hold meetings for a day or two following. T. M. Preble.

☞ Elder A. Cleaveland will preach at North Troy, Vt., Sunday, July 22d, and once in four weeks the ensuing year.

Commence a quarterly meeting Saturday, July 28th, at South Troy, to hold over the Sabbath. Preaching brethren are invited to attend. He will also preach at South Troy once in four weeks through the year.

N. Orcutt.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping. We shall expect those preachers present that feel sent. Further particulars hereafter.

D. Cornwell, M. Gorson, L. Mills, } Committee.

To the Brethren in New York.

Brethren: We are requested by Bro. John Stevenson, C. W., to inform you that the small chronological chart, forwarded about sixteen months ago to Bro Lederer, of "The Israelite Indeed," and afterwards in the hands of Brn. Green, Doolittle and others, is expected to be forwarded to the office of the World's Crisis, Boston, at as early a date as possible. Will they see to it?

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Corliss, Lowell, E Heath, Lynn, S. Ayres, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

Tent Meeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a Tent Meeting held on the farm of Uriah Ladd, near the Burrough's Bridge, in Stanstead, C. E., to commence July 6th, and continue over two Sabbaths. Come, brethren, to this meeting; bring your beds and provisions, and there will be rooms prepared for you. Elders S. W Thurber and B. S. Raynolds are expected to be present. All the ministering brethren are invited to attend and labor for the salvation of those out of Christ.

Committee of Arrangements, Joseph Whitcome, T. Morrill, Willard Ayer, A. Cranmer.

Grove Meeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a grove meeting the 14th and 15th of July, on land of Mr. Dale, at the White Oak Mills, (on the Alleghany river) Warren Co., Pa., two and a half miles below Tidioute. Bro. Geo. Bush will be with me to aid in presenting the truth. J. T. Ongley, Evangelist.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

Lines of Truth.

Air—"There'll be no sorrow there."

How happy we shall be
When we arrive at home,
And know thro' all eternity
We never more shall roam.

CHORUS.

There'll be no sorrow there,
There'll be no sorrow there;
In the city bright, in that world of light,
There'll be no sorrow there.

Sweet music we shall hear,
Sweet anthems we shall sing,
Bright crowns of glory we shall wear,
And Christ shall be our King.

We'll sit beneath Life's tree,
With harps all sweetly strung,
Thrice happy, happy we shall be,
Ere all our songs are sung.

On Jordan's shining shore
We'll greet our absent friends;
We'll meet at home to part no more,
In bliss that never ends.

No storms shall ever rise,
No night shall end that day,
And tears and griefs, and woes and sighs,
At last have passed away.

Ho! every thirsty soul,
Come, join that blessed throng;
Come, while salvation's waters roll,
And learn redemption's song.

The Master soon will rise
To close the open door,
And then in vain the sinner cries,
For mercy pleads no more.

For the Crisis.

Swine's Flesh; or, One of the Hobbies.

BY F. H. B.

This is emphatically an age of extremes, no less so in one department than in another. We see it in the religious and political; in the moral, intellectual and social; in eating, drinking and sleeping; within and without; above and below; on either side, far and near, one extreme follows another. Extremes naturally beget each other, and this is their most objectionable feature. Reaction is sure to follow, and when, by excessive effort or an over-heated zeal, we seem to have secured a certain amount of good, we are, nevertheless, soon convinced of our error while we see, clutched and borne away, the very prize we thought within our grasp, and this by the demon—"extreme."

The foregoing are some of the thoughts we have had while reading some production, or listening to the discourse of some person while opposing the use of swine's flesh as an article of food.

It is well known, that within a few years much has been said, or there has been much talk, as to whether the use of pork, as an article of food, is a benefit or detriment; whether it is substantial and nutritious, or producing a morbid state of the system and thus serving to undermine the constitution.

The main arguments urged against this article of food are,

I. The interdiction of Moses.

1. That the law, prohibiting the use of swine's flesh, was given is admitted, but it belonged to the Israelites exclusively, and was never designed as a rule for other nations.

2. The Arabs, though they refrain from the use of swine's flesh, it is not out of any respect for the law of Moses. It is well known that they eat camels, hares, etc., animals as strictly forbidden by the law as swine.

3. But admitting the force of the reasoning when viewed in respect to the Jewish law, the fact that that law is abrogated renders the argument futile.

II. But it is said to be difficult of digestion.

1. As to the difficulty in digesting this kind of food, we fail to see in this a reason why we should abstain from it altogether. How can the fact, that an article of food difficult of digestion, be urged as a reason why it should not be used at all? If this difficulty were urged why it should be used moderately, there would seem to be some sense in it, but as it is, there is no force in it whatever.

2. This same objection may be urged against the use of other kinds of food in almost universal use, some of which are approved by the very persons who are so zealously opposed to the use of swine's flesh.

III. It is said to produce scrofula.

As to its producing scrofula this is by no means demonstrated. Indeed, the most that has been said on this point is mere speculation. The idea that cutaneous disease is caused by the use of pork is, we believe, entirely erroneous. In all the so-called arguments, one can find anything but the substantial reason for refraining from the use of swine's flesh. What is said against it is, generally speaking, mere talk. Only two reasons, worthy of consideration, have, as yet, been urged, why the Israelites were required to abstain from it, and these by no means apply to us. 1st, "Lest they should be corrupted by intercourse with other nations, and no provision could be more effectual to this end: 2d, A physical reason existed in the nature of the climate where the flesh of some animals as swine, etc., is less wholesome than in more northern regions."

It is a well known fact that animal food, and especially what is fat, is demanded during one season, and but very little during another season of the year. What nature demands at one time, she may reject at another. The colder the climate, the greater the demand for fatty substances, and nothing is more suitable to this demand than good fat pork. It is well known that the Esquimaux, who occupy the coasts of the Icy Sea, and of Hudson Bay to the borders of the Atlantic, on the Labrador coast live, almost entirely, on the fat of the whale and other sea animals.

Again. "The reasoning," says the President of the Devon and Cornwall Natural History Society, "of the ancients and of commentators, Rabbinical and Medical, regarding the unhealthiness of sound pork, in moderate quantities, as a condiment, or more generally as an article of food, is entirely erroneous. For in some provinces of ancient Persia, the practice of curing animal food was known so early, that the procession of tribute-bearing deputies from the several Satraps, sculptured on the great stairs at Persepolis, represents at least one nation bringing preserved flesh meat, apparently hams; and already before the conquest of northern Gaul by Cæsar, pork and various sausages were exported from Belgium to the Roman capital. Neither in the tropics, nor in the East, during the first centuries of christianity, or in the era of the Crusaders, or among the christians of the present day, are any ill effects ascribed to the use of swine's flesh; and the Moslem population which is debarred the use of this kind of food, is, perhaps, more liable to disease and to the plague, than others, because it lacks the stamina of resistance to infection, and that supply of digestive nutriment which keeps the alimentary system in a healthy condition. The rich Moslem supply the deficiency by vegetable oils and butter or glue; hence while the wealthy official class multiplies, the poorer classes, for want of a cheap supply of similar ingredients, diminish."

The question is sometimes asked, Why is scrofula more prevalent in Europe and North America, than in tropical climates, unless it is owing to the use of swine's flesh as an article of food? My answer is, 1st. Scrofula is peculiar to cold and variable climates, hence seldom met with in warmer ones. 2d. Some oriental nations, though afflicted with those diseases that come under the head of leprosy, are as free from scrofula as the Jews, and yet eat freely of pork, among whom are the Chinese, etc. 3d. The term scrofula, coming from scrofa, a swine, has been quite an argument with some. It is said that this animal is subject to a similar disease. But this argument does not stop here, it is equally good against other animals whose flesh is used as an article of food. Now these objections originate with two classes of persons:

1. Those who do not speak from experience, but who, like many others, have a theory to maintain. Much that is said by this class is mere talk, and yet, they meet with considerable success, for there are those in community who always stand ready to receive every humbug that is started, or mount some new hobby.

2. The other class who oppose, are those who do it on account of the supposed physical effect which they have received, or experienced in eating of this kind of food. That pork does not agree with all persons is true. But in the majority of cases the same argument might be urged against the use of other kinds of animal food, so that the same persons who cannot eat swine's flesh, must for the same reason refrain from all animal food, and hence the argument deduced from this proposition, is not against pork simply, but against all animal food. If a person is convinced from experience that pork injures him, let him refrain from its use. Let him do as the person does who is conscious that honey, cheese, nuts, and even some kinds of fruit hurt him. But let him that eateth not, judge not him that eateth.

Where we find one person who is injured by the use of pork, we find a thousand who have received no injury at all, unless it is because they could not get it to eat. There are many illustrations of this truth; take one: A certain man—a clergyman. This person is about fifty years old, is a perfect specimen of a man; has never seen a sick day, with one exception—case of accident—can handle any common man, can jump a six rail fence, is an expert in fishing, building saw-mills; has preached fifteen times a week, and can do other sundry things too numerous to mention. Can eat and has eat one fourth of a pound of butter at a meal, and is at the same time a pork eater. Perfectly free from cutaneous diseases or scrofula, and this after eating, according to his own estimate, which I think is quite moderate, no less than twenty hogs, of an average weight of three hundred pounds each.

Having said thus much, we submit the following as the conclusion, being fully convinced of its correctness:

1. Pork may not be eaten by persons who, from experience, are convinced that it injures them.

2. It should be eaten moderately by persons of sedentary habits.

3. Persons who are in the habit of eating freely of it in cold weather, should eat sparingly of it in warm weather; and this same suggestion relates to all kinds of animal food.

4. With these exceptions you may eat swine's flesh—eat without any fear of injury, either to body or soul; eat of it freely, it being among the all things (Gen. 9: 3) given for food; eat of it as one of the most palatable and nutritious articles of food ever given to mankind; eat of it because of the properties it contains, calculated to impart real stamina; eat of it freely, not regarding the law of Moses which being abrogated is a dead letter; eat of it regardless of old women's whims, or the speculations of some piece of superannuated humanity, or the mere talk of some hobby-horse adventurer; eat of it as one of the creatures of God (Gen. 9: 3), and referred to by the apostle when he says, "For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer." Let us not be among that class who were to come in "latter times" who should interdict the use of meats "which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving," the use of which he fully authorized in the covenant that he made with the descendants of Noah, and which is now in force between the Lord and the nations of the earth.

The Babylonish Garment.

It was very valuable—had been imported—and to have been found there must have been brought a long distance. This increased its expensiveness; it would add much to the toggery of the wearer,—and with the bar of gold, enrich the thief—it was therefore coveted. And what could be the harm? Did it not come in as one of the spoils of war? And why should it be destroyed? Wherein, then, did the sin consist? It was forbidden,—and so, while it was obtained by seemingly legal means, it was unlawful to wear it, or even possess it. And what comfort could the poor, miserable Achan in the camp, take in possessing it? He dare not wear it. All Israel would "spot" him, at once, as having adopted the trappings of another nation, and bring him before the judges on trial for disobedience. It was a hard case; but he had obtained it by right as an individual, he claimed, and thought he had a right to do as he pleased with his own; so he hid it. Fatal resolve! What could he have done? Confessed his fault and given it up to the common sacrifice. As being a member of the church he had stolen it, and must be found out and make atonement. He died a miserable death.

The coveting was the first step, and so it is with backsliders, always, when the tinsel of this world allures them from Christ. The argument of members of the church, that the expensive garments they wear are their own, having been obtained in a legitimate way by their own labor or money, is all well enough when they stand as individuals; but they should remember that Israel has some interest in it; and something to do about it, or suffer by it. "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price"—"Ye are Christ's."

Well, now, this makes a wide difference. To desire these expensive garments, imported from England, France, Persia, India; in the first place, is evidence of a wrong disposition; it betrays less interest in the success of the great divine struggle, and more of the will for personal aggrandizement; less care of Christ, and more of the world. And to buy them is almost a moral theft; because we, as such persons, have no right to have them, or to wear them, must adopt the old policy to hide them. If we wear them where the Lord is, or his people worship, we hide them. We feel that such spoils cannot benefit us; and expect chastisement and death. What then? Why, we must get back; and often before we do it, we find that the church of God is lame and discomfited before the enemies of the cross.

Look out and do not be deceived to allow yourself to be disguised by Babylonish garments. Let not the Master find you in the camp, with the showy garments of the other army on, else he treat you as spies. The Babylonian cloak to us, is the thing in the way of adornment or show, which He has forbidden, and which we cannot hide with safety. But some will still seek their praise of men and will doubtless have their reward.

"Does it not look pretty, beautiful, grand, superb?" that cloak—or whatever, who cares for the name? Yes, magnificent, awful! Almost anything can be dressed up to the imposing point. Great in fashion and butterfly glories, are very many people, depending on superlative millinery and tailoring excellences—with superabundance of imported cloth, while a worm is the basis. But real Beauty is a jewel rarely found, and seldom covered up or flaunted out with splendid fabrics, far-brought from foreign lands, nor decorated with exuberant, artificial charms. One half the practical, real trouble, in this country now, comes from this same extravagant, Babylonian (foreign) attire, and the other half on account of the golden bullion.

A Dialogue.

Disciple. Lord, rebuke the Devil; I "durst not bring against him a railing accusation."

Christ. Thy prayer is heard. "The weapons" of thy "warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of" the "strongholds" of Satan; "casting down" lewd "imaginations, and every high thing," as lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, and pride of life, "that exalt" themselves "against the knowledge of God," and bring "into captivity every thought" to me.

Disciple. How shall I keep myself, so that I "suffer" not "as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a busybody?"

Christ. "Keep thy heart with all diligence." From the heart come "the issues of life," as well as "evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, lasciviousness, blasphemy, pride, foolishness." Consider that thou hast "the sentence of death in" thyself, and "there is no work . . . in the grave;" therefore, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." I advise constant vigilance to the militant church, while buffeted by many subtle and cruel foes. Keep thine eye on the crown of life. God will "raise the dead" in his own time.

Disciple. "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

The Watcher.

All through the dark and dreary night
I have not sought repose,
But on the lonely watchtower's height
Have longed for night to close.

I've stood amid surrounding gloom,
No ray of light could see,
Save one bright star that round me shone—
The star of prophecy.

Many there were who watched awhile,
But darkness hung around;
And weary of the watch, they closed
Their eyes in sleep profound.

Then at the second watch they rose—
They knew 'twas midnight then—
But since it passed and morn came not,
They fell asleep again.

And now the first faint gleam of day
Lights up the eastern sky;
I know the night's long hours are passed,
I know the Day is nigh.

My weary watch is almost done;
Through blinding tears I see
The light of that celestial morn
That brings repose to me.

I have not watched so long for nought,
I have not wept in vain,
'Tis those who watch till Jesus comes
That shall the Kingdom gain.

Nature.

How glorious is nature robed in its ever variegated dress of beauty and splendor. The trees are dressed in the richest of foliage, the flowers smile to the face of morning, the streamlets meander on most gracefully through the flowery lawn, and the warblers pour forth their swelling strains full of praise to their Creator. There is something to animate, console, and nerve up to "patient continuance in well-doing," the weary and tried one that leans upon the arms of Jesus.

Trials may come, disappointments may roll in upon us; dark storm-clouds may gather over the heavens, fierce lightnings may blaze wildly around us, and the deep-toned thunder roar in all its terror; yet the saint can look away through all these scenes of trouble, and by faith, and that hope which is like an "anchor to the soul," lay hold of the promises in store for the faithful, the patient and the obedient.

Weary, tried, waiting one, are you sometimes sad and downcast, when the cloud of tribulation hovers darkly over you? Go out among the hills in the gorgeously decorated temple of nature, and forget your trials while you send forth to the Father of lights the pure sentiment of fervent prayer. Why were these scenes spread out so beautifully around us? Why were those odors poured out so fragrantly upon the passing zephyr? Why was the bird made to warble so melodiously the anthems that fall so sweetly upon the ear? And why these curtains of heaven, hung out so sublimely over our heads, with their thousands of brilliant lamps shining perpetually through the deep, intervening azure? For what purpose were all these thus gorgeously arrayed? Why was all this beautiful handiwork? Perhaps some lonely, melancholy, troubled one, that has had their fears relieved, and their chains of anguish broken by the spirit infused by these, could answer.

How wonderful, how majestic, how sublime, the handiwork of the Almighty! Yet how soothing to the troubled spirit. It transports my thoughts to that immortal, Edenic nature, that shall bloom forever in unfading beauty. There grief shall never be known. There no wail of bitterness shall ever burden the air. There the saint shall roam through the Paradise of God, while is swelling upon the heavenly atmosphere the GUSHING STRAINS OF IMMORTAL SONG.

"And Then?"

Filippo Neri was living at one of the Italian universities, when a young man, whom he had known as a boy, ran up to him with a face full of delight, and told him that what he had been long wishing above all things in the world was at length fulfilled, his parents having just given him leave to study the law; and that thereupon he had come to the law school at this university, on account of its great fame, and meant to spare no pains or labor in getting through his studies as quickly and as well as possible. In this way he ran on a long time; and when at last he came to a stop, the holy man, who had been listening to him with great patience and kindness, said, "Well! and when you have got through your course of studies, what do you mean to do then?"

"Then I shall take my doctor's degree," answered the young man.

"And then?" asked Filippo Neri again.

"And then," continued the youth, "I shall have a number of difficult and knotty cases to manage, shall catch people's notice by my eloquence and zeal, and gain a great reputation."

"And then?" repeated the holy man.

"And then?" replied the youth, "why, then, there can't be a question, I shall be promoted to some high office or other; besides, I shall make money and grow rich."

"And then?" repeated Filippo.

"And then," pursued the young lawyer—"then I shall live comfortably and honorably, in wealth and dignity, and shall be able to look forward quietly to a happy old age."

"And then?" asked the holy old man.

"And then," said the youth, "and then—and then—then I shall die."

Here Filippo lifted his voice, and again asked, "And then?"

Whereupon the young man made no answer, but cast down his head, and after a time moved away. This last "And then?" had pierced like a flash of lightning into his soul, and he could not get rid of it. Soon after he forsook the study of the law, gave himself up to the ministry of Christ, and spent the remainder of his days in his service.

Reader! the question which Filippo Neri put to the young lawyer is one which we should put frequently to ourselves. When you have done all that you are doing, all you aim at doing, all that you dream of doing, even supposing that all your dreams are accomplished, that every wish of your heart is fulfilled, still, what will you do, what will you be, then? Whenever you cast your thoughts forward, never let them stop short on this side of the grave; let them not stop short at the grave itself; but when you have followed yourself thither, and you have seen yourself laid therein, still ask yourself the searching question, And then?—J. C. Ryle.

The Wife's Fidelity the means of her Husband's Conversion.

The following statement was made to the writer, by a pastor in Vermont, many years ago. The events narrated had then very recently occurred, and are given, as near as can be recollected, as he gave them. This was his narrative:

"Capt. B—— has been so moral, serious, amiable and exemplary, that many have thought he must be a christian. Though he had never made a public profession, he was, in many respects, an example to professors of religion. His wife has been an energetic, worldly woman, with little apparent seriousness. A few months ago she became thoughtful, and for some time past has appeared to be a decided christian. A few weeks since she determined to make a public profession. When her husband knew this, he requested her to wait awhile, hoping he might feel differently, and they might both go forward together. She replied, that if he were prepared to take the step, she would be glad of his company, but she had a duty to do, and she could not neglect it to wait for any one.

Finding her so fully resolved, he became still more anxious for her to wait for him; and having peremptorily forbade her to join the church, and exhausted all his powers of persuasion in vain, he told her if she did he would not live with her any longer. She calmly replied she must obey God rather than man.

On the morning of the Sabbath when she was expecting to join the church, he repeated his prohibition; and when she was leaving his pew to join with others, he attempted to raise his foot across the door to stop her, but was not able. He went home before the sacrament was administered, and took his chamber alone. At the usual hour she prepared supper, and kindly invited him down to eat. He sternly replied he should never eat with her again. At bed-time she invited him to come down get something to eat, and go to bed. He angrily told her he should never sleep with her again. She went away and laid down on her bed. It was then that he began to reflect that in opposing his wife so, he was opposing God; and discovered that the feelings of his heart were wholly opposed to God and all good. His wife heard him groaning terribly; he soon came down to her room, still uttering heavy groans, and said to her, 'My dear wife, are you a christian? and can you sleep while I am going right to hell? Do get up and pray for me.' She was not sleeping. Together they kneeled beside the bed, while she prayed for him, and he prayed for himself. They spent most of the night in talking and praying. Towards morning, being much exhausted, she persuaded him to lie down, and her mind being greatly at peace, she soon fell asleep. As the day was dawning, he awaked her, saying, 'My dear [illegible] are you a christian? and can you sleep while everything is praising God.' His whole soul was full of light and peace, and love to God and all his works."

Many husbands have been converted apparently in consequence of the faithfulness of their wives in doing their duty, in opposition to the wishes of their husbands; but when was ever one converted, in consequence of his wife neglecting her duty in compliance with his wishes?—Oberlin Evangelist.

A Little Longer.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Shall violets bloom for thee, and sweet birds sing,
And the lime branches, where soft winds are blowing,
Shall murmur the sweet promise of the spring.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Thou shalt behold the quiet of the morn,
While tender grasses and awakening flowers
Send up a golden tint to greet the dawn.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
The tenderness of twilight shall be thine,
The rosy clouds that float o'er dying daylight,
Nor fade till trembling stars begin to shine.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Shall starry night be beautiful for thee;
And the cold moon shall look through the blue silence,
Flooding her silver path upon the sea.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Life shall be thine—life with its power to will,
Life with its strength to bear, to love, to conquer,
Bringing its thousand joys thy heart to fill.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
The voices thou hast loved shall charm thine ear;
And thy true heart that now beats quick to hear them
A little longer yet, shall hold them dear.

A little longer yet, joy while thou mayst;
Love and rejoice, for time has naught in store;
And soon the darkness of the grave shall bid thee
Love and rejoice, and feel and know no more.

A little longer still—patience, beloved:
A little longer still, ere heaven unroll
The glory, and the brightness, and the wonder,
Eternal and divine, that waits thy soul.

A little longer ere life, true, immortal,
(Not this our shadowy life) will be thine own,
And thou shalt stand where winged archangels worship,
And trembling bow before the great white throne.

Family Prayer.

The patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, wherever in their pilgrimages they fixed on a place of residence, erected an altar to God for family devotion, and called on the name of the Lord.

Joshua resolved that, as for him and his family, they would serve the Lord—that is, worship him.

Job practised family worship. "He sent and sanctified his children, and rose early in the morning and offered burnt-offerings, according to the number of them all. Thus did Job continually."

David having spent one day in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the place he had prepared for it, and in presenting peace-offerings before the Lord, returned at night to bless his household—that is, to pray for blessings upon his family, or to attend upon family devotion.

Cornelius, the Centurion, it is said, "feared God with all his house:" meaning worshiped him with his family.

In the Lord's Prayer we have a command for family devotion. "After this manner pray ye—Our Father which art in heaven." The form of prayer is plural. It must, therefore, mean social prayer, and if social, then family prayer; for a family is the most proper place to engage in this devotion.

Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, having pointed out the duty of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, adds: "Continue in prayer; watch in the same with thanksgiving." The subject upon which he was speaking leads us to conclude he meant family prayer.

In his Epistle to the Ephesians, he enjoins it as a duty to "pray always with all prayer,"—that is, to offer prayer of every kind, and in every form, and at every proper season. Family prayer must therefore be included in his injunction.

Making Every Day Happy.

When you rise in the morning, form a resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow-creature. It is easily done; a left-off garment to the man who needs it; a kind word to the sorrowful; an encouraging expression to the striving,—trifles in themselves, light as air, will do it, at least for the twenty-four hours; and if you are young, depend upon it, it will tell when you are old; and if you are old, rest assured, it will send you gently down the stream of human time to eternity.

By the most simple arithmetic, look at the result; you send one person, only one, happily through the day,—that is three hundred and sixty-five in the course of the year; and supposing you live forty years, only, after you commence that course of medicine, you have made 14,600 human beings happy, at all events, for a time.

Now, worthy reader, is not this simple? It is too short for a sermon, too homely for ethics, and too easily accomplished for you to say, "I would, if I could."—Sydney Smith.

Politeness.

In politeness, as in many other things connected with the formation of character, people in general begin outside, when they should begin inside; instead of beginning with the heart, and trusting that to form the manners, they begin with the manners, and trust the heart to chance influences. The golden rule contains the very life and soul of politeness. Children may be taught to make a graceful courtesy or a gentlemanly bow; but unless they have likewise been taught to abhor what is selfish, and always prefer another's comfort and pleasure to their own, their politeness will be entirely artificial, and used only when it is their interest to use it. On the other hand, a truly benevolent, kind-hearted person will always be distinguished for what is called native politeness, though entirely ignorant of the [illegible] society.

Drowning the Squirrel.

When I was about six years old, one morning, going to school, a ground squirrel run into his hole in the ground before me; as they like to dig holes in some open place, where they can put out their heads to see if any danger is near. I thought now I will have fine fun. As there was a stream of water just at hand, I determined to pour water in the hole till it would be full, and force the little animal up, so that I might kill it. I got a trough beside a sugar maple, used for catching sap, and was soon pouring the water in on the squirrel. I could hear it struggle to get up, and said, "Ah, my fellow, I will soon have you out."

Just then I heard a voice behind me, "Well, my boy, what have you got there?"

I turned and saw one of my neighbors, a good old man, with long white locks, that had seen sixty winters.

"Why," said I, "I have a ground squirrel in, here, and am going to drown him out."

Said he: "Jonathan, when I was a little boy, more than fifty years ago, I was engaged one day just as you are, drowning a ground squirrel, and an old man came along and said to me, 'You are a little boy; now if you were down in a narrow hole like that, and I should come and pour water down upon you, would you not think I was cruel? God made the little squirrel, and life is as sweet to it as you; and why will you torture to death a little innocent creature that God has made?'"

Said he; "I never have forgotten that, and never shall. I never have killed any harmless creature for fun, since. Now, my dear boy, I want you to remember this while you live, and when tempted to kill any poor little innocent animal or bird, think of this, and mind, God don't allow us to kill his creatures for fun."

More than forty years have since passed, and I have never forgotten what the good man said, nor have killed the least animal for fun since that advice was given, and it has not lost its influence yet. How many little creatures it has saved from being tortured to death I cannot tell, but I have no doubt a great number, and I believe my whole life has been influenced by it.

The Boy that wouldn't get Mad.

I once heard an interesting story about two little brothers. One of them was ten years old, and the other eight. The eldest boy had, within a few months past, indulged the hope that God had given him a new heart. He thought he was a christian, that he loved the Lord Jesus Christ. But his little brother did not believe that his heart had been changed. He thought his brother was no more a christian than he had always been. He said he could not see any difference. Yet he meant to try him and see; for as his brother now appeared more sober than usual, and was more willing to go to meeting than before, he did not feel certain that he was not a christian.

Now, how do you think this little boy eight years old, undertook to find out whether his brother were really a christian? Why, every time he could get a chance, he would tread on his brother's toes, kick his heels, or pinch his arms, to see if he would get mad, as he used to do. But his brother bore it with meekness and good nature, without an angry word or look. This was different from what he used to do. He had before always been ready to take revenge on the spot for such an abuse. The youngest brother was sure that he could not do so; for he knew that he would get mad, if any body should treat him so unkindly. He soon became convinced that his brother was a christian, and that he was not. He became very anxious about the salvation of his soul, and in a short time he, too, indulged the hope that God had pardoned his sins and given him a new heart.

Fine Clothes.

Little readers, are you proud, when dressed in fine clothes? I never see a person so proud of his dress but I think: Well, he has only cast-off clothes, after all; he has the jacket of the lamb, and the old great-coat of the sheep: from head to foot he is dressed in what the trees or the animals have used before him. His shoes are made of hides, his stockings of the cotton-shrub, his shirt of the flax-plant, his handkerchief is spun by the caterpillar, and his gloves are the waistcoat of the angels.

☞ A pious little boy one day seeing his little sister in a passion, thus spoke to her: "Mary, look at the sun, it will soon go down; it will soon be out of sight; it is going—it is gone down. Mary, let not the sun go down upon your wrath."

"And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."—PHIL. 4: 7

The condition upon which this blessing is promised is previously stated,—"Be careful (or anxious) for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God;" and then having done this, "the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts."

Peace is one of those things about which the world have very little knowledge. Indeed, I fear they have very little thought about it. I hear of men who seek for wealth, who traverse oceans and perform labors for it; I hear of men who seek for glory in every place and under every circumstance where they think to gain it; I hear of men who seek for power, for pomp, and place; but where are the men who seek for peace? The Ancients had their gods of War, their gods of Wisdom, gods of Merchandise, gods of Lust, and gods of Theft; but the Christian's God is "the very God of Peace."

Now the question may arise, why do not men seek peace? It is desirable: all admit that. It is desirable to have peace between nations; it is desirable to have peace in communities, and peace in neighborhoods. We are not fond of being in broils, or of seeing them, as we have to sometimes. Peace in the family is very desirable;—a corner on a housetop in quietness, is better than the widest house and strife therewith. And then, better than all this is that "inner calm"—that peace which is in the heart; for though all around may be quiet, if there is tumult within, there is no peace. "There is no peace to the wicked." The man that gets drunk thinks that every man he meets is staggering; so the man who is not at peace thinks that every man is jarring and out of order. It is astonishing how much it smoothes this rugged world for a man to get peace in his heart. Let him be first at peace with himself, and his business goes better, his affairs move more smoothly, his neighbors are better neighbors, his old heart seems to be growing almost young, and these vexings and turmoils seem to be calming down to quietness. He has peace within.

I shall talk to you, first, of peace WITH God; and then of "the peace OF God;" for they are different. A man may be at peace with God, without knowing very much of the peace of God. But a man cannot know the peace of God without being at peace with God.

Peace with God is an external relation. It is ceasing to war with God. It is laying down the weapons of rebellion and saying, "I will fight no longer." It is ceasing to blaspheme, ceasing to sin, ceasing to pursue a course contrary to the will of God. A man cannot be at peace with God while he is sinning against Him continually. He cannot be at peace with God while he is breaking His law. When he ceases to do this, then he has peace with God. God is no man's enemy; God is no man's foe; God loves man; God waits to bless men; and his voice to us is, "Come and be at peace with me." So the Apostle says, "Being justified by faith we have peace with God." The work is done when we come and believe God,—when we come and accept His words,—when we come and open our hearts to the influences of His Spirit, and say, "we will be friends with God, and not foes."—Then the quarrel is over. Then there is peace.

But you must not confound this with "the peace of God that passeth all understanding;" for the peace of God is something right in a man. It is not an external relation, but an internal possession. So when a man is at peace with God, he may nevertheless be tossed and troubled, tempted and tried; he may have doubts, sorrows and woes. Therefore you must make this grand and broad distinction between the two. Some fail to do this, and, therefore, because their hearts are heavy, and their souls are sad, and they have not "the peace of God" in their hearts, they think they are not at peace with God." Job was at peace with God when he sat in the ashes and scraped himself with a potsherd; but he was not at peace with Satan; and his troubles arose from Satan's persecutions more than from any lack of friendship on the part of God. Many a time a man's bitterest struggles are when he has come to be at "peace with God." He has to force his way against the world; he has to take his stand against sin;—"without are fightings, within are fears." Still God is his friend; he is at peace with God.

The peace of God is felt in the heart possessed by it—dwelling in it, sanctifying and hallowing the soul. It is given by Christ through his Spirit. So we read in the fifth chapter of Gal.; "But the fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffing, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." Now, if a man would have fruit, he must plant that on which fruit grows, and then wait for the fruit. Fruit does not grow in a day. Time must be given. "First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." So, in order to possess the peace of God, we need to have the Spirit of God dwelling in our hearts, not as a transient visitor; for the Spirit of God comes thus to the sinner and is grieved away; but it is as an abiding guest; for Christ has said to those who love Him, that He and the Father will come and dwell with them always, even unto the end of the world.

Now there are some persons who feel a great lack of the peace of God; and the trouble with them is this. The Spirit of God which they have in their hearts is grieved and driven away. It must make place for the world. The Spirit of God may be a welcome guest on Sunday, but on Monday they have business to do; on Tuesday they have bargains to make; on Wednesday they have lands to buy; on Thursday they have notes to collect; on Friday they have offices to seek; and on Saturday they have accounts to settle; and they get a great many crooks and twists in their moral character while running this gauntlet of cares. Sometimes they make too good a trade for a christian to make; sometimes they get vexed; sometimes they find themselves doing things they would not like to have God see, but which he nevertheless does see; and all these things tend to banish the Spirit of God from the heart, and then the fruits of the Spirit are missing.

It is just as if you were to plant your yard with trees to-day, and to-morrow because you wanted to drive your cart through the yard, you should pull them up, throw them one side, and plant them the next day again. And so you do from day to day. But in the autumn you say, "Why are my trees fruitless?" Any one who knew the science of horticulture or fruit-culture could tell you the reason. Your trees have not been growing. You should have planted them, nurtured them, watched them, and awaited the result. So it is with the Spirit of God dwelling in the heart. If it comes as a transient guest, if it is hither and thither, present and gone, there can be no fruits of the Spirit, such as love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness and faith, in perfection. But if the Spirit of God dwell in the heart, and guide, and rule, and control it, then love, and joy, and peace come constantly. They are the rule, not the exception.

Peace, then, is the gift of Christ through his Spirit,—but upon certain conditions. Such for instance as this;—"Great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." If we love the law of God, the tendencies are to peace; for God's law must rule all things, and when we yield to it, we are in peace with it. Again, "The wisdom which cometh from above is first pure, then peaceable." Now, men would fain reverse this order of things. They would have peace first, and purity afterwards. This has been the trouble with the world from the beginning. There was mire in the bottom of the cup, and when it was disturbed all was filthiness and vileness. So if the nation is pure, do what you please, it is certain soon to be at peace. So if the neighborhood is pure, no excitement can make permanent trouble. So if the family is pure and right, no transient disturbance can make an abiding grief. It is sin in the nation that makes peace impossible. It is iniquity in the community that makes peace impossible. It is sin in the neighborhood and family that makes broils. It is selfishness in the heart that makes men "restless wanderers after rest."

Let us look for a moment at some of the characteristics of God's peace. It is great peace. "Great peace have they that love thy law." It is greater than any peace that a man can have of his own; for it is independent of circumstances that disturb all earthly peace. The peace that earth can give us is only the rest that we can get on the shifting sands, or the tossing waves. It is but for a moment. The vessel's deck now may be quiet for an hour, and then be tossed about for a month. But the peace of the christian is the quiet of a soul upon a rock. There is no tossing. The waves may dash, the billows may break, the tempest may howl, the winds may wail about it, and all the terrors of the storm go careering over it; it is a rock, and the billows break and the storm flits by, but he that stands on that rock stands safe.

Then the Scriptures speak of this peace as incomprehensible. The peace of God "which passeth all understanding," that peace which we cannot measure, that peace which we cannot tell, that peace which comes flowing into the heart, brightening its darkness, illuminating its shadows, calming all its fitful fever, and lulling the soul to rest as in the arms of love, as in the arms of Christ;—it passeth all understanding. Men that have not felt it cannot understand it; men that have not known it cannot describe it; and those that have felt it find it like all the deep and holy emotions of the heart,—too deep for utterance. Our deepest thoughts have no words.

Look for a moment at the Scriptural statements concerning this peace. There is an illustration—and a most beautiful one—which is used by the Prophet Isaiah, through whom God speaks thus;—"Oh that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! Then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." Is. 48: 18. The christian's peace has in it great similarity to this figure. Trace a river for a little, if you please, and note the resemblance. Suppose we go to find a river. Away among the hills, far up the mountains, we pursue our winding way among trees and rocks, over banks and ravines, and at last we come to the source of a river. It is not called a river now; it is the beginning of a river. It is a little spring, clear as crystal, brilliant and limpid as it gushes forth in its innocence, pure, sweet, and refreshing; and the thirsty pilgrim casts himself down by it to drink, be refreshed, and go on his way rejoicing. Just there, beneath that overhanging rock, beneath those spreading trees, there is the beginning of a river. How small! how feeble! how little! You follow it; it goes trickling down through the grass, and streaming over the stones; it is a little stream, and yet the beginning of a river. It is very easily disturbed. The boy can build his dam of turf across it, and he stops its flow. You can throw a stone in it, and its waters become roiled, and a child might say, "The river is spoiled." But wait a little while, and when the waters have risen high enough, the turfs will move down the channel, the water runs for a few moments, and the river will be clear again.

There is something, sometimes, in the christain's experience that is like this. A person just started in the paths of peace finds his course obstructed, and all at once he says, "My peace is gone." Wait, friend, a little while; rivers always run clear if you give them time.

Follow the river again. It has grown larger. A rill here, another there, a stream on this side and a rivulet yonder, have poured in their little contributions, and all together go rushing down through the valley, gliding sweetly under trees and through meadows, fertilizing the whole plain, making flowers blossom and herbage grow green; trees spread their roots by the water courses to catch the fertilizing flood. So the peace of God in the christian's heart comes down, cheering, soothing, and making the world better, because such a man lives with a fountain of peace in his heart.

Follow the stream along. Its channel is growing lower. Every mile brings it down nearer to the ocean level. It never climbs hills, nor goes over mountains; it seeks a low place. Like the little boy spoken of by Bunyan in the valley of Humiliation feeding his sheep, singing and wearing an herb that they call Heart's-ease in his bosom. By-and-by the stream grows great. Rivers rush in; streams from the hills and valleys come pouring through its banks; springs burst out along the river's side; fresh floods of living water come rolling down, and conspire to make the river what it is in its perfection. So the christian finds cause of joy and peace. To-day his eye falls upon some new promise that shines upon the sacred page; to-morrow some precious word of comfort breaks in upon the silence of his meditation; and then again there comes some glorious truth filling his soul with new light and life, and joy and peace.

"The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want,"

Trace the stream till it has become a river. You will not stop it now with clods of earth. The stone you plunge into it sinks in its ample bosom sending its circling ripple to the distant shore, and that is the last you see of that. There are obstructions beneath. Under its dark waters there are roughnesses and rocks; but the river glides over them all. On its glassy surface the ships sail. Rippling its crystal tide are the oars of the boatmen; and the sunshine comes down brightening it at morn like molten silver, or at eve like yellow gold. On its borders grow up cities; trees spread their branches above, and plow their roots beneath to catch the moisture that flows within those banks.

Where does the river end? It does not grow less and less, like the peace of many professed followers of Christ, until it is lost. Nay, as you pass down, it grows wider and deeper, until at length the broad ocean opens on our view:—you are out at sea. So with the peace of the christian. It is a possession not for time, but for ETERNITY. These tiny springs in the christian's heart come at last to lose themselves in the abyss of eternal peace, where the kingdom of Christ shall reign. There shall be Jesus as the Prince of Peace, ruling over all. Every foe shall be subjected under him, and all shall be at rest. The world shall have peace, for "the mountains shall bring peace to the people." There shall be peace in the heart and peace in the world. The din of battle, the tumult of passion, shall then be hushed.

This peace that "passeth all understanding," should "keep our hearts and minds through Jesus Christ," even in this world. Here, amid the turmoil of life; here, while conflicts and storms are about us; here, while woes assail and temptations beset, we may have this peace. The condition is this: to give ourselves up to God, be anxious for nothing, to banish those cares that disturb us, and cast them all on Christ; to bring our weary, heavy-laden souls to him, and say, "O Christ! take me, and take care of me!" Doing this, we have peace. In the world there is tribulation,—in Christ there is peace. And having done this, "in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God." In every trial, in every woe, in every grief that oppresses, in every tribulation, let your requests be made known to God. Make God your constant confidant,—your ever present friend,—your strength, your helper. In every trial go to him with your griefs as you would to a brother. Tell your wants as to one with whom your heart was joined. Go, cast your cares on him, for he careth for you. Jesus, the Great Master, said, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you." The world gives sparingly,—Christ gives abundantly. The world gives hoping to receive again,—Christ gives asking no return of the blessing. The world gives if it is not to be asked again,—Christ gives most freely to those who ask most frequently. The world gives to those who have no need of its gift, and spurns the miserable and the wretched, the beggared and the sinful;—Christ invites the lost, and seeks the perishing. If there is a prodigal amid his husks and swine, Christ waits to give him peace. If there is a lost sheep in the wilderness, the Great Shepherd leaves the ninety and nine, who are safe, and goes to find the one lost wanderer. And so he gives peace; binding up the broken heart, and pouring in joy to the troubled spirit; smiling away the sorrows that oppress us, and bidding us to come and rest.

Let us seek this peace. We need it when the world tries us; we need it when Satan tempts us; we need it when we feel in our own hearts that strange unrest, that ——"aching void

The world can never fill."

We need first to be at peace with God, so that we can say, "Between me and God there is no controversy;" I am at peace. And then we want the peace of God to come and hallow our whole life, and keep us steady and quiet amid all the scenes of earth. As the poet says, so we need to pray—

"Calm me, my God, and keep me calm:
Let thine outstretched wing
Be like the shade of Elim's palm,
Beside the desert spring.

Yes, keep me calm, though loud and rude
The sounds my ear that greet,—
Calm in the closet's solitude,
Calm in the bustling street,—

Calm in the hour of buoyant health,
Calm in the hour of pain,
Calm in my poverty or wealth,
Calm in my loss or gain,—

Calm in the sufferance of wrong,
Like Him who bore my shame,
Calm 'mid the threatening, taunting throng,
Who hate thy holy name.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm,
Soft resting on thy breast;
Soothe me with holy hymn and psalm,
And bid my spirit rest."

In all these circumstances, in every trial, we need this calm throughout our earthly lives. And by-and-by we shall go to rest, where peace shall ever flow; where sorrow shall never come; where grief shall never distract, and where our souls, tempted, and tossed, and tried by earth, shall find their REST; where we shall fully realize the blessedness of Jesus' words: "Ye shall find REST unto your souls."

For that rest my weary soul aspires with unuttered longings. For the realm of peace, the home of endless quietude, the abode of eternal security, the rest that remains for the people of God. To it, in Christ's name, I invite the troubled and the tempted, the sin-burdened and the lost, the weary and the heavy laden. O come to Christ, and have peace and rest, now and evermore. God grant that we may have that everlasting rest. Amen.

⁂ NOTE.—The above discourse, which, through the kindness of Mr. Woodward, I am enabled to present, is a very good report of what was preached; but as it was at the close of a somewhat laborious day, and as I was only able to speak about a half an hour, it does not contain more than half I would have said. Such as I have give I unto you. May God bless it to the good of some reader. H.

For the Crisis.

Hope and Despondency.

BY VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

DESPONDENCY.

Fain, fain would I sleep, where the storms 'round me breaking
Would pass by unheeded, where no grief could harm
The worn heart, that shrinks from a transient awaking—
A lone watcher still in this night of alarm.

HOPE.

But life has its blessings, its joy and its labor,
Rewards will be rich for the ones that endure;
God seals some fruit to each earnest endeavor,
And sweetens the bitterest cup for the poor.

DESPONDENCY.

Then I'll leave the strong and the hopeful to conquer,
No longer I'll linger to cumber the ground;
Temptations encompass me round without number,—
Let me rest in the grave till the trump shall sound.

HOPE.

God makes his saints to wax stronger in weakness,
Though fainting and sad, we can suffer his will;
The furnace will surely bring out the true likeness,
The hungry with good things He's promised to fill.

DESPONDENCY.

O! is there not love for the loving and true?
Far over death's river will there not be peace?
My sails are unfurl'd, I have no more to do,
And no strength to do it—I ask a release.

HOPE.

There's love, too, on earth, for the loving and true,
And many hearts fainting as weak as thine own;
Bear with them the burthen, there's more work to do,
And sunshine is needed this side of the tomb.

The flower that is nurtured will give back its beauty—
The bird that is fed will reward with its song;
And human hearts echo the music of pity,
That long have been silent 'mid suff'ring and wrong.

Lift the bruised stem from the foot that hath crushed it,
It may smile for thee when thine own hope is dim;
Thy frail bark may strand, with no kind star to guide it,
And thy love giv'n so freely, back, back thou shalt win.

For the Crisis.

Preparation for the Judgment.

Multiplied are the announcements from the Old and New Testaments that the great day of judgment will dawn ere long; and from present indications unfolded in Scripture prophecy soon be realized by the unsuspecting and Sodomitish nations of earth. The prophetic word, which makes this revelation, describes this day as not only great, but a day of the dissolving of all nature by fire and the summoning of all nations and tongues to the bar of God to appear in his august presence to answer for every idle word that they have spoken, when men abandoned to wickedness will cry for rocks and mountains to shelter them from the Omniscient, all-piercing Epiphany, and when every knee shall bow and tongue shall swear or confess to God. A day when there will be weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth, when husbands are separated from their wives, parents from their children. Neighbors and friends there must part forever; for the word declares that one shall be taken and the other left, whether on the house top, in the field, in the mill or bed. This will prove true the world over; the righteous will be taken and the wicked left. Oh! what a sensation will fill every human soul then, that is without God and hope in the world, as the righteous are taken away to stand on the sea of glass, with the harps of God, to sing the song of redemption through Christ their great deliverer. The supreme Judge of all the world will thoroughly canvass every thought, act and deed of man, every person's character will then pass in review before Him who sees not as man sees. Nothing will be hid from Him with whom we have to do. A perfect revelation of all the deceitfulness of the human heart will then and there be made manifest, and a righteous retribution awarded to each member of the human family.

Oh what a day! what an hour this! what decisions are there made either for weal or woe. This thought, so pregnant with interest, and so weighty in its considerations should arrest the attention of all men while in their telegraphic speed towards the open jaws of everlasting destruction, and silence should reign throughout the wide domain of earth for the space, at least, of half an hour, for sober reflection and self-examination, and no tempting Devil or demoniacal spirits should be unchained to cast deleterious influences before their minds, while seriously weighing so important events. God, Christ, Angels, yea, all heaven, would bend to such a scene and weep, if the family in heaven could weep; the bosom of heaven would be moved with compassion at such a crisis, and salvation, exaltation to immortal honors would be heralded forth upon every breeze and by the angelic host of heaven.

But the gentile kingdoms are too corrupt, too far gone into depravity to ever pause for a moment's serious reflection, consequently they will rush on regardless of consequences to the judgment, and there will meet the reward due their crimes,—to be cast into the lake of fire, or everlasting, unquenchable or eternal fire. This element is not a preservative one, but destructive in its nature; consequently the wicked, who are compared to chaff, stubble, dry branches, hay, wood, etc., will be burned up root and branch. This punishment is eternal. It will never be revoked. Truly a solemn thought!

And who are qualified to meet this trying hour, these judgment scenes? This is a question that should be pondered well, and answered in the light of that law which will either acquit or condemn us when God shall judge the secrets of men, by Jesus Christ. My brother, my sister, let me inquire, are you prepared for that eventful day? Have you the grace of God in your hearts? Are you conscious that your all is consecrated to God and that you love him above every earthly consideration? Have you the abiding demonstration in your soul that God loves you, and that your body is a fit temple for the Holy Ghost to dwell in? Do you carry with you in your daily deportment the marks of a crucified, but risen and soon coming Savior? Is the moral image of Jesus Christ stamped upon you, and do you wear it continually? Does the christian's narrow way to immortal honors grow brighter and brighter as you tread its sacred pathway? Are you heartily groaning and crying for complete victory over every darling sin, and for perfect purity before God? Do you often visit that lone spot where no human eye falls upon you, and there with uplifted hands, eyes and affections hold sweet converse with God through the mediation of Jesus Christ our divine Advocate? Do you love the prayer circle, and are you found there often heeding the injunction of the Apostle, "Exhorting one another and so much the more as you see the day approaching;" or are you conforming to the world by becoming intoxicated with its spirit, its popularity, its pride, its honors and undue conformity to its banquetings and social gatherings for worldly friendship and pleasurable enjoyments? In short, are you a Christian, a christian of Apostolic stamp?

May these questions be duly considered by every lover of practical godliness, and all earthly considerations dwindle into comparative insignificance before that heaven-born SYSTEM of eternal redemption wrought out for fallen man through the humiliation and exaltation of our Lord Jesus Christ. If any event either ancient or modern in heaven above or earth beneath should move the sensibilities of man to admire and adore, it is that ever precious, all absorbing and soul-elevating hope of salvation and immortal honors in the kingdom of God. May temptation in none of its complex forms ever rob us of that priceless boon.

Sinner, poor, precious, unsaved sinner, this treasure of salvation is for you. Come, oh come, and purchase it by exercising a living, active faith in the promises of God, and by complying with the conditions of the gospel of God's dear Son, while time is closing up; and before the angel proclaims "Time shall be no longer."

For the Crisis.

The Willful King.—Dan. 11: 36–45.

This prophecy has almost universally been supposed to refer to Popery; especially by the earlier writers on prophecy. Some later writers, however, have supposed Napoleon Ist to be the Willful King; Spain the King of the South; and Great Britain the King of the North, and all the events here recorded, to have been fulfilled during the wars of 1815. This is a manifest error, inasmuch as the prophet expressly says, that "he (the Willful King) shall prosper until the indignation be accomplished." Referring, no doubt, to the last end and consummation of God's indignation upon his people, the Jews. This cannot be true of Napoleon. He has long since fallen.

The Kings of the North and South must, also, be kings of countries lying to the North and South of Palestine; whereas Great Britain and Spain do not.

We think we find in this prophecy the main characteristics of Mahometanism. There are some minute points in it which we cannot understand, it is true; but the main points seem to refer so unmistakably to Mahometanism, that we do not hesitate to present it to the consideration of the reader. It is conceded that if this does not refer to Mahometanism, the prophet has failed to speak of this stupendous imposture, which is second only to Papacy in its influence on mankind. Now, it certainly does not seem reasonable, that, in a prophecy so extensive as this, covering the entire period from the days of the prophet to the consummation of all things, and one so minute too, mentioning even the lesser kings of Syria and Egypt, minutely describing all their wars; that so stupendous an affair as the Mahometan delusion should be omitted. Hence we are warranted, I think, in expecting the prophet to mention it. There is therefore, at least, every probability that we do not err in our exposition of this interesting portion of prophecy.

Mahomet was truly a man of an iron will. When we consider the difficulties which he had to surmount, the small means at his command in the beginning of the enterprise, the nature of the enterprise itself, and the many reverses he met with in the outset of his career; and then reflect that it was his own indomitable perseverance, his energetic determination to succeed, which ultimately gave him such astonishing success; we must acknowledge that, in this respect, at least, he most admirably accorded with the prophetic description "A king shall do according to his own will."

But the prophet further says that "he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every God," or ruler. This Mahomet did by the arrogant assumption of superiority over every created intelligence; as is evinced by the absurd fable of his journey to Heaven, the obeisance paid him there by Adam, Noah, Abraham and Moses, and all the shining host of saints and angels, the Omnipotent himself condescending to place his hand upon his head and bless him, and holding the most intimate and familiar converse with him, revealing to him the most profound secrets; and granting him the most extraordinary privileges and distinctions; such as that he should be the most perfect of creatures; that he should have the preeminence among the risen dead; be the redeemer of all who believe in him, etc. "God is God; and Mahomet is his Prophet," was his constant watch-word; implying thereby that he was his only prophet, and ignoring the claims of all who had preceded him or should come after him. Indeed, he explicitly affirmed that the object of his mission was, in part, to supply the defects of all previous systems, and thus to give a final and perfect system of ethics to man. So we see that in this respect also he agrees with the prophet.

"Neither shall he regard the god of his fathers," said the prophet. "His own people," says Goodrich, "were for the most part sunk in idolatry." Thus we see that Mahomet was originally a pagan; but his acquaintance with the Hebrew Scriptures and with the Christian religion, gave him a knowledge of the true God, and he no longer "regarded the god of his fathers," "but in his stead (margin) he honored the god of forces."

"He shall not regard the desire of women," is another feature of his character. This expression may mean, either the desire to possess women, or the object which women desire; or in general their wishes, desires, or preferences. We think it undoubtedly has the latter meaning here. In plain English, he made a slave of woman, regarding not her desires, preferences or wishes; but doing with her "according to his will." Evidently Mahometanism is, in this respect, most clearly pointed out.

Again, in the 39th verse, the prophet tells us that "he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain," or "for a price," as the margin reads. What land is here meant? most evidently the land of Palestine. What other land is denominated in the Scriptures, by way of eminence, "the Land?" "The Land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me."—Lev. 25 : 23. Now it is an historical fact that the Turks were the first and only power that parceled out the land of Palestine and sold it for a price. The Sultans divided "the Land" into provinces each of which was governed by a "Pacha," who bought the privilege of governing; often at an enormous price. And it frequently happened that a rival Pacha would offer the Sultan a still larger amount; when "his majesty" utterly regardless of the claims of justice, or even the "honor" which is supposed to be "among thieves," would immediately "oust" the occupant and install his successor; himself to be removed by a rival who could command more of the "needful" and was so disposed. The consequences to the wretched remnant of Jews who still clung to their land, may be easily foreseen. They were literally devoured. Their masters, themselves always insecure in their position, and not knowing how soon they might be removed, did not fail to resort to every means in their power for the accumulation of treasure; not unfrequently resorting to the shameless and open robbery of their wretched subjects. Truly did they then experience in all its terrible bitterness the words of Moses, "And thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy way; and thou shalt only be oppressed and spoiled evermore and no man shall save thee. . . Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof; thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face and shall not be restored to thee; thy sheep shall be given to thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them. . . The fruit of thy land, and all thy labors, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt only be oppressed and crushed alway." Deut 28: 29, 31, 33.

But, to return. The prophet further says, "And at the time of the end shall the king of the South push at him." Who is the King of the South? In the previous portion of this chapter, the "King of the North" and the "King of the South" are frequently mentioned, and in connection with events which can be interpreted of no other kings than those of Syria and Egypt. We conclude then that the Pacha of Egypt is here spoken of as the king of the South. The language of the prophet is certainly peculiar; "The king of the South shall push at him." Intimating that he shall make a demonstration, but from some cause shall not fully succeed. Accordingly we find that in 1839—40, the Pacha of Egypt made war on the Turks, and that too with such energy, determination and success, that if the powers of Europe had not interfered to prevent, he would have taken Constantinople, and subjected the entire empire. But this was reserved for another power. He was only to "push at him," not to overthrow him. In this war, however, the Ottoman supremacy, which had been waning since 1822, entirely disappeared; for in August 1840 he signed away his liberty to secure his political existence, and became dependent upon the Christian powers. He became the "sick man" of Europe, and dependent upon the doctors; and as is frequently the case, the doctors will yet be the death of him. History has verified prophecy up to the colon in the 40th verse; what next?

"The King of the North shall come against him like a whirlwind . . . and he shall enter into the countries and overflow and pass over." Evidently intimating that the "Willful King" should be completely overturned by the King of the North. But who is this King of the North? It is said that "he shall enter also into the glorious land. . . . He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries, and the land of Egypt shall not escape. . . . The Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. . . And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." Now compare this with the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel. "Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm."—Ezek. "The king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind."—Dan. "Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them."—Ezek. "The Libyans and Ethiopians shall be at his steps."—Dan. "And I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armor, even a great company with bucklers and shields; all of them handling swords."—Ezek. "With chariots and horsemen and many ships."—Dan. "And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel as a cloud to cover the land."—Ezek. "And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain."—Dan. "It shall be in the latter days."—Ezek. "At the time of the end."—Dan. "Thou shalt fall on the mountains of Israel."—Ezek. "Yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him."—Dan. "Surely in that day [illegible] . . . shall shake are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at my presence."—Ezek. "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time."—Dan.

It seems evident from the comparison of these prophecies, that the prophets both spake of the same events; that the prophetic eye rested upon the same characters, performing at the same time, the same action. Ezekiel speaks of some gigantic northern power that shall, in the "latter days," assemble an immense army and make war with great violence upon a southern neighbor; and afterwards an "evil thought" entering his mind, he shall go up to the "land of unwalled villages to take a spoil," and shall be there destroyed by the judgments of God.

Daniel, speaking of the same "King of the north," specifies the power against whom he shall war. That power is the "Willful King." But it is agreed without a dissenting voice, that the nation against whom "Gog," the king of the north makes war, is the Mahometan power of Europe. The evidence is therefore conclusive that the "Willful King" and the Mohametan power are identical. This shows our exact position on the great stream of time. The King of the South has pushed at him, and the King of the North is evidently marshaling his hosts and preparing to "come against him like a whirlwind."

Brethren, "Behold He cometh quickly." Suffer the admonition, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

For the Crisis.

A Desideratum.—No. 1.

BY P. B. M.

As a people, we need a better knowledge of things belonging to the church. That God has been with us, and in the most signal manner blessed the preaching of his truth, none can doubt who are familiar with the rise, and present position of the cause represented by American Adventism. Has it not been shown by statistical demonstration, that no cause of modern development has spread so largely, and taken so deep a hold of the popular mind—often including the most erudite—in so short a time, as has this cause? Doubtless this is owing, first, to the fact that the investigating, honest part of community are so readily made to see that the distinctive denominational features are really "the old paths"—"the faith once delivered to the saints." And to this, we may add the fact that a radical evangelicalism has usually characterized the preaching of doctrines. The consequence has been that wherever THE FAITH and HOPE of the gospel have been fairly set before a community, there has invariably arisen a company of Bible-loving people, to confess, and rejoice in the truth.

Among this people may be found men of various constitutional peculiarities, and of various minds; many from various churches and not a few from the world. Those from the various religious denominations have some of them a strong denominational bias; and others, joyful in finding a better knowledge of the Bible, forget, or may be, for a time, place in abeyance, old notions and give themselves to a Te Deum laudamus, exulting in the discovery of—to them—now, but precious and priceless truths. Some of them, although christians before, declare that the Bible seems, with their present light, like a new book to them;—and others hesitate not to say they verily believe they have been in Mystery Babylon.

But now comes a critical point. In leaving Babylon, is there a real necessity of going into anarchy? Whoever contends for the truth soberly, says no. Yet it is an easy matter for even the honest and earnest, to incidentally deviate from the golden mean so desirable. The consequence of which is, there must be a confession of our weakness and a retracing of wrong steps, or else an ultimate and radical wrong.

The writer distinctly remembers a congregation of this character, who, ignoring their past errors, undertook an effort for the truth of God, and erected a house of worship without a pulpit. As if to say, because the pulpit had been unduly magnified, and its minister unintentionally made like a Grand Lama, therefore it was best to put the pulpit out doors and "all be preachers." But the error very soon became apparent. It was seen there was a diversity of gifts in the body of Christ. That God had "set the members every one of them in the body, as it had pleased Him;" and that among them he hath set "thirdly, teachers." It was seen all could not teach—but those God had set to the work. And when there was a return of the ministry, there came back the place for that ministry,—a pulpit,—lecture or desk.

The question of right ordering and naming of congregations properly enough demanded attention from the people. Instead of being known as "Bands," it was found [illegible]

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 18, 1860.

Sectarian Theology.

In A. D. 1648, the British Parliament was so far influenced by Presbyterian members, that the following ordinance was passed, dated May 2nd. "That all persons who shall willingly maintain, publish or defend, by preaching or writing, the following heresies with obstinacy, shall, upon complaint, and proof, by the oaths of two witnesses, before two justices of the peace, or confession of the party, be committed to prison, without bail or mainprize, till the next jail delivery; and in case the indictment shall then be found, and the party upon his trial shall not abjure his said error, and his defence and maintainance of the same, he shall suffer the pains of death."

Some of "the heresies, or errors, are these following: That the Father is not God, that the Son is not God, that the Holy Ghost is not God, or that these three are not one eternal God; or, that Christ is not God equal with the Father."

"That the soul of man sleeps with the body."

"That the baptism of infants is unlawful and void; and, that such persons ought to be baptized again."—Neal's Puritan vol. ii, p. 80.

Had we lived then and there, the sentence of death would have been upon us, for the glorious truths now believed. Thank the Lord, that we can now preach the whole truth untrammeled by civil and church law.

It is evident that Parliament would not have passed a law against the sleep of the dead, unless a goodly number were believers, and agitating the subject. We see by this document how the truth has been smothered, and crushed out, while error has been established by law. It is rare that truth is ever popular enough to receive a public sanction.

"The Age of Corruption."

This is very properly called an "age of corruption." Facts show that we can put but little confidence in the honesty of our public men, who occupy prominent positions in the political and financial world. "Worse and worse," appears to be the leading feature of the programme for these last days. Thus the saying of the Apostle proves true. 2 Tim. 3 : 13. As the world will continue to grow more wicked to the end of time, we may well cry, like John upon the isle of Patmos, "Come, Lord Jesus." We can look for no improvement till he does come and set up his kingdom. Hence, we may well sing,

"Then hasten, Lord, hasten the glorious day,
When the saints shall possess thy kingdom, O Lord,
And thy will on earth be done."

Says a close observer of the signs of the times:—

"Various ages of the world have been characterized by some feature peculiar to them. There has been a golden age, a silver age, an age of iron, and an age of brass. There have been dark ages, and there has been an age of chivalry. The present age is, par excellence, the age of corruption. It reigns alike in the Old World and in the New. It prevails under every form of government—under the despotisms of Russia and Austria, as well as under the free government of England, the democratic institutions of the United States, and the South American republics. It compelled the Czar to bring to a speedy close the Crimean war. It had a fatal effect upon the Austrian arms in Italy."

This is, therefore, eminently an age of corruption, and it is common to all parties. . . . . Public virtue has become so rare a commodity that scarcely any man now-a-days gets credit for it; and its real possession proves the most serious bar to all offices of honor and emolument. The rapid progress of debauchery in the morals of politics, which is at the bottom of all our party contests for the public plunder, threatens the very existence of institutions which are the last experiment of philosophy for human liberty—the highest style of government ever given to the world."

O when will professed watchmen cease to cry "peace and safety," amid the greatest perils? Theirs is a fearful work. Were they faithful, many sleeping ones might be aroused, who are now resting in careless slumbers upon the brink of total destruction. All through the land, the syren song is sung, "The world is growing better." "Blind leaders of the blind" are trying to quiet the fears of those partially awakened, by telling them the temporal millennium, or conversion of the world, is about to begin. How can people believe and teach such a doctrine without one Bible promise to sustain their position? Reports from all parts of the world correspond with the following:

"The Paris correspondent of the Times says that crime is fearfully increasing in Paris, and that a frightful number of murders have been committed within the past few months."

The War in Syria.

Last week we referred to the bloody civil war in Syria, and will now give some particulars concerning this important movement. A correspondent from Beirut, Syria, June 6th, says:—

"Syria is now the scene of one of the most sanguinary conflicts ever enacted in this land, which has ever been the battle-field of the old world—and Mount Lebanon is now one vast funeral pile. Druses and Christians numbering hundreds of thousands, are now engaged in wholesale murder, arson, and pillage, in which fiendish work they are aided by Turks, Moslem Arabs, and the people known as the Metawalies."

The Druses are a singular sect, inhabiting portions of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and other parts of Syria and Palestine. Their principal seat is Kesroan, a district of Mount Lebanon. They are divided into two classes; the Djahals and Akkals. The first class is ignorant, without any definite religious sentiments.

The second class is noted for their secrecy in their religious ceremonies. It is said their nature has never been discovered. If any happen to witness any part of their religious service, who have not been initiated, they are immediately put to death. They live temperately, and are very rigid relative to their religion. The Druses are said to number about one hundred and twenty thousand.

Their religious sentiments appear to be a strange mixture of Heathenism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. They acknowledge seven lawgivers: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, and Said. They believe those seven lawgivers were inhabited by the same soul, which went from body to body. They consider Christ as a false Messiah. They have a low opinion of Mohammed and his followers.

They think that Hakem, whom they denominate "the Creator of heaven and earth," will return in the day of Judgment, which may be known as near, when the christians shall have subdued the Mohammedans. They profess to receive the Koran; but only for the purpose of screening themselves from the Mohammedans. The latter are uniting with them against the Greek and Catholic christians. The Maronite Greeks and Greek Catholics number about two hundred and fifty thousand, who are expecting aid from Europe against their enemies.

The correspondent from Beirut goes on to say:—

"From my window last week I counted from twenty to thirty burning villages upon the mountain a few miles from Beirut, from whence the flash of musketry may easily be seen, and the volleys heard one after another in rapid succession, as they echo through the valleys. The dying and dead are brought daily into the town in large numbers, and the widows and the orphans may be seen in great crowds weeping and wailing about the streets.

The barbarity of this war is truly shocking. Men, women, and children are overtaken while fleeing for refuge and without arms, and ruthlessly slaughtered while praying for quarter.

The Christians have thus far suffered most terribly. Their villages have been burned, their crops destroyed, and great numbers have been brutally murdered, while the Druses, who are better warriors and far more courageous, are assisted by the Turks, Moslems and Metawalies, and up to this time have proved successful.

This bloody war which is waged on both sides as a war of extermination, has its origin in religious and political causes. The Christians and Druses hate each other with a deadly hatred on account of the difference in their religious faith—and the Christians hate the Druses with a special hatred because the Druses are in a great many of the mountain christian districts feudal chiefs and rulers over the Christian or Maronite and Greek Catholic villages. The more immediate causes of the war may be traced to the bloody feuds existing between Druse and Christian tribes. Last summer at Bait Marri a quarrel arose, which threatened to precipitate a war in which the Maronite Christians were victorious, having repulsed the Druses killing forty or more while their own loss was less than one third of that number. Although peace was then declared, the Druses have since assassinated every Christian who came in their way, with an evident determination to make the number of the Maronite loss equal to that of the Druses. This aroused the Christians, and so exasperated them that they made an attack upon several Druse villages. At first they were successful, but relying upon their numbers, they neglected to appoint leaders or to form any plan for the campaign, consequently, the Druses rallied under their warrior chiefs and burned every Maronite and Greek Christian village within their reach. The provincial authorities pronounced the invading party—the Christians—to be rebels, and the Governor General proceeded with all his available force to the mountains, and brought his cannon to bear upon the Christians, checking them at every turn, while the Druses, aided by the soldiery, carried on their work of pillage and murder in a manner shameful even to a North American Indian."

They have not yet molested the missionaries any further than to break up their field of operation. Says the correspondent:—

"Great apprehension has been entertained by the Christian population of Beirut and all other Syrian cities, of a general Moslem insurrection, and all are now wearied with constant watching—every European and native Christian having slept upon his arms for nearly two weeks. . . . .

The immediate cause of this Moslem irruption may be found in the war raging around that place, between the Druses and Christians. Wherever the Druses were successful in the mountains back of Sidon, the Christian villagers would hastily gather their women and children and flee to the sea-coast for safety, leaving their homes to be burned and robbed by the enemy. On the first of June, it appears that several hundred Christians with their families and cattle fled to Sidon for refuge, whither they were pursued by the Druses. Their approach to the city caused the Moslems to raise the cry:—"The Christian dogs are coming to attack us! To arms! to arms! Moslems defend your homes!!" This cry, raised by a few designing ones, caused the Moslems to gather and close the gates of the town. Seeing this, the Christians threw down their arms near the city and surrendered to the Druses, who commenced the work of butchery.

Some of the Christians had gained admission, and upon making this discovery the Moslem women raised the alarm—and the poor unfortunates were soon slaughtered. The Moslems then went out and joined with the Druses in killing these defenceless people—among whom were many women and children. About twenty priests and several nuns were counted among the slain,—and from that time all Christian fugitives flying to Sidon for safety were not only shut out from the town, but ruthlessly killed by the Moslems from within. The Christians now hide in the caves and among the tombs, but they are soon found and slain. . . . .

Information is daily received of fresh cases of the most horrible butchery of native Christians, and it would seem as if the Druses and Moslems were leagued to exterminate them, root and branch.

This morning we learn of a large number of peasantry having been induced to return to their villages, where they were all killed in cold blood—and of the murder of five Ecclesiastics of the Latin Church, who were shot down near the walls of Sidon.

The success of the Druses has undoubtedly stirred up all the Moslem hostility to Christians, and a general insurrection seems to be trembling in the balance. The presence of a Russian frigate of thirty guns gives a feeling of security to the Frank population of Beirut, and the expected arrival of a French fleet is generally hailed with delight.

What political motive sends so many vessels of war to Syria just at this time is not fully known, though it may be easily conjectured—but it is considered by every one as providential!

The Consuls General have been holding daily consultations to devise ways and means for the protection of the Christians, and each one has written to his national fleet for vessels of war, as the only means of restraining the Moslems in their present excited state.

It is believed that this state of things will hasten the end of the "sick man;"—indeed the French Consul General declares that this is the end of the Ottoman Empire! If this be so the Moslems will undoubtedly try to die "game," and the Christian population is beginning to quake with fear as the time approaches, dreading a general insurrection."

"Behold I Come as a Thief."

It is astonishing to see the indifference concerning the coming of Christ, among his professed followers. One thing is certain, they do not love his appearing, for, if they did, they would be interested in all the evidences of his approach. But there is no "crown of righteousness" promised to any but those who are longing to see him. Says Paul, "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."—2 Tim. 4 : 8.

We think every real christian loves the appearing of Christ. This is a good thermometer by which to test ourselves. If we find we are becoming less interested in the coming of Jesus, we may be sure that we are losing ground in divine life, and preparing ourselves to have him come upon us as a thief.

Dear reader, do you love the appearing of our Savior? We imagine we hear the answer, "I hope I do." Suppose we should inquire, Do you love your child? Would you say, "I HOPE I do?" We should expect a prompt hearty yes, that would not leave room for doubt.

Is it possible that we compose a part of the bride of the Lamb, and do not long for the appearing of the Bridegroom? Who would choose such a bride?

We can easily decide whether we love the appearing of our Redeemer; for if we do, we shall be anxious to know all the evidences of his coming, and shall rejoice at any new tokens of his approach; if otherwise, we may be sure that all is not right,—we are not ready to see him; and may expect he will come upon us as a thief, for our destruction.

If we are not ready to meet the coming Bridegroom, we have no time to lose in idle pursuits, in folly's ways; but should commence at once a most rigid and heart-searching examination, to find in what corner the enemy is concealed. If we are living so far from the Lord, as not to love his appearing, we must expect that his coming will be as a thief to us, and we shall be as the "Speechless Guest," having on no wedding garment. The decisive day is at hand. It is high time to awake out of sleep. Jesus instructs us to "Watch . . . lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all watch."

We are most certainly living in the time, when the signs of Christ's speedy coming should awaken a strict watchfulness in the minds of all his followers. We peril our hope of eternal life, to sleep now.

Says an intelligent English minister:

"We can only conclude, that the nearer we are to the 'drying up' of the Turkish Euphrates, the nearer we must be to the 'coming as a thief;' and that the 'drying up' of the Turkish Euphrates seems now to be fully determined on, and likely to happen within a very short time. . . . The Lord will come in the darkest hour of worldly infatuation,—in the dead hour of the most deadly sleep which has ever closed upon the world,—when men are dreaming of prosperity and peace, muttering—like those who talk in their sleep—incoherent nonsense of progress, and education, and luxury, and sensuality. The world is asleep; and it speaks through the tongue of its philosophers the incoherent nonsense of an age devoted to destruction.

It is remarkable that the principal charge against the Jews was founded upon their indifference to this very point. They cared nothing for the advent of the Lord; they felt no desire for his PERSONAL presence. Therefore their house was 'left unto them desolate.' Strange it is, that while we are so ready to condemn the Jews, we ourselves are more guilty even than they. They had but the Old Testament Scripture,—we have both the Old and New. And yet the PERSONAL presence of the Lord is as much forgotten, despised, and hated, among christians as it ever was among Scribes and Pharisees,—hypocrites! . . .

Like so many rebels who are enemies to each other, but more bitter enemies to their King, the various sects of christianity agree in one point alone, and that is—hatred of the kingdom of Christ. The only revolution that is entirely sinless—the only remedy that extends to all the fibres of creation—the only restitution that brings all things back to the original point, when 'God saw all that he had made, and behold it was VERY GOOD'—this change, this remedy, this restitution—is hated more by christendom than the darkest heresy! . . . .

'Woe unto me! The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously; yea, the treacherous dealers have dealt very treacherously.' The treacherous dealers are the gospel ministers who have suppressed the solemn truth of the 'appearing and kingdom,' and have set up their own feeble voice in place of the thunders of the Messiah. . . . .

We seem, therefore, to have now arrived at a direct crisis—a movement in which we may hear, at any time, the cry of 'Behold, I come.' We need wait for no event to happen, for no signal to be given, for no more delay,—but may at any time be exposed to the 'coming of the thief.'"

VOICE OF THE PROPHETS.—We have received the second number of this paper. The following contents seem to prove a good number: 1. The World is rapidly approaching another great epoch. 2. The grand historic period; or the 6000 years. 3. Traditional and Scriptural evidence. 4. Not the world's conversion! but the coming of the Son of Man—The Rabbi and the Missionary. 5. Another "Letter from Abroad."

It will be recollected that, some time since, we published "A letter from abroad." It was from a very intelligent young man, Editor of the State Sentinel, in California, who, we think, ought to have left all and followed Jesus, preaching his word, at the time of his conversion. Instead of being baptized, as instructed in the Scriptures, he avoided that cross, and backslid.

Many of our readers were deeply interested in his case, and will be glad to hear from him again. His letter was not intended for publication, but we hope to be excused for giving something encouraging from him. He belongs to one of the first families in the State of Massachusetts. Pray for him, that he may help sound the last alarm to a guilty world. The letter follows:

MY DEAR FRIEND:—I should be ashamed on telling you, if indeed I could remember, the number of times I have been 'on the point' of writing to you. I am actually set for the business and pleasure now, however, and let failures be forgiven.

In the first place, let me thank you heartily for your kindness and liberality in furnishing me with the Crisis, since I have resided in this State. I think it has not been an act of waste on your part, as it certainly has been of infinite profit to your friend. You can judge of my appreciation of its worth when I inform you that in the midst of duties of the most arduous and exacting nature, I have not failed to read it entirely through, as soon as possible after its reception. I devoured its pages with more avidity than I could experience in the approach and discussion of a finely provided table of food, when fasting had provoked the alimentative organ to its greatest capacity for hungering. I looked out from the world of frivolity and money-chase which surrounded me, and felt at least an exquisite relish, if not a God-like sympathy with the contributors of your Journal for its words of sound doctrine and love.

You are probably aware that T. Starr King has recently come among us, and, of course, he is drawing great crowds. He circulated his two famous Unitarian sermons in reply to Dr. Huntington, and met with a strong reply from Mr. ——, pastor of —— Church in this city. In a correspondence which I conduct with a paper in the interior, I had occasion to notice the little indirect controversy; expressing a modest opinion to the effect that both parties were wrong. The pastor, whom I have long known as a thoroughly conscientious and a deeply learned man, suspecting the authorship of the criticism, questioned me concerning my umpire opinion. Upon this a discussion arose, such as I conceive terminated in his becoming awfully bothered. A few sundays since, he preached on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, making the false interpretation, of course. He held that the rich man, between the grave and the resurrection, was experiencing the effect of sin in its natural tendency. In other words, he contended that all men in gain," or "for a price," as the margin reads. What land is here meant? most evidently the land of Palestine. What other land is denominated in the Scriptures, by way of eminence, "the Land?" "The Land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me."—Lev. 25: 23. Now it is an historical fact that the Turks were the first and only power that parceled out the land of Palestine and sold it for a price. The Sultans divided "the Land" into provinces each of which was governed by a "Pacha," who bought the privilege of governing; often at an enormous price. And it frequently happened that a rival Pacha would offer the Sultan a still larger amount; when "his majesty" utterly regardless of the claims of justice, or even the "honor" which is supposed to be "among thieves," would immediately "oust" the occupant and install his successor; himself to be removed by a rival who could command more of the "needful" and was so disposed. The consequences to the wretched remnant of Jews who still clung to their land, may be easily foreseen. They were literally devoured. Their masters, themselves always insecure in their position, and not knowing how soon they might be removed, did not fail to resort to every means in their power for the accumulation of treasure; not unfrequently resorting to the shameless and open robbery of their wretched subjects. Truly did they then experience in all its terrible bitterness the words of Moses, "And thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy way; and thou shalt only be oppressed and spoiled evermore and no man shall save thee. . . Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof; thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face and shall not be restored to thee; thy sheep shall be given to thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them. . . The fruit of thy land, and all thy labors, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt only be oppressed and crushed alway." Deut 28: 29, 31, 33.

But, to return. The prophet further says, "And at the time of the end shall the king of the South push at him." Who is the King of the South? In the previous portion of this chapter, the "King of the North" and the "King of the South" are frequently mentioned, and in connection with events which can be interpreted of no other kings than those of Syria and Egypt. We conclude then that the Pacha of Egypt is here spoken of as the king of the South. The language of the prophet is certainly peculiar; "The king of the South shall push at him." Intimating that he shall make a demonstration, but from some cause shall not fully succeed. Accordingly we find that in 1839—40, the Pacha of Egypt made war on the Turks, and that too with such energy, determination and success, that if the powers of Europe had not interfered to prevent, he would have taken Constantinople, and subjected the entire empire. But this was reserved for another power. He was only to "push at him," not to overthrow him. In this war, however, the Ottoman supremacy, which had been waning since 1822, entirely disappeared; for in August 1840 he signed away his liberty to secure his political existence, and became dependent upon the Christian powers. He became the "sick man" of Europe, and dependent upon the doctors; and as is frequently the case, the doctors will yet be the death of him. History has verified prophecy up to the colon in the 40th verse; what next?

"The King of the North shall come against him like a whirlwind . . . and he shall enter into the countries and overflow and pass over." Evidently intimating that the "Willful King" should be completely overturned by the King of the North. But who is this King of the North? It is said that "he shall enter also into the glorious land. . . . He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries, and the land of Egypt shall not escape. . . . The Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. . . And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." Now compare this with the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel. "Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm."—Ezek. "The king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind."—Dan. "Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them."—Ezek. "The Libyans and Ethiopians shall be at his steps."—Dan. "And I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armor, even a great company with bucklers and shields; all of them handling swords."—Ezek. "With chariots and horsemen and many ships."—Dan. "And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel as a cloud to cover the land."—Ezek. "And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain."—Dan. "It shall be in the latter days."—Ezek. "At the time of the end."—Dan. "Thou shalt fall on the mountains of Israel."—Ezek. "Yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him."—Dan. "Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel; so that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at my presence."—Ezek. "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time."—Dan.

It seems evident from the comparison of these prophecies, that the prophets both spake of the same events; that the prophetic eye rested upon the same characters, performing at the same time, the same action. Ezekiel speaks of some gigantic northern power that shall, in the "latter days," assemble an immense army and make war with great violence upon a southern neighbor; and afterwards an "evil thought" entering his mind, he shall go up to the "land of unwalled villages to take a spoil," and shall be there destroyed by the judgments of God.

Daniel, speaking of the same "King of the north," specifies the power against whom he shall war. That power is the "Willful King." But it is agreed without a dissenting voice, that the nation against whom "Gog," the king of the north makes war, is the Mahometan power of Europe. The evidence is therefore conclusive that the "Willful King" and the Mohametan power are identical. This shows our exact position on the great stream of time. The King of the South has pushed at him, and the King of the North is evidently marshaling his hosts and preparing to "come against him like a whirlwind."

Brethren, "Behold He cometh quickly." Suffer the admonition, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

For the Crisis.

A Desideratum.—No. 1.

BY P. B. M.

As a people, we need a better knowledge of things belonging to the church. That God has been with us, and in the most signal manner blessed the preaching of his truth, none can doubt who are familiar with the rise, and present position of the cause represented by American Adventism. Has it not been shown by statistical demonstration, that no cause of modern development has spread so largely, and taken so deep a hold of the popular mind—often including the most erudite—in so short a time, as has this cause? Doubtless this is owing, first, to the fact that the investigating, honest part of community are so readily made to see that the distinctive denominational features are really "the old paths"—"the faith once delivered to the saints." And to this, we may add the fact that a radical evangelicalism has usually characterized the preaching of doctrines. The consequence has been that wherever THE FAITH and HOPE of the gospel have been fairly set before a community, there has invariably arisen a company of Bible-loving people, to confess, and rejoice in the truth.

Among this people may be found men of various constitutional peculiarities, and of various minds; many from various churches and not a few from the world. Those from the various religious denominations have some of them a strong denominational bias; and others, joyful in finding a better knowledge of the Bible, forget, or may be, for a time, place in abeyance, old notions and give themselves to a Te Deum laudamus, exulting in the discovery of—to them—new, but precious and priceless truths. Some of them, although christians before, declare that the Bible seems, with their present light, like a new book to them;—and others hesitate not to say they verily believe they have been in Mystery Babylon.

But now comes a critical point. In leaving Babylon, is there a real necessity of going into anarchy? Whoever contends for the truth soberly, says no. Yet it is an easy matter for even the honest and earnest, to incidentally deviate from the golden mean so desirable. The consequence of which is, there must be a confession of our weakness and a retracing of wrong steps, or else an ultimate and radical wrong.

The writer distinctly remembers a congregation of this character, who, ignoring their past errors, undertook an effort for the truth of God, and erected a house of worship without a pulpit. As if to say, because the pulpit had been unduly magnified, and its minister unintentionally made like a Grand Lama, therefore it was best to put the pulpit out doors and "all be preachers." But the error very soon became apparent. It was seen there was a diversity of gifts in the body of Christ. That God had "set the members every one of them in the body, as it had pleased Him;" and that among them he hath set "thirdly, teachers." It was seen all could not teach—but those God had set to the work. And when there was a return of the ministry, there came back the place for that ministry,—a pulpit,—lecturn or desk.

The question of right ordering and naming of congregations properly enough demanded attention from the people. Instead of being known as "Bands," it was found the Scriptures recognized all rightly ordered congregations as "Churches." And instead of leaving the specific work of the church to be done by anybody, it was found best 'all things should be done decently and in order.'

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 18, 1860.

Sectarian Theology.

In A. D. 1648, the British Parliament was so far influenced by Presbyterian members, that the following ordinance was passed, dated May 2nd. "That all persons who shall willingly maintain, publish or defend, by preaching or writing, the following heresies with obstinacy, shall, upon complaint, and proof, by the oaths of two witnesses, before two justices of the peace, or confession of the party, be committed to prison, without bail or mainprise, till the next jail delivery; and in case the indictment shall then be found, and the party upon his trial shall not abjure his said error, and his defence and maintainance of the same, he shall suffer the pains of death."

Some of "the heresies, or errors, are these following: That the Father is not God, that the Son is not God, that the Holy Ghost is not God, or that these three are not one eternal God; or, that Christ is not God equal with the Father."

"That the soul of man sleeps with the body."

"That the baptism of infants is unlawful and void; and that such persons ought to be baptized again."—Neal's Puritan vol. ii, p. 80.

Had we lived then and there, the sentence of death would have been upon us, for the glorious truths now believed. Thank the Lord, that we can now preach the whole truth untrammeled by civil and church law.

It is evident that Parliament would not have passed a law against the sleep of the dead, unless a goodly number were believers, and agitating the subject. We see by this document how the truth has been smothered, and crushed out, while error has been established by law. It is rare that truth is ever popular enough to receive a public sanction.

"The Age of Corruption."

This is very properly called an "age of corruption." Facts show that we can put but little confidence in the honesty of our public men, who occupy prominent positions in the political and financial world. "Worse and worse," appears to be the leading feature of the programme for these last days. Thus the saying of the Apostle proves true. 2 Tim. 3: 13. As the world will continue to grow more wicked to the end of time, we may well cry, like John upon the isle of Patmos, "Come, Lord Jesus." We can look for no improvement till he does come and set up his kingdom. Hence, we may well sing,

"Then hasten, Lord, hasten the glorious day,
When the saints shall possess thy kingdom, O Lord,
And thy will on earth be done."

Says a close observer of the signs of the times:—

"Various ages of the world have been characterized by some feature peculiar to them. There has been a golden age, a silver age, an age of iron, and an age of brass. There have been dark ages, and there has been an age of chivalry. The present age is, par excellence, the age of corruption. It reigns alike in the Old World and in the New. It prevails under every form of government—under the despotisms of Russia and Austria, as well as under the free government of England, the democratic institutions of the United States, and the South American republics. It compelled the Czar to bring to a speedy close the Crimean war. It had a fatal effect upon the Austrian arms in Italy."

This is, therefore, eminently an age of corruption, and it is common to all parties. . . . . Public virtue has become so rare a commodity that scarcely any man now-a-days gets credit for it; and its real possession proves the most serious bar to all offices of honor and emolument. The rapid progress of debauchery in the morals of politics, which is at the bottom of all our party contests for the public plunder, threatens the very existence of institutions which are the last experiment of philosophy for human liberty—the highest style of government ever given to the world."

O when will professed watchmen cease to cry "peace and safety," amid the greatest perils? Theirs is a fearful work. Were they faithful, many sleeping ones might be aroused, who are now resting in careless slumbers upon the brink of total destruction. All through the land, the syren song is sung, "The world is growing better." "Blind leaders of the blind" are trying to quiet the fears of those partially awakened, by telling them the temporal millennium, or conversion of the world, is about to begin. How can people believe and teach such a doctrine without one Bible promise to sustain their position? Reports from all parts of the world correspond with the following:

"The Paris correspondent of the Times says that crime is fearfully increasing in Paris, and that a frightful number of murders have been committed within the past few months."

The War in Syria.

Last week we referred to the bloody civil war in Syria, and will now give some particulars concerning this important movement. A correspondent from Beirut, Syria, June 6th, says:—

"Syria is now the scene of one of the most sanguinary conflicts ever enacted in this land, which has been often the battle-field of the old world—and Mount Lebanon is now one vast funeral pile. Druses and Christians, numbering hundreds of thousands, are now engaged in wholesale murder, arson, and pillage, in which fiendish work they are aided by Turks, Moslem Arabs, and the people known as the Metawalies."

The Druses are a singular sect, inhabiting portions of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and other parts of Syria and Palestine. Their principal seat is Kesroan, a district of Mount Lebanon. They are divided into two classes; the Djahals and Akkals. The first class is ignorant, without any definite religious sentiments.

The second class is noted for their secrecy in their religious ceremonies. It is said their nature has never been discovered. If any happen to witness any part of their religious service, who have not been initiated, they are immediately put to death. They live temperately, and are very rigid relative to their religion. The Druses are said to number about one hundred and twenty thousand.

Their religious sentiments appear to be a strange mixture of Heathenism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. They acknowledge seven lawgivers: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, and Said. They believe those seven lawgivers were inhabited by the same soul, which went from body to body. They consider Christ as a false Messiah. They have a low opinion of Mohammed and his followers.

They think that Hakem, whom they denominate "the Creator of heaven and earth," will return in the day of Judgment, which may be known as near, when the christians shall have subdued the Mohammedans. They profess to receive the Koran; but only for the purpose of screening themselves from the Mohammedans. The latter are uniting with them against the Greek and Catholic christians. The Maronite Greeks and Greek Catholics number about two hundred and fifty thousand, who are expecting aid from Europe against their enemies.

The correspondent from Beirut goes on to say:—

"From my window last week I counted from twenty to thirty burning villages upon the mountain a few miles from Beirut, from whence the flash of musketry may easily be seen, and the volleys heard one after another in rapid succession, as they echo through the valleys. The dying and dead are brought daily into the town in large numbers, and the widows and the orphans may be seen in great crowds weeping and wailing about the streets.

The barbarity of this war is truly shocking. Men, women, and children are overtaken while fleeing for refuge and without arms, and ruthlessly slaughtered while praying for quarter.

The Christians have thus far suffered most terribly. Their villages have been burned, their crops destroyed, and great numbers have been brutally murdered, while the Druses, who are better warriors and far more courageous, are assisted by the Turks, Moslems and Metawalies, and up to this time have proved successful.

This bloody war which is waged on both sides as a war of extermination, has its origin in religious and political causes. The Christians and Druses hate each other with a deadly hatred on account of the difference in their religious faith—and the Christians hate the Druses with a special hatred because the Druses are in a great many of the mountain christian districts feudal chiefs and rulers over the Christian or Maronite and Greek Catholic villages. The more immediate causes of the war may be traced to the bloody feuds existing between Druse and Christian tribes. Last summer at Bait Marri a quarrel arose, which threatened to precipitate a war in which the Maronite Christians were victorious, having repulsed the Druses killing forty or more while their own loss was less than one third of that number. Although peace was then declared, the Druses have since assassinated every Christian who came in their way, with an evident determination to make the number of the Maronite loss equal to that of the Druses. This aroused the Christians, and so exasperated them that they made an attack upon several Druse villages. At first they were successful, but relying upon their numbers, they neglected to appoint leaders or to form any plan for the campaign, consequently, the Druses rallied under their warrior chiefs and burned every Maronite and Greek Christian village within their reach. The provincial authorities pronounced the invading party—the Christians—to be rebels, and the Governor General proceeded with all his available force to the mountains, and brought his cannon to bear upon the Christians, checking them at every turn, while the Druses, aided by the soldiery, carried on their work of pillage and murder in a manner shameful even to a North American Indian."

They have not yet molested the missionaries any further than to break up their field of operation. Says the correspondent:—

"Great apprehension has been entertained by the Christian population of Beirut and all other Syrian cities, of a general Moslem insurrection, and all are now wearied with constant watching—every European and native Christian having slept upon his arms for nearly two weeks. . . .

The immediate cause of this Moslem irruption may be found in the war raging around that place, between the Druses and Christians. Wherever the Druses were successful in the mountains back of Sidon, the Christian villagers would hastily gather their women and children and flee to the sea-coast for safety, leaving their homes to be burned and robbed by the enemy. On the first of June, it appears that several hundred Christians with their families and cattle fled to Sidon for refuge, whither they were pursued by the Druses. Their approach to the city caused the Moslems to raise the cry:—'The Christian dogs are coming to attack us! To arms! to arms! Moslems defend your homes!!' This cry, raised by a few designing ones, caused the Moslems to gather and close the gates of the town. Seeing this, the Christians threw down their arms near the city and surrendered to the Druses, who commenced the work of butchery.

Some of the Christians had gained admission, and upon making this discovery the Moslem women raised the alarm—and the poor unfortunates were soon slaughtered. The Moslems then went out and joined with the Druses in killing these defenceless people—among whom were many women and children. About twenty priests and several nuns were counted among the slain,—and from that time all Christian fugitives flying to Sidon for safety were not only shut out from the town, but ruthlessly killed by the Moslems from within. The Christians now hide in the caves and among the tombs, but they are soon found and slain. . . . .

Information is daily received of fresh cases of the most horrible butchery of native Christians, and it would seem as if the Druses and Moslems were leagued to exterminate them, root and branch.

This morning we learn of a large number of peasantry having been induced to return to their villages, where they were all killed in cold blood—and of the murder of five Ecclesiastics of the Latin Church, who were shot down near the walls of Sidon.

The success of the Druses has undoubtedly stirred up all the Moslem hostility to Christians, and a general insurrection seems to be trembling in the balance. The presence of a Russian frigate of thirty guns gives a feeling of security to the Frank population of Beirut, and the expected arrival of a French fleet is generally hailed with delight.

What political motive sends so many vessels of war to Syria just at this time is not fully known, though it may be easily conjectured—but it is considered by every one as providential!

The Consuls General have been holding daily consultations to devise ways and means for the protection of the Christians, and each one has written to his national fleet for vessels of war, as the only means of restraining the Moslems in their present excited state.

It is believed that this state of things will hasten the end of the "sick man;"—indeed the French Consul General declares that this is the end of the Ottoman Empire! If this be so the Moslems will undoubtedly try to die "game," and the Christian population is beginning to quake with fear as the time approaches, dreading a general insurrection."

"Behold I Come as a Thief."

It is astonishing to see the indifference concerning the coming of Christ, among his professed followers. One thing is certain, they do not love his appearing, for, if they did, they would be interested in all the evidences of his approach. But there is no "crown of righteousness" promised to any but those who are longing to see him. Says Paul, "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."—2 Tim. 4: 8.

We think every real christian loves the appearing of Christ. This is a good thermometer by which to test ourselves. If we find we are becoming less interested in the coming of Jesus, we may be sure that we are losing ground in divine life, and preparing ourselves to have him come upon us as a thief.

Dear reader, do you love the appearing of our Savior? We imagine we hear the answer, "I hope I do." Suppose we should inquire, Do you love your child? Would you say, "I HOPE I do?" We should expect a prompt hearty yes, that would not leave room for doubt.

Is it possible that we compose a part of the bride of the Lamb, and do not long for the appearing of the Bridegroom? Who would choose such a bride?

We can easily decide whether we love the appearing of our Redeemer; for if we do, we shall be anxious to know all the evidences of his coming, and shall rejoice at any new tokens of his approach; if otherwise, we may be sure that all is not right,—we are not ready to see him; and may expect he will come upon us as a thief, for our destruction.

If we are not ready to meet the coming Bridegroom, we have no time to lose in idle pursuits, in folly's ways; but should commence at once a most rigid and heart-searching examination, to find in what corner the enemy is concealed. If we are living so far from the Lord, as not to love his appearing, we must expect that his coming will be as a thief to us, and we shall be as the "Speechless Guest," having on no wedding garment. The decisive day is at hand. It is high time to awake out of sleep. Jesus instructs us to "Watch . . . lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all watch."

We are most certainly living in the time, when the signs of Christ's speedy coming should awaken a strict watchfulness in the minds of all his followers. We peril our hope of eternal life, to sleep now.

Says an intelligent English minister:

"We can only conclude, that the nearer we are to the 'drying up' of the Turkish Euphrates, the nearer we must be to the 'coming as a thief;' and that the 'drying up' of the Turkish Euphrates seems now to be fully determined on, and likely to happen within a very short time. . . . The Lord will come in the darkest hour of worldly infatuation,—in the dead hour of the most deadly sleep which has ever closed upon the world,—when men are dreaming of prosperity and peace, muttering—like those who talk in their sleep—incoherent nonsense of progress, and education, and luxury, and sensuality. The world is asleep; and it speaks through the tongues of its philosophers the incoherent nonsense of an age devoted to destruction. . . .

It is remarkable that the principal charge against the Jews was founded upon their indifference to this very point. They cared nothing for the advent of the Lord; they felt no desire for his personal presence. Therefore their house was 'left unto them desolate.' Strange it is, that while we are so ready to condemn the Jews, we ourselves are more guilty even than they. They had but the Old Testament Scripture,—we have both the Old and New. And yet the PERSONAL presence of the Lord is as much forgotten, despised, and hated, among christians as it ever was among Scribes and Pharisees,—hypocrites! . . .

Like so many rebels who are enemies to each other, but more bitter enemies to their King, the various sects of christianity agree in one point alone, and that is—hatred of the kingdom of Christ. The only revolution that is entirely sinless—the only remedy that extends to all the fibres of creation—the only restitution that brings all things back to the original point, when 'God saw all that he had made, and behold it was VERY GOOD'—this change, this remedy, this restitution—is hated more by christendom than the darkest heresy! . . . .

'Woe unto me! The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously; yea, the treacherous dealers have dealt very treacherously.' The treacherous dealers are the gospel ministers who have suppressed the solemn truth of the 'appearing and kingdom,' and have set up their own feeble voice in place of the thunders of the Messiah. . . . .

We seem, therefore, to have now arrived at a direct crisis—a movement in which we may hear, at any time, the cry of 'Behold, I come.' We need wait for no event to happen, for no signal to be given, for no more delay,—but may at any time be exposed to the 'coming of the thief.'"

VOICE OF THE PROPHETS.—We have received the second number of this paper. The following contents seem to prove a good number: 1. The World is rapidly approaching another great epoch. 2. The grand historic period; or the 6000 years. 3. Traditional and Scriptural evidence. 4. Not the world's conversion! but the coming of the Son of Man—The Rabbi and the Missionary. 5. Table of Sacred Chronology, of the 6000 years. 6. Glorious Lot. 7. A Prophecy of the Last Times. 8. Shimeall's Chronology. 9. English Correspondence. 10. The Table of Sacred Chronology. 11. Notices. 12. Advertisements of Books, etc. 13. To all who look for speedy Redemption.

Let all read and judge for themselves of its merits.

Another "Letter from Abroad."

It will be recollected that, some time since, we published "A letter from abroad." It was from a very intelligent young man, Editor of the State Sentinel, in California, who, we think, ought to have left all and followed Jesus, preaching his word, at the time of his conversion. Instead of being baptized, as instructed in the Scriptures, he avoided that cross, and backslid.

Many of our readers were deeply interested in his case, and will be glad to hear from him again. His letter was not intended for publication, but we hope to be excused for giving something encouraging from him. He belongs to one of the first families in the State of Massachusetts. Pray for him, that he may help sound the last alarm to a guilty world. The letter follows:

MY DEAR FRIEND:—I should be shamed on telling you, if indeed I could remember, the number of times I have been 'on the point' of writing to you. I am actually set for the business and pleasure now, however, and let failures be forgiven.

In the first place, let me thank you heartily for your kindness and liberality in furnishing me with the Crisis, since I have resided in this State. I think it has not been an act of waste on your part, as it certainly has been of infinite profit to your friend. You can judge of my appreciation of its worth when I inform you that in the midst of duties of the most arduous and exacting nature, I have not failed to read it entirely through, as soon as possible after its reception. I devoured its pages with more avidity than I could experience in the approach and discussion of a finely provided table of food, when fasting had provoked the alimentative organ to its greatest capacity for hungering. I looked out from the world of frivolity and money-chase which surrounded me, and felt at least an exquisite relish, if not a God-like sympathy with the contributors of your Journal for its words of sound doctrine and love.

You are probably aware that T. Starr King has recently come among us, and, of course, he is drawing great crowds. He circulated his two famous Unitarian sermons in reply to Dr. Huntington, and met with a strong reply from Mr. ——, pastor of —— Church in this city. In a correspondence which I conduct with a paper in the interior, I had occasion to notice the little indirect controversy; expressing a modest opinion to the effect that both parties were wrong. The pastor, whom I have long known as a thoroughly conscientious and a deeply learned man, suspecting the authorship of the criticism, questioned me concerning my umpire opinion. Upon this a discussion arose, such as I conceive terminated in his becoming awfully bothered. A few sundays since, he preached on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, making the false interpretation, of course. He held that the rich man, between the grave and the resurrection, was experiencing the effect of sin in its natural tendency. In other words, he contended that all men in this life are kept from the condition of devils by the redeeming power of Christ; that after death and before the resurrection we experience, if we die in sin, the full consequence of sin! Meeting him in the street a day or two subsequent to the delivery of this discourse, I told him that I did'nt believe a word that he said. We argued the matter for about an hour, standing in front of Montgomery Block. This time my good friend was not only bothered but astonished. He wanted to know how I came to have so much scripture at my tongue's end. He was sure that he could go to his study and, on reviewing all the passages I quoted, be able to completely demolish me in the argument. To this I replied in substance, that I did not lay claim to any great familiarity with Scripture, but that I had been drawn to the memorizing of certain fitting texts, on the subject mooted, from my acquaintance and fellowship with a clever set of fellows, called Adventists. As for your demolishing me, that's very easy, no doubt; but, Mr. ——, you'll not find any word of inspiration in your study by which you can demolish Scripture.

To-day I have received four numbers of the Crisis with J. Howell's capital argument on this very subject. I wish I had your tracts on the parable; I think that, by their aid, I might redeem my minister! As it is, I hope for his conversion to the truth, his disentanglement from the corrupting lie of the Druids which the ignorant churchman engrafted on the christian tree.

I believe that I have told you now nearly all the missionary work that I have done since I have been in California. Nothing at all. I hesitate somewhat in telling you of my own spiritual condition. It is an old monotonous story. I am called in mind even more frequently than I have ever been before, and I feel more and more impressed with a sense of the fact that your people have the gospel truth.—When I came to Cal., I postponed my purpose of joining you in your labors until I should have acquired enough of this world's goods to enable me to live and work independent of all. Now that I have about obtained that competency, the Lord seems to demand the fulfillment of the tardy vow. What a merciful God, thus to have prolonged his blessed invitation to a person like me! But I will write you soon, again, concerning this.

I think I could make good use of a package of tracts, and any that you may feel disposed to forward, I will distribute with care. It is Saturday night. I have resolves for a glorious beginning to-morrow. Pray for me, that I may come out boldly and stand firm. Peace eternal be with you. Truly yours in Christ. Farewell.

For the Crisis.

Inquiry Answered.

Bro. Durgin wishes to know how I can harmonize with my views, of Jesus being in existence as a being before he was born of Mary his mother, the following texts:—Gal. 4: 4; Rom. 1: 3; 2 Tim. 2: 8; Gal. 3: 19; Gal. 3: 16."

The question put in another form would stand thus: How do you harmonize these passages with those which positively affirm the pre-existence of our Savior as a being? I have said on another occasion that, if the terms employed by the Holy Ghost do not prove the pre-existence of Christ, it cannot be proved by words, though it be true. Of what avail is it to infer that Christ had no being before he was in the flesh from passages that do not prove the negative, in opposition to the plainest language that can be employed that he had existence as a being before he was here?

He was in the beginning with God. He became poor. All things were created by him. He was before all things. He took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham. He came down from heaven. I say, again, if these passages do not prove the being of our Lord before he was here, then words cannot prove it. If the word pre-existence was in the Bible, and applied to Christ, it would not prove to the minds of some that he was a being before he was manifest in the flesh. For they would say that he did not pre-exist as a being, but only as a principle, or in the purpose of the Father.

Our friend has referred us to those passages which speak of Christ as made of a woman, made under the law! He was Abraham's seed, and the seed of David. He was made of the seed of David according to the flesh.

These passages show the relation of Christ to man in his manhood. They mark the commencement of his relation to man in the flesh. They do not imply that he commenced his being in this world. They do imply that he had a being before he came here. God sent forth his Son, made of a woman. He took on him the seed of Abraham, the seed of David according to the flesh, but not his seed in any other sense. These scriptures imply the pre-existence of Christ as a being. Other passages positively affirm his existence before he came here.

The word of the Lord is harmony. It is not yea and nay, but yea and amen. May the good Spirit lead us to see this harmony, and to honor the Son even as we honor the Father. J. S. WHITE.

Correspondence.

From Bro. B. P. Manning.

Bro. Grant:—I wish to say a few words through the Crisis to the dear saints scattered abroad. I have a request to make to you, one and all; that is, I do desire your prayers, that the Lord will rebuke the disease, and raise me up, and give me health again; so that I can labor a little longer in the vineyard of the Lord before he comes. O my sufferings are great at this time. Now, dear brethren, the Lord is able to make me whole in a moment. Jesus is the same to-day that he ever was. The Bible is the same; what then is lacking? Faith in God. Dear brethren, do you believe the Bible? You will all say yes. Well, so do I.

I have a great desire to be at the convention the 25th, but shall not be able unless God should give me health. I believe he will do it if the brethren will pray in faith. Come now, dear brethren, will you ask the Lord in my behalf? I believe you will.

We are near the judgment of the great day, and what is done must be done quickly. Truly the nations are angry. What next? God's wrath will come, "and the time of the dead that they should be judged." Then God will give reward to his servants, the prophets, and to his saints. Yes, blessed be the Lord forever for his promises.

This side of '68, I hope to see Jesus and be made like him. If any of the servants of the Lord should come this way, please give me a call. You shall have a home such as I have. O how glad I should be to see any one of like precious faith! Here I am, and have to lie on my bed about half of the time; but I do praise my Father in heaven that I am as well as I am. My strength is most gone in my arms and hands; but my faith is strong in God and in the power of his might. I like the Crisis at this time, and should feel lost without it. I am glad to hear from the dear saints through the paper.

Your brother in distress.

Goffstown, July 8th, '60.

[We hope all our readers will remember and pray for our brother in his afflictions, and visit him if they can.—Ed.]

From Bro. S. N. Kent.

Bro. Grant:—Permit me to say through the Crisis to the friends of Bible truth, that I have been laboring in Conway the last few months, in the midst of opposition, but the good Lord has blessed the truth to the salvation of many souls. I have baptized twelve new converts, eleven of whom are heads of families. A church of twenty-five members was gathered last November. Another was baptized in June. They are well united in the great truths of the Bible, and looking for life only through Christ, at his second coming.

From Sr. Louisa James.

Dear Brn. and Sisters in the Lord:—I thought I would again like to address a few lines to you through the Crisis, hoping that it might, though written in much weakness, strengthen you to be more faithful. I feel that of all others I have the most reason to praise the good Lord for his continued mercies to me. My health continues good and has been from the time that the Lord in answer to prayer raised me; and I do believe that I shall be permitted to live to see Jesus come in the clouds of heaven. What a glorious thought! It cheers my heart and enables me to be more faithful, makes my determinations stronger to do my Master's will. Though some may point the cold finger of scorn, and think me crazy for my faith in Jesus, I care not as long as I am counted worthy to suffer persecutions for the sake of Jesus; it is as nothing to the glory we shall have when Jesus comes to be admired by all his saints from every age and clime.

"O, to be there! where no sorrow or care Shall disturb that sweet heavenly rest."

Ye weary pilgrims, be of good cheer; victory will be yours in a little from this. You that are in affliction, claim the promises of God; he is faithful in all that he has promised; he is a physician I can recommend to you, for he turns none away that come to him; and the fee is so small that the poorest can come; it is only to come in faith believing, and we shall receive. Praise the Lord! oh my soul, for the unspeakable goodness of God.

I ask an interest in your prayers. I feel that I need them.

New Bedford, Mass.

Bro. N. S. Latimer, Milton, N. Y., writes:—"Truly things are getting worse instead of better. The church in this place, to which I formerly belonged, and was an esteemed member, now give the cold shoulder; and for no other reason than that I believe that dead men are dead, and that our Life-Giver will soon come to give his children eternal life. The language of my heart is, "Come, Lord Jesus," and "come quickly." The signs of the times bespeak his near approach. I want to be among that number that can stand when he appeareth.

Our residence is about half way between Albany and New York, on the west bank of the Hudson; and is a regular steamboat landing. If any of our preaching brethren want a new field of labor, they can find it [illegible]

Dedication at Vernon, Vt.—Bro. Grant:—We had a good time at the dedication. The friends were sorry you could not be there. I will give some account of it soon. Yours, J. V. Himes.

Reasons for my Hope.—A Bro. in C. writes:—"I was much pleased myself with 'Reasons,' and although I do not wish to flatter, must say that I consider it just the thing."

A Request.—I would like to ask C. F. Hudson, through the Crisis, if any part of man is conscious, or knows any thing after death? M. A. Church.

For the Crisis.

The Modern History of Universalism; Extending from the Epoch of the Reformation to the Present Time. By Thomas Whittemore. Vol. 1. European History. 408 pages, 12mo. A. Tompkins, Boston, 1860.

A Congregational minister who holds life in Christ only, has wished that we might prepare a history of Dissent from the doctrine of endless misery, including all the forms of that dissent. Such a history would stand as a mighty protest against the fearful and unscriptural dogma, scarcely less effective for even wide differences of opinion in the vast multitude of dissenters.

Lacking time, opportunity, and some of the qualifications for such a work, we are glad that it is being done in part by others. The present volume is a very valuable contribution to the desired history. The design of it was formed many years since, and it gives the results of patient reading and inquiry, and a skillful and fair use of material contributed by others. It will be difficult to find elsewhere an equal mass of testimony against the eternity of evil.

And the author gives not only names and facts, but also a very good history of Universalist arguments and reasoning. These arguments, we need hardly say, seem quite inconclusive for the author's view, and he does not indorse them all. Yet the reasons offered against the prevailing view, and the record of opinion, will commend the volume to all readers of history.

Some very important facts here brought out are new to us. We knew very well that Luther felt the burden of the doctrine of endless woe, and found no relief in any of the theories of its justice. These facts we have given in "Debt and Grace," pp. 347, 348. But Mr. W. shows that Luther staggered even unto doubt, and gives the record of his doubts, from a letter written in 1522. And Sir Henry Vane, one of the early governors of Massachusetts, here appears as a Universalist. We must certainly thank the author for his army of witnesses, while we interpret their testimony as a half-truth, corrected by a plain scriptural doctrine of Life as the end of the Repentance enjoined on man. C. F. H.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Belchertown, June 16th, 1860, Nancy Shumway, wife of Henry Harrison Shumway, and daughter of Preston M. and Phebe Wellman, aged forty-two years.

The deceased obtained hope in the pardoning mercy of God about twenty-five years ago, and united with the Baptist church, with which she has ever remained a consistent member. She was ever diligent and untiring in her labors of love, both in and out of the church; always even in her walk and conversation, considerate and faithful in all her duties to her family, the church and the world. Although she differed from the church to which she belonged on points of doctrine, yet she did not think it her duty to withdraw herself from that body; but was ready on all proper occasions to express her faith in the soon coming of Christ, the destruction of the wicked, and life and immortality only through Christ. Last year, she with her husband and children, for the first time, attended the Wilbraham campmeeting, and enjoyed a rich feast. She was much strengthened at that meeting.

The day before her death, when informed that she could live but a very short time, she said, "Jesus has opened up the way before me; blessed be his name. Oh! praise the Lord for his goodness to me, and all the children of men; let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord. Glory, hallelujah, Amen. Amen. Amen."

The next morning she called her family and friends, one by one, to her bedside, and took her leave of them all. A kind husband, three children, mother, two brothers and eight sisters were among the ties she had to bind her to earth; but by grace she was enabled to leave them all in her Master's care, and with her mind strong to the last, she departed in peace, to await the morn of the resurrection. Her funeral was attended by the pastor of the church to which she belonged.

"Yes, Lord! a body glorious as thine own
Shall upward from the dusty ruin spring;
And the unsightly grain, in weakness sown,
Shall rise in power, a holy, heavenly thing,
When thou shalt come to sit on David's throne,
And rule in righteousness as Zion's king,
With all thy risen saints. Oh, soon again,
Lord Jesus, come! take thy great power and reign!"

M. A. W.

Died, in Boston Harbor, July 1st, 1860, Edwin B., son of Bro. David and Sister Esther Grant, aged about twenty-one years.

In this bereavement Bro. and Sr. Grant feel very sorely afflicted. Edwin was the idol of the family. His amiable disposition and excellent deportment made him very much beloved. He [illegible] religion among the Methodists about two years ago, and went to that meeting; yet he frequently went to hear on the subject of the "Advent," and always sought opportunity to hear Bro. E. Burnham, under whose preaching he sat with much delight.

He was conveyed from quarantine to his home at Kennebunkport, and on the fourth of July we were called to attend his funeral, and truly this was a scene of sadness, as they had been expecting to greet him with a smile of joy, and he is borne so suddenly home a lifeless corpse; and while all around were filled with hilarity, celebrating the anniversary of our nation's independence, the hearts of this dear family were filled with bitterness and overflowed with grief; but they have reason for gratitude, that in the midst of infidelity and moral darkness the light of Revelation has shined in their hearts, and that they believe in the literal resurrection of the dead. May He who has said, "all things work together for good to them who love the Lord," sanctify this bereavement to their eternal good. Wm. H. Mitchell.

Died, in Danielsonville, Ct., July 4th, Celestina Anna, youngest daughter of Cromwell and Maria Chase, aged three years one month and twelve days.

Again are we called to lay a loved one in the grave; again has death entered our circle and torn from our embrace one that was lovely, one whose sweet smiles and prattling voice made glad our hearts. The dear one is with us no more; she sweetly sleeps with her brother on the hillside. But amid this affliction we will not murmur, for we anticipate with joy that meeting which shall take place when those that sleep in Jesus shall awake to life and immortality.

Our loved ones are sleeping in quiet repose,
But death cannot always their young eyelids close,
At the coming of Jesus they'll wake from the tomb,
And like flowers in spring-time eternally bloom.

We miss them at morn, at noontide, and eve;
Our hearts filled with sorrow do silently grieve;
Yet not without hope, as do others, we mourn,
For we know that those loved ones again will return.

From the land of the enemy, spotless and pure,
To dwell in Christ's kingdom forever secure;
Where pain, death and sorrow can never more come,—
God grant we may meet them in that heav'nly home.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Halifax, July 10. The Royal Mail Steamship Arabia, from Liverpool 30th, via. Queenstown, July 1st, arrived at this port this P. M.

The Neapolitan Government had yielded to the energetic demands of the American and Piedmontese Ministers, and ordered the release of the two captured vessels with their crews and passengers. The American sloop-of-war Iroquois went to Naples especially to assist the American Minister in his demands.

The agitation at Naples increased. A most inflammatory proclamation had been issued by the Central Revolutionary committee, calling on the people to rise.

The French Ambassador had been most terribly maltreated in the streets, it is supposed by members of the anti-reform party. He was beaten senseless.

The Commissariats of the twelve districts of Naples were simultaneously attacked and pillaged on the 28th. The agents were murdered and the archives burnt.

Naples was declared in a state of siege, and street assemblages prohibited.

The Neapolitan Government continues its warlike hostilities, the proclamation of reforms not appearing to give satisfaction.

Garibaldi was continuing his preparations for new movements.

England and Austria had assented to the proposed conference on the Franco Swiss question, the latter power protesting against the admission of Sardinia.

ITALY.

It was reported that the Papal Government was about to grant reforms.

There had been frequent collisions between the troops and citizens at Perugia.

THE PAPAL STATES.

Rome.—A letter in the Perseveranza of Milan says:—Gen. de Lamoriciere is greatly disappointed, and has no confidence in the result of his mission. A few days ago, in conversation with one of his friends, he said, "I have been completely deceived as to the situation of the Roman Government. I was told that I should find an army not in a very bad condition; that I should be furnished with all the means necessary for completing its organization, that all the money I wanted for that purpose would be placed at my disposal, and that I should receive all the co-operation I might desire on the part of the people, who were entirely devoted to the Government. I have found every thing quite the reverse."

NAPLES.

We (says a contemporary) have received a dispatch from Naples, announcing the following most important facts. The letter, addressed by the Emperor Napoleon to the King of Naples, was read on the 22d to the King's council. Francis II. being indisposed, was not present. After the contents of the Emperor's letter was made known, the following resolutions were voted by the council.

1. The adoption of a constitution.
2. A general amnesty to be granted.
3. A total change of ministry.
4. Italian alliance with Piedmont.
5. The Italian flag, with the arms of Naples, to be adopted.

We are assured that these resolutions were voted by a majority of nine against three.

Our informant further says, "The King has acceded to the propositions adopted and recommended by the majority of the council. His Majesty was still seriously ill.

PROCLAMATIONS TO THE PEOPLE OF NAPLES.

The Central Revolutionary Committee at Naples has issued the following appeal to the inhabitants of Naples. It is dated the 15th of June:—

"Inhabitants of the city of Naples,—Too long already have your silent tears watered the land of Samnium; too long have Italian brows been bent before crime and infamy.

"Incessantly menaced in your persons, in your property, in your honor, for forty years you have been the playthings of the ambition and of the tyranny of a handful of men. With us you have deplored the ruin of the national finances, you have seen taxes levied to provide for the pleasures of an imbecile Bourbon, and become the booty of a few nobles who ostentatiously displayed their luxury before you as if it were a patent of nobility.

"You behold daily your fathers, mothers, wives, sisters, subject to cynical tortures and immolated by a barbarous police. Blood asks for blood, and that of your relations and defenders of your rights cries aloud for vengeance.

"Slaves bought by money in South America did not tolerate such [illegible] treatment, and we, Neapolitans, born free men to live where our fathers lived as rulers, how could we have submitted to such exactions, have endured such sanguinary outrages?

"But let us bid a truce to timid regrets; let us leave lamentations to the tyrant; the future does not rest in his complaints. Hitherto knotted down by the cowardice and villainy of example, taken by the contagion, our brains were confounded like those of slaves.

"At the sight of victorious Sicily, at the magnanimous example of Piedmont, at the powerful voice of Garibaldi, let our hearts throw off a shameful torpor, let us seize weapons to conquer, chastise, and liberate. Let Vesuvius respond to Etna, and the Appenines be the conducting wire of deliverance to our brothers in the North.

"For a long time, Neapolitans, we have tolerated that which could not be avenged without shedding the blood of our fellow-citizens. For a long time we hesitated to commence an impious struggle with our brethren led astray by pretorian uniforms.

"But by the side of the duties of the citizen are also those of the father; the hour has come to cast aside an unjust sensibility, to escape from the curse which weighs upon bad fathers and slaves!

"Let the mask be dropped! Let every man select his course; between honor and infamy traitors only can hesitate, and cowards only remain undecided. Let everything within our reach become a terrible weapon, from the deadly rifle to the sharpened lava of Vesuvius; let us rather be crushed under the ruins of Parthenope than tolerate the tyranny of the Bourbon; and, if he needs must reign, let him reign in a churchyard.

"Brothers, await the orders of your committee; distrust bad news, and especially silly manifestations, only suited to encourage the oppressor, to intimidate the weak, and to delay the day of redemption.

"Sons of the Samnites, invoke the courage of your ancestors, sharpen your swords and prepare silently—for, we swear it unto you, the struggle is near at hand.

"Neapolitans, you are sons of Italy. Italy extends from Mont Cenis to the blood-stained waters of Sicily. Rise in the name of Italy and of liberty!

"Those who shed their blood for your sakes come courageously to you, and you fight against them!

"God said to Cain, 'Unhappy man, what have you done with your brother?' Italy will say to you, 'Cursed brothers, what have you done with your brothers?'

"Each drop of blood shed in Sicily is a malediction on your heads, on the heads of your children, and of your children's children.

"Neapolitans! Italy forgives you; but you must rise like the flames of your volcanoes against those who do not wish to allow Italy to exist."—London Times.

The Year of Hurricanes.

The season through which we are passing, will go far to remove the impression that the severest hurricanes are confined to the tropics. All over the Northern and Middle States, tornadoes of unprecedented violence, extent, and destructiveness have occurred. At least three hundred lives have been lost by the force of the elements. There seems to have been a cycle of tornadoes.

Within a fortnight there have been four in the Middle and the Western States, one extending from Louisville up to Central Ohio, one in Cattaraugus county in Western New York, one in Armstrong and the adjoining counties in Western Pennsylvania, and now one in Iowa and Northern Illinois, which, it is said, has surpassed all the others in violence and destructiveness.

Whole villages have been demolished, and their inhabitants either killed outright, or fearfully mangled by the falling of houses, the mad sweep of the winds, or the flying of timbers and trees. The imagination can hardly paint the terror which has overtaken, in stern reality, the inhabitants of the devastated districts. It must have been witnessed to be realized.

Never before has our country been visited by so many, or so widely destructive hurricanes as during the present year. They have rushed through the country with resistless fury, uprooting trees, demolishing fences, houses and churches, and even taking loaded freight cars from their tracks and dashing them to pieces. The space traversed by the last great tornado, in Illinois and Iowa, was fully one hundred and fifty miles in length. The force of the wind has been almost incredible. Tin from roofs was carried over twenty miles; large brick houses were lifted completely from their foundations and twisted around in the air, before being dashed to fragments upon the ground. Churches were demolished with a single thunder gust, and the whirling and snapping of whole forests of trees, as they were caught up in the folds of the tremendous whirlwinds, was awfully grand to hear and to see.

In all cases the electric forces appear to have been combined with the atmospheric agitation. The fearful velocity and power of the wind—estimated to have traversed space at a speed of from sixty to seventy miles an hour—was alone sufficiently terrific. But when to this was added the roar of the most startling and tremendous claps of thunder, and the scathing glances—flash after flash, of the lightning—it is no wonder that a scene was presented which struck men dumb with fear and alarm, and even made the stoutest hearts to quake. The awful grandeur of the storm, as the whole "artillery of heaven" seemed let loose upon the stricken globe, was indescribable. Add to this the groans of wounded men, and the shrieks and prayers of terror stricken women and children, ending in a catalogue of dead, lying cold and stiff in every stage of mangled deformity, and we have a picture of human desolation which transcends in horror all the convulsions of nature.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Wilbraham Campmeeting.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co. by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have FREE RETURN PASSES by application to me when they purchase their Western tickets for the camp ground, which will be at half the usual fare.

Full particulars of arrangements with other R. R. Companies will be given in due season.

G. T. Adams, 167 Hanover Street, Boston, Mass.

An Inquiry.

Who wants a "real good," "free," "general" camp or grove meeting in Maine this season? Let all who feel an interest in the matter, and are willing to help by their prayers, presence and funds, send word to the Crisis without delay. Bro. Grant will publish their names, and if there is interest enough in the matter, a good place will be selected for the meeting, notice given, and preparations made. What is done must be done very soon. Come, brethren and sisters, speak "all at once."

As several have expressed an interest in this matter, I take the liberty to make the inquiry. If I have done wrong, forgive.

E. R. York.

☞ Elder A. Cleaveland will preach at North Troy, Vt., Sunday, July 22d, and once in four weeks the ensuing year.

Commence a quarterly meeting Saturday, July 28th, at South Troy, to hold over the Sabbath. Preaching brethren are invited to attend. He will also preach at South Troy once in four weeks through the year.

N. Orcutt.

Notice.

A meeting will be held at the school-house near Bro. Whitaker's, two miles north of [illegible], Erie Co., Pa., Saturday, July 28th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 29th at 9 o'clock, A. M.

Also, a grove meeting in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Edenboro, Erie Co., Pa., August 25th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Oxley, Evangelist.

☞ I expect to preach at the Clark Meeting-house in Barnstead, N. H., on Sunday, the 29th of July; and, if it should appear to be duty, may hold meetings for a day or two following. T. M. Preble.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping. We shall expect those preachers present that feel sent. Further particulars hereafter.

D. Cornwell, M. Gorson, L. Mills, } Committee.

To the Brethren in New York.

Brethren: We are requested by Bro. John Stevenson, C. W., to inform you that the small chronological chart, forwarded about sixteen months ago to Bro. Lederer, of "The Israelite Indeed," and afterwards in the hands of Brn. Green, Doolittle and others, is expected to be forwarded to the office of the World's Crisis, Boston, at as early a date as possible. Will they see to it?

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Corliss, Lowell; E. Heath, Lynn; S. Ayers, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

Morning Worship.

Unto the high and mighty Lord
We lift our morning strain of praise,
In notes of joy his love record,
And songs of thankful gladness raise.

Great God, thy mercies, like the dew,
Fall on us at the evening's shade,
And with each morning, blessings new
Shine o'er the works thy hand hath made.

God of the morning, while the day
Beams with the light of love divine,
We with its dawn our homage pay,—
Thou art our God and we are thine.

Keep us in peace, oh Lord, we pray,
Through all our years of mortal time;
Then take us, in eternal day
To dwell with thee in joy sublime.

[From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

2 Thes. 1: 7–9; "And to you who are troubled, rest with us; when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

"Everlasting destruction." Strange that with no mention of the soul's immortality it should be inferred from such a phrase that the soul will never perish. But "to be destroyed" and "to perish" are the same thing, expressed by the same Greek word, and each is "destruction." The expressions "perish for ever" (Job. 4: 20; 20: 7; Ps. 9: 18,) "destroy for ever" (Ps. 52: 92: 7) are plainly equivalent. It were as proper to say that "perish forever" means "to be ever perishing and yet never perish," as to say that "everlasting destruction" means an "eternal destroying of that which is never destroyed." And if the passages are parallel, or even correspond as type and anti-type, these interpretations must stand or fall together.

We conclude that here is another instance of "everlasting" denoting the eternity of effect. Such a destruction is one from which there is no recovery; it is irreparable, utter, complete. It it not "banishment," as the expression is commonly understood and sometimes quoted. The phrase "from the presence," etc., does not mean this; for the preposition does not denote separation but the origin or source of the destruction named. The same phrase occurs in Acts 3: 19, where the idea of banishment would be absurd: "The times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." It frequently occurs in speaking of the destruction of God's enemies, by fire issuing from the divine presence, as in Lev. 10: 2; Num. 16: 35; 2 Kings 1: 10, 12, 14; Rev. 20: 9. Compare Lev. 9: 24; Ps. 97: 3; Isa. 13: 6; "The day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty;" and ver. 9: "To lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it." These passages and the context sustain the view of Macknight, who says: "These wicked men, being raised from the dead, shall suffer punishment, even everlasting destruction, by fire issuing from the presence of the Lord." And of Conybeare and Howson: "There shall go forth against them, from the presence of the Lord, and from the brightness of his glorious majesty, their righteous doom, even an everlasting destruction." * * * *

Hammond explains the passage of "an utter destruction;" refers to Matt. 3: 12 as denoting a fire that "never goes out till it have burnt up all;" and adds: "Meanwhile not excluding the eternal torments of hell fire" etc. Which proviso explains and proves nothing.

Matt. 25: 46; "These shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal."

This is often taken as a "ruling" passage in support of the doctrine of eternal suffering, and therefore demands our special attention. At the outset we remark several objections against the inference. 1. The passage in 2 Thes. 1: 7–9 is parallel, describing the same judgment scene; and the "destruction" there named will as naturally define the "punishment" named here, as it will be defined by it. And more naturally, if rare words should be explained by words more common. 2. Granting, for argument's sake, that "punishment" implies conscious suffering, it may be called "everlasting" with reference to its irreparable effect. Thus Ps. 83: 17; "Let them be confounded and troubled forever; yea, let them be put to shame and perish." 3. The phrase "everlasting fire," used in ver. 41, as already shown, denotes the eternity of effect. Whether the expression in ver. 46 be taken in the same sense or not it should not disagree with it. 4. The life which is contrasted suggests that the punishment may be strictly death. Whereas the common view deduces immortality from that which is opposed to "life eternal." 5. Various orthodox writers allow that final extinction would be an eternal punishment.

6. Besides these facts, which are more or less obvious, we hope to show that the word rendered "punishment" (kolasis) does not require the sense of conscious suffering.

We shall not at all insist on the acknowledged fact that the word "eternal" (aionios) is often used in a limited sense. Yet we might show a strong or even satisfactory argument for such a limitation if the passage were not better explained otherwise. The common remark that the word is used in the absolute sense in the same verse, and that therefore the endless life of the righteous and the endless punishment of the wicked must stand or fall together, is not valid; for the general sense of "lifelong," or "during the continuance of the subject," which the word aionios doubtless bears, would admit a corresponding distinction in the future of those who "live for ever" and those who "perish." Indeed, if kolasis means suffering, the limited sense, or else the "eternity of effect," would be fairly suggested by ver. 41, as already shown. Moreover, the same phrase precisely is used by Philo in speaking of a very limited duration. He says: "It is better not to promise at all, than not to render prompt assistance. For, in the former case, no blame follows; but in the latter, there is dissatisfaction from the weaker class, and a deep hatred and lasting punishment (kolasis aionios, mortal resentment?) from such as are powerful." (Fragm. Opp. II. 667, ed. Mangey.)

Nor shall we raise any question of the genuineness of the text. Yet if any one would rest an infinitely appalling doctrine on a word, one or two things should be said. Christ spoke not in Greek, but in Syro-Chaldaic. And, granting the inspiration of the evangelist, no one can disprove —what many believe—that he wrote in Hebrew, and that the Greek of his Gospel is an uninspired translation. And for kolasis the Ethiopic gives "their own," or "proper" (suum); the old Latin version gives ignis (fire); and Augustine and others frequently read ambustionem or combustionem (burning); which shows how little the original term was then relied on. We submit, therefore, that the conjecture of Dr. Mangey, that katalusis (annihilation) is the true reading, was not "impious, though kausis (burning) kolousis (cutting off), or krsis (judgment) would be more plausible as a conjecture. But we would not seem to dislike the received text. Nor shall we detain the reader with various senses of the word kolasis, such as "chastisement," "restraint," "abscission," which have been proposed. (See Debt and Grace, pp. 189, 190.) But we may express our surprise that so wary a writer as Mr. Landis should give such countenance to the sense last named as he does, saying: "The final state of the lost is here designated by the singularly appropriate term kolasis; punishment by rejection, or cutting off from or by deprivation of that happiness which the saved enjoy." (Immort. of Soul, p. 480.) If for "happiness" Mr. L. had used Christ's own word "life," all that he adds about "going away into" such "deprivation" would not at all even suggest the immortality of these thus "cut off." The sentence "depart" is solemn, dramatic, and contemplates not an abode in God's universe for the wicked, but an execution.

That suffering is here implied is strongly asserted by the writer in the New Englander, May, 1856, p. 171, who says kolasis is a verbal noun, denoting action and not result, a noun of infliction. And this is argued from 1 John 4: 18, where it occurs in the phrase "fear hath torment;" and from the Syriac, which gives in our passage a word rendered "torment" by Dr. Murdock.

But the Syriac will not prove the common view, even if it were an inspired version. For the word rendered "torment" has also the more general sense of "punishment," or, as latinized by Walton and White, "supplicium;" and the verb also means to suppress, submerge, suffocate, strangle.* It is rendered "punish" by Dr. Murdock in Acts 4: 21. And in 1 John 4: 18 the Syriac uses another word, rendered "existeth in peril." The Arabic also seems to have read kolousin, "constraint," which is preferred by Grotius and Schleusner. Hommond conjectures a similar word kolousin, "hindrance." Beausobre and L'Enfant explain the received reading thus: "Fear hath punishment ever before its eyes." The Vulgate gives simply pœnam, "punishment." The translation of kolasis in 1 John 4: 18 by "torment" is nearly if not wholly without parallel, and is unsupported by the lexicographers. In Acts 4: 21 the verb kolazo occurs, and the context favors the sense of punishment with a view to "restraint" and prohibition. The word is used in one other place only in the New Testament, 2 Pet. 2: 9. Here it occurs as a participle in the present tense, rendered as future in our version: "The Lord knoweth how . . . to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." But the future tense is no more required by the context than by the word. The 4th verse is plainly parallel; the participle "to be reserved" there used is also in the present tense; and the same verb is in the past tense in the similar passage, Jude ver. 6. If then the verb kolazo has at all the sense of repress, or restrain, the obvious and grammatical rendering here would be, "to reserve the unjust confined, or restrained, unto the day of judgment." Yet we shall not insist either on the sense of "restrain," or on the present tense. We remark, however, that if the future tense be insisted on, that would indicate that the punishment begins with the judgment, and not before it. And then the final punishment may not be anguish of spirit, or any natural suffering, but something fatally different.

* Schaaf, in his Lexicon, renders the noun by cruciatus, tormentum, supplicium; and the verb by cruciavit, excruciavit, torsit, afflixit, pressit, angustavit, angustia affecit, submersit, suffocavit, strangulavit.

Since our word occurs but four times in the New Testament, we must look further for examples of its meaning. The Greek of the Old Testament offers for this purpose, and is of far more value than the classic writers, of whom the New Testament writers were comparatively ignorant. In the Septuagint we shall also include the Apocryphal books, which were Jewish, and some of them written before the time of Christ. The noun or verb is here found in several passages, as follows:—

Ezek. 14: 3, 4, 7; 43: 11; 44: 12 (marg.) Here kolasis occurs as the equivalent of "stumbling-block." Schleusner explains the translation thus: "Whatever is the cause of misfortune or punishment is called in Scripture a 'stumbling block.'" But the punishment threatened in ch. 14: 8–10 is being "cut off" and "destroyed."

Ezek. 18: 30; "So iniquity shall not be your ruin" (kolasis). Compare ver. 31: "Why will ye die?" and ver. 32: "Live ye."

2 Sam. 8: 1; "David smote the Philistines, and subdued them." Sept. etroposato, routed or destroyed; and Aquila, D. C. 160, ekolasen, punished.

Prov. 22: 23; "For the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil (Symmachus, A. D. 200, kolasetai) the soul of those that spoiled them."

1 Esdras 8: 24; "Whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the King, let judgment be executed speedily upon him (kolasthesontai), whether it be unto death, or to banishment (timoria marg. rooting out), or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment."

Wisdom 3: 4; "Though in the sight of men they are punished (kolasthosin), their hope is full of immortality."

11: 5; "For by what things their enemies [the Egyptians] were punished (ekolasthesan), by the same they in their need were benefited." Comp. vs. 16, 19; 12: 14, 15, 27; 16: 1, 2, 9, 24; 18: 11, 22. In ch. 12: 27 the Vulgate renders kolazomenoi by "exterminarentur;" Calmet and the Port-Royalists, by "tourmentez et exterminez."

14: 4: "For a fatuity of which they [the Egyptians] were worthy brought them to this end; and they lost the remembrance of those things which had happened, that they might fill up the punishment (kolasin) which was wanting to their torments (basanois.)"

14: 10; "Speaking of idol images and their worship: "That which was made, together with him who made it, shall be punished" (kolasthesetai.) Comp. ver. 13: "For neither were they from the beginning, neither shall they be forever."

2 Macc. 4: 38: "He put to death the sacrilegious wretch, the Lord repaying him his deserved punishment (kolasin.")

6: 14; "Nations, whom the Lord patiently expecteth until he shall punish (kolasai) them in the fulness of their sins."

See also 1 Macc. 7: 7; 3 Macc. 1: 3; 6: 3; where the context shows that the punishment is death.

Here are twenty-eight examples of the use of the word, in not one of which it necessarily denotes torment; and in most of which the actual punishment was death. In one striking instance a lifeless block of wood is devoted to punishment. No other comment is needed than the question, Would Christ's hearers, or the readers of the Greek of Matthew's gospel, familiar with such a use of the word, here put in connection with an apparently consuming fire, and in direct contrast with "life," infer an immortality nowhere mentioned from Genesis to Revelation?

We have already observed how "life" and "death" in the literal sense are contrasted as "good" and "evil" (Deut. 30: 15, 19.) And if they are so when only temporary, they can be no less so when eternal. And De Wette remarks on Matt. 25: 46; "Zoe (life) is perhaps not merely blessedness, but life in the most radical (tiefsten) sense of the word; contrasted with it would be, properly, annihilation." It avails nothing to say that anguish is the opposite of joy. For, (1.) misery has not equal rights with happiness, in God's universe. (2.) Death is the privation of joy, and thus as proper a subject of contrast. And (3.) "eternal life" not only implies endless joy, but is literally to "live for ever;" and the opposite of this is, strictly, to be for ever dead. Hence when Alford remarks that "the zoe here spoken of is not bare existence, which would have annihilation for its opposite," we need only reply that eternal life is eternal existence, to which extinction is opposite. And this contrast is the most natural one, if as Fritzsche declares, the literal sense of "eternal life" is primary, and the notion of blessedness is accessory.

Nor will it avail to argue that utter extinction is not eternal punishment. For, however plausibly this might be argued on rational grounds, the scriptural argument would remain valid: Christ has called that an eternal kolasis which is elsewhere constantly called "destruction," "perishing," and "death." If the rational argument should seem to be made out, it would rather follow, either that the "eternal kolasis" is so called for the eternity of its effect, as being a remediless doom, or that kolasis is not to be rendered punishment, but by some other word. But we then reply, (1.) if thinking men have regarded extinction eternal punishment, the Jews also may have done the same, and Christ might address them accordingly. And (2.) we have already observed that Jewish doctors have spoken of extermination as the greatest of all punishments. And we add one or two proofs that the Jews in Christ's time did conceive of death as an evil thing. In the Septuagint translation of Job 10: 21, 22, which was in use among the Jews, is followed by the Vulgate and quoted by Calvin, we read: "Before I go and return no more, to a land that is dark and covered with the mist of death; a land of misery and darkness, where is the shadow of death, and no order, but eternal horror dwells." Now we know that Job, in the depth of his anguish, desired death rather than life. And the Seventy translators certainly did not think that he contemplated eternal misery beyond the grave. The passage can only portray the horror with which an eternal sleep of death was regarded by the Jews. In the same view, in Ezek. 32: 24, 25, 30, the enemies of Israel are spoken of as "enduring shame," while they are described as "slain," "fallen by the sword," "gone down to Sheol," or to "the pit," and in their graves. And in Isa. 14; 9–20 is an extended drama showing how deep a degradation it was, to the Jewish mind, to be in the doom of death.

Respecting the precise sense of the expressions "snares of death" (or of Sheol,) "sorrows of death," "pains of death," (2 Sam. 22: 6; Ps. 18: 4, 5; 116: 3; Acts 2: 24,) there is some dispute. Yet it is generally agreed that they refer, not to the pain of dying, but to the state of death. They imply that to be hopelessly dead is to be in an evil case.

All rational argument, therefore, to show that eternal kolasis can not be the death of the soul, we regard as irrelevant; and, if insisted on, as rationalistic.

(To be continued.)

For the Crisis.

Matt. 10: 28.

"And fear not them which kill (apokteinontone) the body, but are not able to kill (apokteinai) the soul (psukee): but rather fear him who is able to destroy (apolesai) both soul and body in hell" (gehenna.)

The Greek word apokteino, rendered kill, signifies to kill, put to death, murder, destroy, abolish, etc. Body, here, as elsewhere, may be used for the whole man; and soul, doubtless, means just what it does in the place where Jesus says, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto DEATH." If it be said that he simply meant, I am sorrowful, etc., which is doubtless true, though the soul of Christ must be included, as psukee, the soul-word, is used;—then I reply that soul in Matt. 10: 28, may be, and doubtless is, employed in the same sense —for the whole being. The language of Christ as recorded by Luke (12: 4, 5,) it seems to me, settles the question. "And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, [or put you to death] and after that have no more that they can do; [for they cannot so kill as to preclude your coming to life again.] But I will forewarn you whom you shall fear: fear him, which after he hath killed [you] hath power to cast [you] into hell [Gehenna;] yea, I say unto you, fear him."

Matthew wrote in the Hebrew idiom, and uses the terms soul and body as comprehending the whole being, which God only could kill, so as to preclude a resurrection. But Luke, who wrote in purer Greek, in giving the same discourse, omits the term soul, thus showing that he uses the term body for the whole being, and does not make the distinction between the body and soul that appears in Matthew. But if Luke has given the true idea of our Lord's discourse, (and who will deny that he has?) it necessarily follows that Christ does not teach in Matt. 10: 28, that man has an entity, called the soul, that exists in a conscious state when separated from the body. There certainly can be no disagreement between Matthew and Luke. The fact that the one employs Hebraisms, and the other adopting a purer style of Greek, sufficiently accounts, I think, for the difference in phraseology.

Note the contrast between Matt. 16: 26, and Luke 9: 25. One says, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (psukee.) The other, "For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world and lose HIMSELF?" He also says, (12: 19,) "And I will say to my soul, soul, THOU hast much goods laid up for many years," etc. So that what Matthew calls the soul, Luke calls "himself," "thou"—i. e., the whole being. Thus it is in Matt. 10: 28, and Luke 12: 4, 5. So that any argument founded on such a difference of phraseology, or any seeming distinction made between soul and body is untenable and inadmissible.

That the term psukee does refer "to the future, and eternal life of the believer," is evident, not only from one signification of psukee—which is, "the state of being alive, existence," thus corresponding so far, with the meaning of zoe which is "animated existence, state of being alive"—but from the words of Christ, Matt. 16: 25, where he says, "For whosoever will save his life (psukee), shall lose it" [lose it when? in the day of judgment when the "second death" is executed:] "and whosoever will lose his life (psukee) for my sake, shall find it." Find it when? in the resurrection at the last day. So it would seem we have good authority for understanding psukee in Matt. 20: 28, as referring to that life or being which "is hid with Christ in God." "When Christ who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."

Harwood translates Matt. 10: 28 thus: "Fear not those who can only inflict upon you bodily pain and torture, and deprive you of a precarious being—but whose power extends no farther. But let that great Being be the object of your fear, who can involve both soul and body in total and everlasting destruction. Let that Being, I repeat it, be the object of your constant fear." That this is the true import of the language of Christ, if not a literal translation, I have not a doubt.

"Words to the Winners of Souls."

Bishop Lavington, addressing the clergy, somewhere about 1750, says: "My brethren, I beg you will rise up with me against moral preaching. We have long been attempting the reformation of the nation by discourses of this kind. With what success? None at all. On the contrary, we have dexterously preached the people into downright infidelity. We must change our voice. We must preach Christ and him crucified. Nothing but the gospel is—nothing besides will be found to be—the power of God unto salvation. Let me therefore again and again request—may I not add, let me charge you—to preach Jesus, and salvation through his name."

"Let there be no extremes," says Cecil, "yet I am arrived at this conviction:—men who lead toward the extremes of evangelical privileges in their ministry do much more to the conversion of their hearers than they do who lean toward the extreme of requirement. And my own experience confirms the observation. I feel myself repelled if anything chills, goads, or urges me. This is my nature, and it is the nature of other men. But let me hear the words, 'Son of man, thou hast played the harlot with many lovers; yet return again unto me, saith the Lord,' and immediately I am melted and subdued."

"I have had a view in my sickness," says the same writer, "that I never had before, respecting those opiates which have kept me in a doze, at least, when I ought to have been broad awake. Arts and sciences, literature, curiosities, news, and even nonsense, have wasted hours and days; and that while I had a most important charge to be executed."

"If God should restore me to health," he continues, "I have determined to study nothing but the Bible. Literature is inimical to spirituality, if it be not kept under with a firm hand.

"I have learned more within these curtains than from all the books I ever read. Should it please God ever to raise me up to preach again, Christ shall be my only subject."

Decline of Judaism.

"The observations I made during this visit were instructive and interesting in several respects. I have had occasion to make myself acquainted with the advantages the Jews in Belgium and France have derived from having been entirely emancipated. In a worldly point of view, they are great. The Jew, in these two countries, is no more shut up in a separate quarter; in the eye of the law he is not a Jew, but a Belgian or a Frenchman; he may devote himself to any career, and may rise to the highest office in the state. In fact, that which is lawful to the Gentile is also lawful to the Jew; and I believe they are, with very few exceptions, in easy circumstances. But emancipation has well-nigh annihilated Judaism. The synagogues are empty; the rabbis without influence and without congregations; and thousands of Jews denying their origin, have lost all nationality and love for their own country and Jerusalem. They have Gentilised their names and their manners; and, in a few years, when the census is again taken in Belgium, there will perhaps be not one who declares himself a Jew. In France, if possible, it is even worse. A Jewish French periodical says of the majority of Jews in France, "that they do not visit the synagogues, that they send their children to Gentile schools, do not have their sons circumcised, and are rarely present at any real Jewish ceremonies." They might have added, they have their children baptized soon after they come into the world, like Adolph Cremieux, who had his son and daughter baptized by a Romish priest the morning after their birth; but he himself continues to be a Jew."—Notes of a recent tour on the continent by a Jew.

The Boy Preacher of Louisiana.

Mark Boatner Chapman is now in his fourteenth year. He was born in Clinton, Louisiana, where his parents still reside. About two years ago he was received in the church; very soon after this, he commenced instructing his father's servants on the afternoon of every Sabbath. His custom was to read a chapter and comment upon it, having first closely studied the chapter, consulting Benson, Clark and Wesley on every passage.

He at length began, says a writer to the Memphis Advocate, to speak in the love feasts and class meetings; then to pray in the public congregations. His appearance is that of the merest boy, and he seems wholly unconscious of any superior gifts or attainments. He now preaches regularly every Sabbath at his father's place, near town. His parents have refused to allow him to enter the pulpit and supply the place of the regular minister on the Sabbath, although he is often solicited to do so. He does nothing without permission from his parents. He attends school, and joins in all the amusements of the boys of his own age; he is a mere child everywhere save when preaching. On last Sabbath I sat under his ministry, and have seldom been more edified and delighted with a sermon. His style is chaste, his words fitly and happily chosen. The nicest critic would not detect a grammatical error; his manner is earnest, and his pathetic appeals reach all hearts. Occasionally his feelings overwhelm him, and he gives way to floods of tears.

The most gifted lawyers, doctors and divines have heard him with astonishment and delight. I confess that it is most wonderful, and to me incomprehensible. When I heard him, he preached from the text, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" He preached from notes, sometimes seeming to forget that his notes were before him. His subject was arranged with perfect system, and most logically treated. When through with his sermon he closed the Book, and gave a brief and touching exhortation, under which I could, with others, but weep. His public addresses, published, have attracted much attention, and should he live, he must in his onward course leave a broad wake on the tide of morals. Such is the character of the "Boy Preacher," whose wonderful precocity is without a parallel.—New Orleans Crescent.

☞ The following passage from "The Cry of the Wronged" is full of pathetic truth:—

"Let me work,—I ask no more,—
Till my stint is labored o'er;
I can never lay up store,
None this world will send me:
When I go, if men look there,
They will find my place all bare;
Nothing but the light and air
God was good to lend me."

And this from another poem:

"O men well clothed, and warmed, and filled,
While God's poor children fast,—
The very churches that ye build,
And deck with pomp, and carve, and gild,
Will judge you at the last.

'Where are my poor,' Christ still demands,
'To whom the gospel came?'
This costly offering at your hands
Is to yourselves, and only stands
A monument of shame."

The Doom of the World.

What this change is to be we dare not even conjecture, but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe; the wheeling comets, wielding their loose materials at the solar furnace, the volcanic eruptions in our own satellite, the appearance of new stars, and the disappearance of others, are all foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under heavens that are to pass away—thus treading as it were on the cemeteries, and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation.—North British Review.

Hygiene.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Beecher on Health.

Henry Ward Beecher has recently preached a sermon on health, from which we make a few valuable extracts:

"The relation of man's body to his christian character is highly important. No man can neglect the laws of health without compromising his religious life. A sick man may be a good man, and a sound man may be a bad man; but, as a general proposition, it is true that health and virtue require that every part of a man's nature should be symmetrically developed."

HEALTH A DUTY.

"It may seem strange to some that I should speak of health as a duty; but it is a duty—it is a christian duty. If it is a duty seldom spoken of in the pulpit, so much the worse—so much the more need that we should begin to do better.

"In general, health is a matter of volition." * * * *

"No man may, by a single act of will, be or become healthy; but by a continuous will—that which philosophers call a generic purpose—and by a continuous wisdom, every man may attain health, or maintain it if he has not forfeited it."

* * * *

"Many of the fundamental christian virtues—gentleness, patience, contentment, hope, cheerfulness, courage, are so largely dependent on health, that in all but exceptionable cases they are not to be looked for in the unhealthy. Now and then we find a bed-ridden person that maintains these virtues. Such persons are rare exceptions. They are called saints because they are so rare. But those who minister to the sick, know that they are almost universally deficient in these virtues, in consequence of their physical condition."

MEANS OF GRACE.

"Prayer, meditation, singing, social religious meetings, activity in doing good to others—these all are eminent means of grace, and are to be observed by all with thanksgiving and with assiduous fidelity; but horseback riding, gymnastic exercises, walking, climbing, boating—these, too, may not be, but they may be if properly used. They give health, and health gives an easy performance to very many of the christian graces. There is many and many a man that, by the help of the Bible and the saddle, has gone to heaven with comparative ease, who would not have gone there very easily by the help of either alone! It is taking care of the inward life by spiritual instrumentalities, and taking care of the outward life by physical instrumentalities, that is to make the whole man and the whole man's life."

"I know that there are a great many who feel a repugnance to any such teaching as this, as if it detracted something from religion; as if the grace of God were sufficient to overmatch all mere physical causation. When God is pleased to work miracles, there is nothing that it is not perfectly easy for him to do; but as he is not pleased to work miracles except under extraordinary and emergent circumstances, we are always to judge of what is divinely wise and proper by the average and ordinary course of God in his providence and in nature; and it is very certain that so far as the development of moral character is concerned, God is accustomed to use a healthy condition of the body for the development of sound morality and virtue, and true spiritual thrift. In my own experience, the cases that I have most despaired of, among those who have come to me for spiritual help, have been persons that were nervously sick. I could do them no good, because I could not reach the conditions of their body."

NO ABSOLUTION FROM PHYSICAL VIOLATION.

"If a man beset with manifold temptations comes to me for relief, and he will not sleep more than five hours in twenty-four, when he should sleep eight hours, what can I do for him? Hymns will not cure him. Neither will texts nor sermons. If a person will drink green tea, which is like the quintessence of a thousand needle-points in its effect on a man's nerves, what is the use of his coming to me with complaints about blue devils? They are not blue devils; they are green devils! If a man gorges and oppresses his stomach, and so overlays the keys of life—for the keys of life are located in the stomach, as the keys of the piano and the organ are located in their appropriate places in those instruments—and he comes to me for deliverance from temptations, or the removal of obscurities that stand between his soul and God, unless I can have control of that man's habits of eating, what can I do for him? A minister has not power to follow on after a man's physical indulgences, and rub out the punishments which God means to inflict for those indulgences. And my personal experience has gone to show that in the case of multitudes who are afflicted with what are called moral troubles, these troubles would often have to be traced to morbid conditions of the body; and the rectification of the body would be the restoration of spiritual health."

Cleanliness.

Cleanliness is intimately connected with religion. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive of an uncleanly christian!

Cleanliness should be regarded in every department—in person, in the family, in the house, bed, at table, in garments, and throughout the entire connections of physical life. It costs but little to be clean, when once we set ourselves about it, and the gain of health and comfort is incalculable.

If mothers have a household duty paramount to all others, it is to keep their little children's hands and faces clean, or see that they are so kept. It is a fact—and such is our respect for matronhood that we blush as we give it in—that a good many small boys and girls who are paraded in sumptuous attire, on fine days in Broadway, wear rather a soiled aspect in the nursery. We have a great reverence for soap and water. They form the basis of that fine "institution"—washing, which never did anybody any harm. "Cleanliness," says the old proverb "is next to godliness."

Study neatness, modesty, virtue, purity, love—what things soever are true, honest, just, and of good report.—Ex.

Sleeping under the Clothes.

There is reason to believe (says Miss Florence Nightingale) that not a few of the apparently unaccountable cases of scrofula among children proceed from the habit of sleeping with the head under the bed-clothes, and so inhaling air already breathed, which is further contaminated by exhalations from the skin. Patients are sometimes given to a similar habit; and it often happens that the bed-clothes are so disposed that the patient must necessarily breathe air more or less contaminated by exhalations from the skin. A good nurse will be careful to attend to this. It is an important part, so to speak, of ventilation. It may be worth while to remark, that when there is any danger of bed-sores, a blanket should never be placed under the patient. It retains dampness, and acts like a poultice. Never use anything but light Witney blanket as bed-covering for the sick. The heavy impervious cotton counterpane is bad, for the very reason that it keeps in the emanations from the sick person, while the blanket allows them to pass through. Weak patients are invariably distressed by a great weight of bed-clothes, which often prevent their getting any sound sleep whatever.

Unhealthy Positions.

Those persons engaged in occupations requiring the hands alone to move, while the lower limbs remain motionless, should bear in mind, that without constantly raising the frame to an erect position, and giving exercise to all parts of the body, such a practice will tend to destroy their health. They should also sit in as erect a position as possible. With seamstresses there is always more or less stooping of the head and shoulders, tending to retard circulation, respiration and digestion, and produce curvature of the spine. The head should be thrown back to give the lungs full play. Health cannot be had without free respiration. Strength and robustness must come from exercise. Confined attitudes are in violation of correct theories of healthy physical developements and the instincts of nature. Those accustomed to sit writing for hours, day after day, can form some idea of the exhausting nature of the toilsome and poorly-paid labor of the seamstress.—Indian Arcand.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year.............$2.00
For a single copy 6 months..............1.00
For a single copy 3 months...............50
Five copies to one address for 6 months...4.00
Ten copies to one address for 6 months...8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months..15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months..21.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Sweet Thoughts.

REVISED AND ENLARGED BY M. MATTHEWS.

There is an hour of peaceful rest,
To mourning wanderers given;
There is a joy for souls distressed,
A balm for every wounded breast,
When earth is changed to heaven.

There is a soft and downy bed,
As fair as breath of even,
A couch for weary mourners spread,
Where they may rest the aching head
When earth is changed to heaven.

There is a home for weary souls,
By sin and sorrow driven,
When toss'd on life's tempestuous shoals,
Where storms arise and ocean rolls,
When earth is changed to heaven.

There fragrant flowers immortal bloom,
And joys supreme are given;
There rays divine disperse the gloom,
And mortals triumph o'er the tomb,
When earth is changed to heaven.

There faith lifts up the tearless eye
To brighter prospects given,
And views the tempest passing by,
Sees evening shadows quickly fly,
When earth is changed to heaven.

The bright Jerusalem above
Shall be to Jesus given,
Then all the saints shall gladly prove
The worth of a Savior's love,
That changes earth to heaven.

Parable of the Ten Virgins.—Matt. 25: 10-13.

Although much has been said and written on this parable, and various have been the themes advanced; yet I doubt not it will be evident to all who will carefully examine this subject, that it clearly represents the Advent movement for a few years past, and also for the future, till our heavenly Bridegroom shall come the "second time.".

Who can doubt but what our Savior gave his people, in this parable, a clearly delineated "likeness," or similitude, of the movement of his church, just prior to his second advent?

I am aware that some men reject this view, as I once did; but in doing so, I am confident it produces a confusion of ideas, and a lack of harmony in this, and some other portions of the Scriptures, which a little more discrimination should avoid.

Says the Savior, "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh."

From this parable we learn that, at a certain time—marked by the adverb "then" —the kingdom of heaven shall be "likened," or shall bear resemblance, "unto ten virgins, which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom, etc.

Let us now carefully examine the parable, or similitude, which the Savior has given us, and compare the movement of the church for a few years past, and also its present and future history in this world, as revealed in the Scriptures, and see if there is not a true likeness; or, in other words, whether the similitude given by the Savior is not having its "perfect fulfillment" in the late and present movement of the church! But, however, before attempting to compare the pattern with its likeness, we will give an extract from [illegible], Vol. I., pp. 142-143, in relation to a Jewish marriage, to which our Savior [illegible]

"There was generally an interval of ten or twelve months, and sometimes considerably more, between the time of making the marriage contract, or the day of espousals, and the marriage itself. Thus we read that Samson first went down to Timnath with his parents, and talked with the woman whom he wished for a wife, and 'she pleased him well.' This was the time of espousals; but it was not till after a time that he 'returned to take her' by actual marriage. (Judges 14: 7, 8.) During all this interval, however, while the bride continued still in her father's house, she was considered and spoken of as the lawful wife of the man to whom she was betrothed; so that the bridegroom could not destroy their engagement, if he became unwilling to marry her, without giving her a bill of divorce, in the same manner as if she had been fully wedded; and so, on the other hand, if she proved unfaithful to her espoused husband, she was punished as an adulteress.

"It was between the time of her espousals and her actual marriage that the Virgin Mary, by the power of the Holy Spirit, conceived in her womb the Redeemer of the world. On this occasion Joseph had power, as her betrothed husband, to make her a public example, by causing her to be stoned according to the law; but, at the same time, he was at liberty to give her a bill of divorce, and dismiss her privately. Accordingly, though he considered it his duty to give up his intended marriage, he had too much regard for her reputation, and too much confidence, we may suppose, in her own account of the miracle of her conception, to expose her before the world, and so had concluded to adopt the other course, when the angel relieved his anxiety by commanding him to take her without hesitation. (Matt. 1: 18-20.)

"When the time of marriage arrived, the bride prepared herself for the occasion with the utmost care. She was adorned by her attendants with all the elegance which the taste of the times rendered fashionable; and to complete her joyful appearance, the bridal crown was placed upon her head. The bridegroom presented himself at her father's house, attended with a number of young men of his own age. The wedding festival frequently lasted seven days, as we may see in the case of Samson, and in that of Jacob at a much earlier period. During this time the bridegroom and his companions entertained themselves, in various ways, in one part of the house; while the bride was engaged with a like company of her young female friends in another. It was not considered proper on such occasions, or any other, for young persons of both sexes to mingle together in the festive circle, or even so much as to eat at the same table. In the account of Samson's wedding, we find that one method of giving life to the intercourse of the young men, was to propose riddles, and exercise their ingenuity in explaining them.

"The companions of the bridegroom were sometimes called the children, or sons, of the bride-chamber. On the last day, the bride was conducted to the house of the bridegroom's father. The procession generally set off in the evening, with much ceremony and pomp. The bridegroom was richly clothed with a marriage robe and crown, and the bride was covered with a veil from head to foot. The companions of each attended them with songs and the music of instruments; not in promiscuous assemblages, but each company by itself; while the virgins, according to the custom of the times, were all provided with veils, not indeed so large and thick as that which hung over the bride, but abundantly sufficient to conceal their faces from all around.

"The way, as they went along, was lighted with numerous torches.

"In the mean time, another company was waiting at the bridegroom's house, ready, at the first notice of their approach, to go forth and meet them. These seem generally to have been young female relations or friends of the bridegroom's family, called in at this time, by particular invitation, to grace the occasion with their presence.

"Adorned with robes of gladness and joy, they went forth with lamps or torches in their hands, and welcomed the procession with the customary salutations. They then joined themselves to the marriage train, and the whole company moved forward to the house. There an entertainment was provided for their reception, and the remainder of the evening was spent in a cheerful participation of the marriage supper, with such social merriment as suited to the joyous occasion. None were admitted to this entertainment beside the particular number who were selected to attend the wedding; and as the regular and proper time for their entrance into the house was when the bridegroom went in with his bride, the doors were then closed, and no other guest was expected to come in. Such appear to have been the general ceremonies which attended the celebration of a marriage."

We will now try to elucidate this subject by giving the general outlines of the parable, and the general outlines of the movement of the church, as follows:

PARABLE OR SIMILITUDE.

1. Definite time was given for the virgins to go "forth to meet the bridegroom."

MOVEMENT OF CHURCH OR LIKENESS.

1. Definite time was preached to the church in 1844 for the Savior to come on "the tenth day of the seventh month."

2. Par. The "virgins" having confidence in the time given, "took their lamps," and went forth to meet the bridegroom," leaving their work and all other business, as persons do when they go to a wedding.

2. Mov. The church, having confidence [illegible] in the time preached, took their lamps or the sacred Scriptures, and went forth to meet their Bridegroom—the Savior,—and left their work; farmers left their crops in the field, mechanics closed their shops, merchants their stores, etc., etc.

3. Par. Where did the virgins expect to meet the bridegroom and his company? On the public highway, while journeying towards the place of his future residence.

3. Mov. Where did the church expect to meet their Bridegroom, or the "Son of man" with the "holy angels"? "In the air," (1 Thess. 4: 17) while Jesus would be on his glorious passage from his Father's throne to the new earth, where he is to sit upon "the throne of his father David," . . . and "reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke 1: 32, 33; Rev. 21: 1-4.

4. Par. But the virgins were disappointed in not meeting the bridegroom at the time they first expected!

4. Mov. So were the church disappointed in not meeting their Savior, Jesus, at the time they first expected him.

5. Par. This brought the virgins to a trial of their faith, while the bridegroom "tarried" to them; and thus "they all slumbered and slept."

5. Mov. So this brought the church where the Savior "tarried" to them; and they have all, more or less, slumbered and slept.

6. Par. How long did the bridegroom tarry, or the virgins have to wait for him? Until "midnight;" or quite a long time after they first expected him.

6. Mov. How long will the Savior tarry, or the church have to wait for him? Until they arrive to a point resembling the "midnight" in the parable, or some considerable time after they first expected him.

7. Par. What aroused the virgins? The sign of the bridegroom's approach.

7. Mov. What then will arouse the church? "The sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Matt. 24: 30)

8. Par. What was the sign of the bridegroom's coming? Light of their torches, and the sound of their music.

8. Mov. What will constitute the "sign of the Son of man?" Most likely it will be the "light" which is to be "as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven!" (Luke 17: 24,) and also the "great noise" to be heard when the heavens begin to "pass away!" 2 Pet. 3: 18; Matt. 24: 30.

9. Par. "Then all those virgins"—both wise and foolish—"arose and trimmed their lamps,"—examined them to see if they were "ready!"

9. Mov. Then all, both righteous and wicked, will awake, or be sensible of their true condition, by reflecting upon the commandments, or word of God. They will not need at this time to stop to turn over the leaves of the sacred volume to ascertain whether they are "ready" to meet the Lord; for a moment's reflection will doubtless be sufficient to convince all of their true condition!

10. Par. The "wise" found they were "ready," or had oil in their vessels with their lamps when the cry was made!

10. Mov. So will the saints know, when the sign of the Son of man appears, that they are "ready," having "kept the faith," and will say, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us!" (Isa. 25: 9.)

11. Par. The "foolish" found they were not "ready," for their lamps were "going out!"

11. Mov. Thus the wicked will know that they are not "ready," and they will all "mourn," (Matt. 24: 30) or cry for help; but they will find their light going out,—their hope of salvation failing them!

12. Par. The foolish then cried to the wise for help, or "oil;" but the wise replied, "not so, lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves!" Or in other words,—"Rather than we all should be rendered unfit to go, by dividing our oil with you, you must make the best shift you can for yourselves,—"buy for yourselves," if you are able. But, "while they went to buy, the bridegroom came!"

12. Mov. So the wicked, no doubt, will then cry to the saints for help; but it will be too late! they will have no oil, or grace to spare! The pious father cannot aid, at this time, his ungodly son! nor can the godly mother assist her vain and unholy daughter! let their lamentations be ever so bitter! none can give aid to them; it will be too late! "The door will be shut!"

13. Par. This shows that the foolish might have obtained oil at any time before the "cry" was made, but not afterwards!

13. Mov. This proves that the wicked can find salvation at any time before the day of the Son of man appears, but not [illegible]

14. Par. The "wise" went and "met the bridegroom" on the public highway, and then all returned together to the place of the bridegroom's residence, where they had been before, and then they eat the "marriage supper."

14. Mov. So the righteous will then arise to "meet the Lord in the air!" (1 Thess. 4: 17.) in his pathway from heaven to earth again; and when the earth is purified by fire, (2 Pet. 3: 7; 10-13,) they will all return to earth again, (Rev. 21: 1-4,) where Jesus and his saints had been before, and then they will eat the "marriage supper" in the "kingdom." Rev. 19: 9; Luke 22: 16.

15. Par. Those foolish virgins who were not "ready," or had no oil when the "cry" was made, never succeeded in getting ready, for the "door was shut" against them.

15. Mov. So with the wicked, they will then find that the day of grace is over with them; their cries will come too late! the door will be shut! and they must hear the sentence,—"Depart, ye cursed!"

REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE.

1. R. on Par. It appears that only one time was set, by the bridegroom and his associates, for the virgins to take their lamps and to go forth to meet the bridegroom.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MOVEMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. R. on Mov. This appears to indicate that there can be but one real definite time movement for the church that can claim justification by the word of God.

2. R. on Par. If, but one time was set for the "marriage," then, after the virgins had once gone forth, it would be all tarrying, or waiting in a state of suspense, till the "cry" was made "at midnight."

2. R. on Mov. This indicates that it will be all tarrying to the church, or a waiting in suspense, after going out on time, agreeable to the parable, till "the sign of the Son of man appears."

3. R. on Par. The virgins would not have been justified in fixing on any other time for the marriage, than that on which they first come forth!

3. R. on Mov. Neither can the church be justified in fixing on new points of time, after they have once gone forth to meet the Savior, agreeable to the similitude set forth in the parable.

4. R. on Par. The wise were not positive that they should meet the bridegroom at a precise point of time, and, therefore, "took oil in their vessels with their lamps," —enough to last them till he did come, let the time be longer or shorter—for they knew not when the time was! but still they were "ready," because they had the oil.

4. R. on Mov. Those who are more modest in their pretensions to a knowledge of the definite time for the Savior to come, but still are determined to hold on to the word and spirit of the Lord till he does come; and thus wait because they "know not when" the time is, (Mark 13: 33,) we think will be as likely to retain "the spirit of Christ," and thus be "ready" when he comes.

5. R. on Par. The "foolish" were rather positive, for they made no provision for any delay of the bridegroom! They took no oil in their vessels; but by their conduct seemed to say,—"The bridegroom is coming just at the point of time we are looking for him! he will not tarry! we have oil enough; we are not of the doubtful class!

5. R. on Mov. Is it not evident that those who have been the most positive in regard to definite time for the coming of our Savior, have, also, often manifested a censorious and unkind spirit toward those who have conscientiously differed with them in opinion? And if so, is their prospect for salvation any better than that of their less confident brethren?

T. M. PREBLE.

Concord, N. H.

[From "Christ our Life," by C. F. Hudson.]

Passages supposed to imply the Immortality of the Lost.

(Concluded.)

John 3: 36; "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not on the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

Here again the antithesis would suggest that they who do not see life shall strictly die. And the natural dramatism of which we have just seen the examples would justify us in supposing that God's wrath abides on the lost in that it forbids their return to life and being. This would agree with the true sense of Ps. 9: 17; "The wicked shall be turned back (shuhb) into Sheol, and all the nations that forget God." Viz, their resurrection shall not be unto life; they have no escape from the grasp of death.

But while the words of the text admit this sense, the context and the commentators [illegible] sustain another. See vs. 18, 19. The world is condemned already; the believer finds pardon and life; upon the unbeliever the sentence of death remains, awaiting until it be executed. Thus Calvin: "I am not dissatisfied with the view given by Augustine that the word 'abideth' is used to inform us that from the womb we were appointed to death, because we were all born the children of wrath (Eph. 2: 3). At least I willingly admit an allusion of this sort, provided we hold the true and simple meaning to be what I have stated, that death hangs over all unbelievers, and keeps them oppressed and overwhelmed in such a manner that they can never escape." Here is nothing described beyond the judgment. And with this view agree Erasmus, Zanchius: "As a constant faith is a sign of election, so obstinate infidelity is a sign of reprobation;" Perkins (on the Creed), Lightfoot, Gill: "Very remarkable are the following words of the Jews concerning the Messiah, whom they call the latter Redeemer: 'Whosoever believes on him shall live; but he that believes not in him shall go to the nations of the world, and they shall kill him.'" And Dr. G. adds, on the phrase in question; "The sentence will never be reversed, but will be executed." See also Doddridge, Kuinoel, Alford.

Rev. 22: 11; "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still."

This passage somewhat resembles the above, and we therefore examine it here, out of connexion with others in the Apocalypse. The elder Edwards, like many others, adduces it to support the view of eternal sinfulness. Yet even he remarks upon it: "Thus Christ takes leave of his Church till his last coming, warning them to improve the means of grace they have, and informing them that they are never to have any other." (Works, I. 620.) This suggests the true sense, which is thus stated by the Venerable Bede: "Evil men are permitted to wax worse, or to reach the climax of wickedness, so they shall find God's judgment to be just." It is given more fully by Lowman: "The providence of God will indeed permit things to continue in this world, just as these things represent the state of them. Men of evil principles and corrupt hearts will continue in acts of injustice and oppression, and to promote false religion and wickedness, notwithstanding all the cautions of religion and judgments of Providence. Yet the cautions, directions, and encouragements of these prophecies, and the judgments of Providence foretold in them, will have a better effect on good minds, to their perseverance in truth, righteousness, and holiness." And the more critical examination of the principal words confines their import to the scenes of time. Thus Daubuz: "'He that wrongeth' (or the unjust) denotes, in a peculiar manner, throughout this prophecy, the persecution and murder of the same . . . . 'He which is filthy' seems principally to denote those who shall be guilty of idol worship . . . These prophecies will be of great use, as they shall contribute to the constancy of the righteous and the holy, though they should not effect a general reformation in the world; though men of evil principles and wicked hearts shall still remain persecutors and idolators." . . . . .

2 Pet. 2: 17: "These are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest; to whom is reserved the mist of darkness for ever." Jude ver. 13: "Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever."

The Syriac renders the passage in Jude: "Shooting stars," etc. And the allusion to meteors or comets is favored by Beausobre and L'Enfant, Bretschneider, Arndt, Stier, DeWette, Bloomfield, Gardiner. The figure seems to be that of eternal extinction. So in the Book of Enoch, 91: 3: "Sin shall perish in eternal darkness, nor be seen from this time forward for evermore." And compare Prov. 24: 20: "The candle of the wicked shall be put out." As we have already observed, gehenna is associated with the notion of darkness. Thus the Targum on 1 Sam. 2: 9: "The wicked shall be avenged in gehenna, in darkness." And on Ps. 37: 20: "Like fowls, fattened and afterwards killed, so shall the wicked perish and be consumed in the smoke of gehenna." The terror of eternal night, even aside from the notion of punishment, is finely depicted in the Septuagint and Vulgate of Job 10: 21, 22, as above, p. 128.

These passages, and others that might be adduced, show good reason for taking the phrase in question as synonymous with the "Chaos and old Night" which was only another name for non-existence. And the dramatism involved in and connected with it might be offered as further argument for our view of Matt. 25: 46, if that were at all needed.

Luke 16: 23: "And in hell (Hades) he lifted up his eyes, being in torments; and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom." Ver. 26: "And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you can not; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence."

The distinction between Hades and Gehenna has been often remarked by biblical writers; and the passage itself, in what is said of the "five brethren" as still living, shows that here is no description of the final state. "'Abraham's bosom,'" says Trench, "is not heaven, though it will issue in heaven; so neither is 'Hades' hell, though it will issue in it, when death and Hades shall be cast into the lake of fire, which is the proper hell. (Rev. 20: 14.)" (Notes on the Parables, p. 379.) And Olshausen: "The distinction here drawn between Hades and Gehenna is essential to the understanding of many obscure passages. The ancient church, which firmly maintained the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, acknowledged this distinction without qualification. It lies also at the foundation of the rabbinical writings." And we may add that there are traces of this very parable in these writings, indicating that Christ derived it from the Jews, who were certainly not likely to copy it from him. And as a parable the passage may be simply representative of general truth, and in itself purely dramatic, as is Isa. 14: 9-20. But at the most the words describe no more than do the "everlasting chains" of Jude 6, which bind unto the day of final judgment. Accordingly, Olshausen remarks: "Rightly to understand the whole delineation, we must above all keep clearly in view that it is not everlasting salvation or condemnation which is here described, but the middle state of departed souls between death and the resurrection." He afterwards repeats: "In our parable, therefore, there can be no possible reference to the everlasting condemnation of the rich man."

We need not here examine the arguments by which some have indirectly inferred the immortality of the lost from the passage. This we have done elsewhere, showing, we trust, that whatever inequality of sufferings among the lost before the judgment may be supposed to accrue, even then the eternity and infinity of their sufferings would not follow; but such reasoning would involve far greater difficulties than those it seeks to relieve—which can be no difficulties whatever with God.

2 Pet. 2: 4: "God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell (tartarosas), and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment."

This passage is almost identical with that in Jude, ver. 6, already examined. The word rendered "hell" is neither Hades nor Gehenna, but the Greek for Tartarus made into a verb. The knowledge of this original, the force of the prevailing view, and the influence of Milton's Paradise Lost, have promoted the belief that the final punishment of the lost is now being endured by the fallen angels; and "Tartarus" becomes, if not the lowest gehenna, at least a living Pandæmonium.

But the passage itself declares that those angels are "reserved unto judgment," and we should ask 'Do the Scriptures inform us where they now are? The answer is at hand. Satan, their acknowledged leader, is called "the prince of the power (or host) of the air" (Eph. 2: 2). He is said to go to and fro in the earth, and to walk up and down in it (Job 1: 7). He is a roaring lion, walking about, seeking whom he may devour (1 Pet. 5: 8). We read also of a warfare against "spiritual wickedness in high places," or wicked spirits in the skies (Eph. 6: 12). And the passage so often quoted for proof of Satan's eternal suffering (Rev. 20: 10) shows that he will not be consigned to it until a full thousand years after he is bound in the "bottomless pit," or the abyss (abussos), and even that restraint is still future.

The English reader may then safely infer that the Tartarus of which Peter speaks is not Gehenna, however Plato (Repub. 1: 10) or any one else may have used the word. It can yield no argument whatever for the common view. Yet we may show with what latitude the term has actually been used. Suidas gives as a definition, "The place in the clouds." Cudworth remarks that the same word is used by Apollodorus and other Greek writers, "when they speak of the Titans being cast down from heaven; which seems to have been really nothing else but this fall of angels poetically mythologized." And he adds, "by Tartarus here, in all probability, is meant this lower caliginous air, or atmosphere of the earth, according to that of St. Austin (De Gen. ad Lit., l. 3, c. 10) concerning these angels: 'That after their sin they were thrust down into the misty darkness of this lower air'" . . . (Intell. Syst., III., 303.) Ps. 148: "The devil was condemned to that murky region, that is, to the atmosphere." And Jerome remarks on Eph. 6: 12; "For this is the opinion of all the doctors, that the air, which divides between the earth and heaven, is full of contrary powers." Which statement is confirmed by Petavius (De Angelis, 1. 3, c. 4.) Œcumenius speaks of Satan as "the prince of evil spirits that are in the air." And Windet, citing the varied use of the term, concludes: "We should say, then, that the angels that sinned are exiled from that region of light in which they formerly dwelt; and are detained in the dark and murky atmosphere, just as criminals are bound with chains in a prison." (De Statu Vita Funct., § 13, p. 266.) See also Parkhurst, on the word; Whitby, Macknight, and Clarke, on the passage; and Wetstein on Jude, ver. 6.

Mark 1: 24; Luke 4: 34; "Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us?" Matt. 8: 29; "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" Comp. Mark 5: 7; Luke 8: 28.

The latter passage shows again that the evil spirits or dæmons are not now in gehenna, and goes to confirm the dramatic character of the parable in Luke 16: 19-31. For if these spirits were not yet in torment, why should the rich man be in his, ere his final judgment? But, not to insist on this, we observe that a constructive argument is based on these two passages to show that wicked spirits will not perish from being. The question, "Art thou come to destroy us?" is supposed to require a negative answer; and it is inferred that they who ask it will never be destroyed, but their final punishment will be simply torment.

But in this argument the word "destroy" is taken in its literal sense, which is a good precedent for its being so taken elsewhere; and we shall then infer that wicked men will be finally thus destroyed. (Matt. 10: 28; 21: 41; Acts 3; 23; Rom. 9: 22; Phil. 3: 19; 2 Thess. 1: 9.) But though Jesus did not then "come to destroy" the dæmons, we can not infer their immortality. The question which they asked in their trepidation can bear no argument. It may equally mean: "Art thou come to destroy us before the time?" Just as a convict under sentence of death may ask of his jailor coming in unexpectedly, "Are you come to lead me to execution?" i. e., before the time. And in the account given by Mark of apparently the same transaction recorded in Matt. 8: 29, the words are: "I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not." And in that by Luke; "I beseech thee, torment me not." In all the accounts an untimely and tormenting destruction may be the thing deprecated; and this view alone, so far as we can see, will reconcile them all.

Rom. 2: 8, 9; "But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness; indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile."

From this passage a reviewer in the Methodist Quarterly (July, 1858, pp. 413, 414) endeavors to support the received view. We are not certain that he cites the phrase "every soul of man that doeth evil" as applying to the soul in distinction from the body. This is done by some writers; but De Wette remarks that if this were the sense we should have read, "upon the soul of every man," or, "every soul of men.". . . Compare Rom. 13: 1. In Acts 3: 23, orthodox writers would be slow to admit that "soul" denotes the immaterial nature in man, instead of "person."

If, now, the "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish," were here called eternal, our reviewer might press his argument. But the fact that they are not called eternal, in so vivid a description of God's judgment, and while the contrasted "life" is called "eternal" (ver. 7,) is very significant. Moreover in the same close connection "immortality" is spoken of as a thing to be attained; in ch. 1: 32, "death" is named as the penalty of God's law; and in ch. 2: 12, we read: "As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law." We can only infer that the "indignation, wrath," etc., are the natural concomitants and tokens of death to those who are "judged by the law."

"HE WENT AWAY SORROWFUL."—How much that young man had! And yet he was sorrowful. He had youth. He was of God's chosen people. The rich blood of Eastern manhood mantled on his cheek. Yet sorrowful! He had wealth, great possessions; and he loved them, too. [illegible]

For the Crisis.

Notes by the Way.

After burying my father, I took my mother to visit her friends in Monson. She showed me the place where she first commenced the duties of bringing up her family of eleven children. This recalled former times. She could not realize that fifty-four years had passed away since she took me in her arms and wandered the field beside the mill pond, to pass off the lonesome hours until father returned from his day's work. All this was calculated to enforce the fact that she was now a widow. All these scenes told us—"time is short." "Be ye also ready." And as that is my message to this world, I felt more than ever determined to press this subject home. Our friend had obtained the Methodist church for me. I spoke to them for the first time. There was good attention.

Boston. Good time here as usual. Also at Exeter. A large house. Baptized twice. Went to Portsmouth, my old home, that I have earned by many hard battles; but found it all peace this time. Had a week of rejoicing with old and tried friends and young converts.

Started for the barn meeting in Pittsfield. After riding fifty miles in a freight train, took a wagon ride of sixteen miles over a mountainous road. Found the barn filled full. Took for a text, Jer. 12: 5. This best corresponded with my feelings. But when I saw the converts from London Ridge, their faces shining with the glory of God, their hearts full of praise, their mouth full of prayer, I forgot my trials, and mounted the old cart for a pulpit, feeling greatly honored to be in such company. In the first meeting two backsliders broke down, and one sinner, a young man, arose and requested prayers. God heard and blessed the sinner. After meeting I was told that that young man had attempted suicide a few days before, had barely escaped death, and was then very feeble from the loss of blood, and could not speak naturally. But God forgave him, as he will all that come to him.

Sunday. A great gathering. The teams reminded me of campmeeting. The barn was full. One large floor, one long stable, two scaffolds, a good sized bay, and many outside. Good attention, some scolding, some blushing, many rejoicing, others crying. It was a profitable time. God blessed the effort, owned his truth, strengthened believers, convicted sinners and backsliders by scores. The final result is not mine. Left Sunday eve for Loudon Ridge, the old battle field of last March. The pressing invitation from the warm hearts of those young converts, who had come ten miles to meet me at this meeting, compelled me to go home with them and hold a meeting Monday evening in Bro. Batchelder's kitchen, the birth place of many of them. I rejoiced to learn that not one of them had fallen, but others had been added by the consistent walk and personal effort of these converts. They seem to be baptized into one body in Christ. The persecution they endure from hypocrites and unbelievers only drives them together and to God. Three were overcome with the powerful influence of God's Spirit.

Monday eve. This was an old-fashioned powerful meeting, that always did and will wake up the devil and his agents to oppose. But, thank God, there are some yet who know how they worship, as in days past.

I left early Tuesday for my next appointment, not expecting to see this little class of soldiers again until we meet in the kingdom of God. In company with Bro. Sanborn I rode seventeen miles to take the cars for Dover. While there a circumstance occurred worthy of note. A man came in cursing and swearing because he could not get a two dollar bill changed. He attracted the attention of all in the depot. I told him I could give him the change. Took out my wallet, poured out the change on the table, and told him to help himself, he looking astonished, and saying he was called dishonest, or something to that effect. After he took his change, I found a dollar bill he carelessly left on the table,—gave it to him, he thanking me. Soon he gave me a wink to step out of the building, when he offered me some gin for my accommodation. I told him that was not the kind of spirit I was in the habit of using. He said it was good Holland gin, and that he sold a barrel of it a week. He wished me to tell what kind I used. I told him I had used the Spirit of God for twenty-five years. On this he asked my pardon, went a few steps, came back, and asked, "Are you a preacher?" "I talk to the people about temperance, righteousness, and a judgment to come."

Said he, "Was you in West Alton one year ago?"

"Yes."

"Was the meeting in the woods, in an old meeting-house?"

"Yes."

"I was there Sunday, and recollect the subject. It did me fifty cents' worth of good."

He give me two quarters and went off. Soon the cars whistled. He came back and offered me a ticket for Dover, and took a seat with me. I commenced conversation about his course, the wickedness of the world, signs of the times, etc.

He said, "I could tell you things that would make you stare, for I am posted. I keep a liquor shop, and gamble, and you can judge what else follows in that train. I made up my mind to enjoy myself every way I can. I pay $25 to $30 to the church yearly, to keep them peaceable and not interrupt me in my business. Some of the members visit my place slyly, drink, and do the same things I do." He then pointed out three gentlemanly looking men. "They are all gamblers, going to celebrate the fourth in that way," etc.

When we arrived at Dover, he found I was going to Exeter, and claimed the privilege of paying for my ticket in addition to what he had already done, and wished me to come and see him, and he would get a house for me to preach in, and pay $10 himself. Gave me his address, and requested prayers. As I took the cars he stood looking. I think he had got some of that good Spirit.

Portsmouth. Here I enjoyed two days' rest. Had the privilege of attending a grove meeting the 4th, and hearing Brn. Pratt and Champlin preach. Good news came from the barn meeting. Bro. Emerson came down nearly forty miles, and a man with him who had been considered a hopeless case. The barn meeting did him good, and he came that distance to this meeting. God's work is crooked and strange to us in such peculiar cases like this.

Lynn. Here they have been distracted. But things look more encouraging now. Bro. Hutchinson has just moved in among them, and will be a help to them.

Salem. Found the people in a good, quiet state, under the labors of Bro. Berick.

After finishing two weeks more, I shall go home to commence the duties of preparing for the annual campmeeting at Wilbraham, which bids fair to be the largest and best meeting we have had there yet. I hope all that come will come to work for the salvation of others, and secure our own by doing it.

HIRAM MUNGER.

For the Crisis.

Important to Sick Ministers.

BRETHREN:—The following generous offer concerns you. I cut it from The Water Cure Journal for July. I improve the opportunity and you will not regret doing so. Do not fail to write F. Wilson Hurd first, or if you please, to James C. Jackson, M. D. And if you come be prepared to pay from 75 cts. to $1 per week for your lodging and washing, as there is now no room for you in the "HOME." I too will send you Tracts and Circulars on receipt of postage. These are 13, postage one cent apiece. "Our Home" Institution is not only a splendid Infirmary, but an excellent Health College as well.

D. T. TAYLOR.

Dansville, N. Y.

TO CLERGYMEN.

Gentlemen:—The Proprietors of Our Home—a Water-Cure located in Dansville, Livingston Co., N. Y.,—respectfully invite as many of you who are sick, as we can accommodate, to become at any time our guests without charge for three months, and to take a course of treatment for that length of time should your conditions require it.

To those of you who are addicted to the use of Tobacco, Ardent Spirits, Drug-poisons, Tea, Coffee, or Opium, and would like to be relieved from your dependence on them, we extend the same invitation. The large experience which our Physicians have had in aiding persons to change their habits in these respects, warrant us in holding out to you a good deliverance, and in short time.

Should you accept our invitation, and at the time of your announcement to us that you will do so we should be unable to lodge you, we will give you board and treatment —providing you will find lodgings in town, which can be done at small expense.

If you are unable to leave your homes, and yet would like advice for Home treatment for yourselves, or any member of your families, our Physicians, of whom James C. Jackson, M. D., is Physician-in-chief, on receipt of descriptions of your ailments, and stamps to prepay their answers, will promptly make out prescriptions and mail them to you.

The only proviso we annex is, that you write to us, before you come, and give us minute statements of your conditions, that that we may judge as far as able of your diseases and their curability, and that you satisfy us that you are connected with some Religions Denomination, or occupy with respectability independent clerical positions.

Circulars of Our Home, as also copies of our Health Tracts, will be forwarded to you on receipt of letters requesting them to be sent, and inclosing postage stamps to prepay them. Hoping, gentlemen, that those of your number who are invalids will receive our invitation in the same spirit in which we tender it, we have the honor to be your obedient servants,

F. WILSON HURD & CO.

The Hudson and Cobb Discussion.

The Free Will Baptist Quarterly says:—"Mr. Hudson exhibits the more calmness, modesty, fairness, ability, learning, and strength. He is a man of rare scholarship, of admirable temper, and clear discrimination; his style is lucid, compact, precise, and vigorous.... Pre-eminently he is a man of soft words and hard arguments....

Mr. Cobb is the more enthusiastic, self-complacent, wordy and windy debater, not without ability, but hardly justifying such a flourish of trumpets as announces his onset, by any force or skill displayed on the battle-field. He is always victor in his own estimation."

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, JULY 25, 1860.

Boston.

We spent the 8th of July in Boston, and had profitable and interesting meetings. The truth is spreading, and several members of the different churches are becoming satisfied that the Bible speaks the truth when it says, "The dead know not any thing." Their eyes are joyfully open to the simple teaching of the Scriptures. They are surprised that they did not see before how plainly the Bible teaches that the wicked will be destroyed, and that the saints shall inherit the earth. Two young converts were baptised in the waters of old ocean, at the close of the afternoon service.

Those who visit Boston, will find prayer meetings at our office, 167 Hanover street, every Monday and Thursday evening.

New Bedford.

Our visit to New Bedford was both pleasant and profitable. The church in this "city of palaces" is growing under the faithful labors of Bro. J. Couch, their present pastor. They have learned the valuable lesson, that the cause of truth is advanced but little, unless it is done by earnest and persevering effort. They see that the adversary of all righteousness is trying in every possible way to prevent all religious excitement, and persuade the followers of Christ to be conservative. In most churches of the day, the enemy is making alarming success. If he cannot succeed in keeping the earnest minds quiet, and in a conservative state, he will endeavor to array them against each other on politics or some disputed theological point, and thus make them devour one another by roots of bitterness. His devices seem to be well understood by the New Bedford church, who are heartily engaged in an "irrepressible conflict" against every thing opposed to the interests of King Emmanuel.

At 9 o'clock we found some of them assembled to teach the way of life to the sailors, who were gathered at the Bethel. This meeting is under the direction of the Methodists, who are active in their efforts to rescue the men of the sea from the road that leads to destruction. They have been quite successful; and we were glad to see our brethren and sisters so free from sectarianism, that they could cheerfully unite in this noble enterprise.

In the morning, the brethren and sisters go around to the ships and docks, and wherever they can find the sailors, and invite them to come to the Bible class, where they are entreated to serve the Lord, and secure eternal life.

When we first went in with Bro. Arnold, at an early hour, we found none assembled. Soon the wife of the city missionary came in, to whom we were introduced. In a few moments, she went out to gather in the sailors. Among others, she met a young man from Ct., by the name of Bradley, well known by our brethren at Litchfield. We met this young man at the Collinsville campmeeting, two years since. Since that time he has been a wicked, backslidden sailor, roaming over the briny deep. When asked by this sister to come into the Bethel Sabbath school, he remarked that he was going up to Kempton street, to see Mr. Grant. She informed him that he was in the Bethel. He at once came in to make some inquiries concerning Bro. L. Barber, W. Austin, and others in Litchfield, wishing to hear of their welfare. After answering a few inquiries, we invited and urged him to go with us to the land of glory. The Lord aided by his Holy Spirit, and he was persuaded to attend meeting with us all day, in his sailor dress. Adverse winds had blown across his pathway, he had become weary of earth's changing scenes, and began to long for a rest in Jesus. He was kindly cared for during the day by our brethren and sisters, and in the evening he gave his heart again to the Savior, and prayed the Lord to have mercy on him and forgive him. His prayer was heard, and he rose to express his determination to be a faithful christian.

During the day, several of our brethren and sisters were scattered around in different parts of the city, in Sabbath schools, among the sailors and "The Fallen," trying to persuade them to prepare for the approaching judgment. Their labors are signally blessed. Quite a number of sailors and harlots have been converted in their union meetings during the past few months, and the work is still onward.

The time seems to have come, when we are to "go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in." Of all classes, we, as a people, ought to be the most active in this cause. The Lord has done great things for us, and it is our duty to let our light shine. Let every one throw down his sectarian gloves and take hold of the work in earnest. We have no time to lose. Soon it will be too late; the harvest will be past and the summer ended. Remember, "He that winneth souls is wise."

Notice.—To our Subscribers.

The bills which we have just sent out we hope shall not be looked upon by our friends as "duns." There are a few who need to be shook up a little, who are in arrears, some of them two years and more. There are others to whom we would not perhaps have sent bills even now; but we are about to transcribe our list to a new and larger Subscription Book, the present one not being large enough for our increasing numbers; and we wish to have it as free from old scores as possible. The usefulness of the paper greatly depends upon its being unfettered by debt; of which there is no fear, if our friends will but promptly pay up, ever keeping in mind that "payment in advance" is our rule, and the surest way to carry on the work.

We would also again urge those who are indebted to our office for books, to send us the money, or what they can of it, as we really cannot afford such long credit as some of our friends seem to enforce.

The Law of Conscience.

It is often said that conscience is our punisher, both in this life and the one to come. Those who hold that men receive all their punishment in this life, claim that it consists in remorse of conscience for evil deeds; while many of those who believe in the doctrine of eternal misery affirm that the suffering is the result of the stings of conscience. It should be observed that the Bible teaches no such doctrine, but declares in the most positive, unequivocal manner, that "the wages of sin is DEATH."

If remorse of conscience is the punishment for sin, we shall find it inversely as the crime; or, in other words, the greater and more frequent the crimes, the less the punishment. Let us look at facts on this point.

In the confession of Hicks, who was recently executed for murdering all on board the sloop E. A. Johnson, and who had murdered several others at different times, he says:—"I had too often dyed my murderous hands in blood in days gone by to feel the slightest compunctions or qualms of conscience then." He was one of the class of which the Bible speaks, who had "their conscience seared." If the Lord has designed to punish men by remorse of conscience, he has so arranged it that the most vile get the least, or even none at all; while the one who is trying to do just right in everything, but once in awhile makes a mistake, has the greatest punishment; for those in the latter class are the ones who feel most keenly the stings of conscience. Then it follows, if conscience is the punisher, that the way to escape punishment entirely is to steep ourselves in sin so thoroughly, like Hicks, as to sear the conscience and completely silence its voice.

We all know from our own experience, that during the last week of our travel in the broad road that leads to destruction, we could do things without remorse that would have caused us much sorrow in early youth. This is a law of conscience in the unconverted man.

When speaking of his plan for the murder of the captain and others on board of the E. A. Johnson, Hicks says:—"I marked out the course I intended to pursue exactly, and after I had decided upon every thing, I went to sleep, and slept as soundly as ever I slept in my life, my mind was so contented at the idea of having at last an opportunity of making some money in an easy way."

After he had committed the horrible deed and awfully mangled his victims, he says:—"I did not feel the slightest regret for what I had done, and went about removing the bodies as coolly as though they had been so much old lumber." Could he have done this without the "slightest regret" when he was a boy? Certainly not.

Hence it follows, that if remorse of conscience is the punishment for sin, it is inversely as the crime; and consequently, the most wicked receive the least.

Queries.

MR. EDITOR: SIR,—Being a constant reader of your valuable paper, by the politeness of Capt. ——, and thereby learning your readiness to give your opinion of the meaning of any and every portion of holy Writ, I wish you would, through the Crisis, give the meaning of the three first verses of the sixteenth chapter of the first of Corinthians; and also what is meant by the words, "this grace," in the 19th verse of the 8th chapter of 2d Corinthians.

W. D. CROSFIELD.

Beverly, Mass.

The first scripture referred to, reads as follows:—"Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem." This seems to explain itself. We do not see how comments could make it plainer. Paul had instructed the church at Corinth to take up a collection every sabbath, or first day of the week, for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Each was to give as the Lord had prospered him. And when Paul should come among them, he would have them appoint a proper person or persons to carry the gift to Jerusalem."

The second passage, commencing with the 18th verse reads as follows:—"And we have sent with him (Titus,) the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind." Here we have the accomplishment of what Paul proposed in the first letter to the Corinthians. In company with Titus, they had sent another, whose praise was in all the churches, to assist in the distribution of their bounty. "Grace" is from the Greek word karis, which is defined in this passage to mean, "a gift of money, alms, liberal contribution."—Greenfield. The same word occurs in the 4th ver. of the chap., and is rendered gift, where Paul, in speaking of their liberality, says, "they prayed us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints." It appears that quite a large amount had been contributed, and it seemed necessary to have judicious men appointed to see to its distribution.

Thompson's translation of the 19th to the 22d verses, reads:—"And not only so, but he hath been chosen by the congregations to accompany us with this bounty; the distribution of which we have undertaken for the glory of the Lord and your readiness, using this precaution that none may blame us in the distribution of this large sum; being careful to conduct ourselves well, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men."

Wesley renders it "gift;" Whiting—"bounty;" Griesbach—"munificence;" Mace—"collection;" Wakefield—liberality; Syriac—"beneficence." All harmonize with the idea that "this grace" in ver. 19th signifies the gift from the Corinthian congregations to the poor saints at Jerusalem.

Will some one tell me whether Onesimus, mentioned by Paul, in his letter to Philemon, was a slave or servant that had been purchased with money?

2 Were those servants, whom Paul exhorts to be obedient to their own masters, (Eph. ch. 6: 6–9; Col. 4: 1) such as American slaves?

J. KELLOGG.

Perhaps we cannot better answer the foregoing inquiries, than by quoting from an article in the American Baptist, relative to Dr. Hacket's translation of Philemon.

The word rendered servant is doulos, of which the writer says:—

"If doulos means slave, then bondman is not a faithful translation of doulos, because bond does not mean slave. Further, if doulos means slave, then Dr. H. is wrong in rendering it servant, for servant does not necessarily mean slave. I have been a bond-boy, but I was not a slave-boy. I am now a bondman, but I am not a slave-man. Paul was bound with a chain, but this did not make him a slave. If bondman is the proper translation of doulos, then make the translation uniform. Call Jesus the bondman of the Father. Call the Apostles the bondmen of Jesus Christ; for doulos is used to denote the relation and service of them all. Has the Spirit of God selected a word so mean, so low, so vile, so contemptible as that of slave or bondman, to signify the voluntary, free, cheerful and honorable service of his devoted, loving, willing children? The very thought is preposterous. Whoever would make a translation of the Bible into our language and uniformly render doulos slave or bondman, would consign his work not simply to the shades, but to a darkness that would be felt in less than twenty-five years. The intelligence of the age would not receive such a version....

The Bible speaks of "the bond of the covenant, the bond of peace, the bond of perfectness, bonds and afflictions abide me, an ambassador in bonds, begotten in my bonds, also of the bonds of the gospel," but it does not use the word bond as synonymous with our word slave.

There is a simple method by which we can find out the meaning of doulos as applied to Onesimus. You should first take into consideration the fact that doulos is a proselyte to the Hebrew. That in Hebrew there is no word for slave or bondman, with our English ideas of these words attached to it. The word for servant is evedh, the word denoting to labor is avadh. Both these words had an honorable meaning, and were used to denote the service of freemen, or men who received a remuneration for the labor they performed. In translating these words from the Hebrew into the Greek, they must of necessity partake of the Hebrew meaning of voluntary service, and not an involuntary service, which might be found in classic Greek. Then examine the sense in which our Lord uses doulos in the gospels, and without fear of successful controversy I say, that you will not find him ever using it in the Roman sense, or in our sense of slave."

BRO. GRANT:—Please to give an exposition of "We fly away," as found in Psalms 90: 10."—W. Nichols.

The verse reads as follows: "The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away." The Hebrew word gooph, here rendered "fly away," also means "faint away," as defined by Gesenius, and used in the Scriptures.

The Septuagint reads, "For weakness overtakes us, and we shall be chastened." The same word occurs in the following passages. "He was fast asleep and weary." Jud. 4: 21. "The people were faint."—1 Sam. 14: 28. This was said of a company who had been in battle all day without eating. "And the people were very faint."—1 Sam. 14: 31. "And David waxed faint."—2 Sam. 21: 15. In the passage under examination, the plain idea appears to be, that after we become fourscore years, we soon become "weary" and "faint away"—no strength left—and soon die.

ANTI-TOBACCO PUBLICATIONS.—The publications of the American Anti-Tobacco Society are for sale at Nos. 5, 9 and 13, Cornhill, Boston, and also by Geo. Trask, at the Depository, Fitchburg, Mass. Among them are the following: Six Tracts for Young America or Boys. A variety of Tracts for Raisers, Sellers, Smokers, Chewers, and Snuffers. A variety for Ladies, Clergymen, Physicians and others. The Zoological Temperance Convention; The Rev. Solomon Spittle; Uncle Tobey's Stories about Tobacco, for Youth and Schools of all sorts; Anti-Tobacco Envelopes, and a variety of handsome Cards, large and small, for Bands of Hope.

THE PROPHETIC EXPOSITOR comes to us with a new name and dress, quite improved. It is now called the Bible Expositor, and is published at Seneca Falls, N. Y. Bro. T. G. Newman, of Seneca Falls, is assistant Editor, and printer. It is octavo form, and now published weekly instead of semi-monthly, at half its usual size, and has a very neat appearance.

☞ We can now supply orders for our late discussion with J. S. Loveland, (Spiritualist) in Boston. Mr. L. was formerly a highly esteemed Methodist preacher; but is now an able advocate of Modern Spiritualism.

From Bro. Brower.

DEARLY BELOVED IN CHRIST:—I wish to convey to you my present feelings respecting the late Conference at Central Village. I was gratified to find it a meeting for social worship, instead of legislation in cold formality to reform the church, which, in a majority of instances, has a tendency to deform it. The absence of all that sort of commodity, made it a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, for which I feel thankful to Almighty God, that I was permitted to enjoy.

Tis now nearly three months since we left our home, and during the greater part of that time, we have been in new places where they have no preaching on the great, grand, solemn, awful, sublime and glorious subject of the coming of the day of God. The contrast between a promiscuous assemblage and that at the conference was very great. With one it was battling against the powers of darkness; the other was a blending together of hearts in the strong ties of christian sympathy and love. Amen, and so let it be.

My soul did magnify the Lord, to find a free, heavenly atmosphere. Yes, free from human policy, which has been a curse to many meetings of late years, in my humble opinion.

The great distinguishing feature that separated, brought out, and made us a people, thank God, was made from the coming of Jesus.

The last night at Bro. Peckham's will never be forgotten. The effectual, fervent prayer did prevail, and God sent the healing power. Truly it made my heart rejoice to find that weak, fragile sister, so prostrate with disease, the next moment so changed, as to walk and praise the Lord. That midnight hour of pain and prayer, changed to perfect ease and rejoicing, will not soon be forgotten. By the by, I will thank God for the precious time we had yesterday with the church at this place. We had a profitable season, and respectable congregations. There is an opportunity to do good in this place; so it seems to me. The meeting was owned and blest of God, praise his name. If time continues, and the Lord permit, I will try to attend the next Conference at Danielsonville.

Peace be with thee, and all the Israel of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

River Point, R. I.

From Bro. Frank Burr.

BRO. GRANT:—Some time has elapsed since I wrote you for the Crisis, and, as the Lord has been good to me thus far, I feel like testifying of his goodness to the readers of the Crisis, and exhorting them to renewed diligence, for the day of the Lord is at hand.

From the experience of the few weeks I have spent in western N. Y., I feel greatly encouraged in the labor of preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Since I have been here, I have met some of the brethren and sisters of western N. Y. and Canada in Annual Conference at Seneca Falls; and, from communications at that meeting, I can speak somewhat of the general state of the cause of truth in this section. My own personal effort has been centered in two or three towns in the region where I live. From general reports I learn that laborers are few; that is, of that class who wield an influence that is not almost entirely swept away by the tide of popular opinion. A man may dig sand on the shore from beneath the swelling wave; but, if he does not lift it beyond the reach of that wave, he will see it all float back into the ocean again. There is a call here for men of faith—men who practice what they preach —men who are willing to sacrifice—men who have energy, and can stem the tide of opposition, and make an indelible mark wherever they go; men, not to dig sand, but to dive for pearls and place them pearls on the sure rock, so that they may build where storms, and tempests, and floods cannot move them. And such, if they come, will be fed, clothed, lodged, and welcomed by the few that love the Lord's appearing. I don't warrant this, but the Lord does. Some would be willing to trust the Lord's note of promise to pay, if they could have a few men to endorse it. The West does not need any such.

At the annual conference there was an effort made to create a mutual interest among brethren scattered among these hills and lakes, and to remove that feeling of isolation natural where persons live so remote from one another, and, if the preaching brethren do what they can to make this interest general, I think it will be the means of advancing the Lord's cause, and enabling the evangelists, (two were appointed—Bro. Lyon and Bro. Sweet,) to carry the truth into new places.

In the places where I labor, I can say that we are steadily gaining ground that has been partially lost in consequence of the field being left open to the inroads of the enemy. By the enemy, I don't mean the nominal Church particularly, and I speak of it, as some seem to think that all the work we are called to do is to pull down other denominations, no matter how.—They have enough to answer for, without my leaving my work at this late hour of the world, for the purpose of merely standing as their accusers. If I accuse them at all, let it be by a firm and consistent maintenance of the truth of God's word, in my preaching and daily life. "The enemy... is the Devil," and it is our business to so hold the light of the gospel as to show him up in his true character wherever he is found, and unmask him in his garb as an "Angel of light," and to release victims from his grasp. May the Lord help us so to do.

Honeoye, Ont. Co., N. Y.

From Sr. Mary Lamprey.

BELOVED BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN THE LORD:—It has been a long time since I have written for the Crisis, and now do not expect to edify you in the least by my contributions to our excellent paper; only, that it is a source of gratification to every christian to hear from those who are trying to serve the Lord. I am a constant reader of the Crisis, and am strengthened from week to week by the blessed truths contained in its columns. We are expecting soon to see our King coming in the clouds of heaven, to redeem his saints, and set up his kingdom on this earth. Brethren and sisters, can we have any realizing sense of the scene that event will present to those who are alive on the earth at that time? awful to the sinner, but glorious to the saint, when the trump shall sound, and its vibrations shall be felt to earth's remotest bounds. It will be so long and so loud it will disturb the dust of the sleeping saints, and the countless hosts will burst the bars of their prison-house, and come forth unfettered from all the shackles of sin and death, pure and holy as God is holy.

And hark! methinks they will hear a rushing in the air, as the rushing of horses and their chariots; and behold! they see their King coming, accompanied by ten thousand times ten thousand holy angels, whose dazzling brightness will outshine the sun; and that "innumerable company that no man can number" will be caught up to meet their Lord. But what will become of the wicked, and of this sin-cursed earth? The Bible tells us that they will be consumed by fire: "the elements shall melt with fervent heat;" and again, "the earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard."

The religious, moral and political world bespeak that the end of all things is near.

Mast Yard, N. H.

From Sr. N. M. Henry.

BRO. GRANT.—At last we are in our western home. I have just been singing some of our old familiar tunes, and it would bring the tears. We have "pitched our tent," (as we really live in one,) on the "plantation" of a southern lady, as noble-hearted and kind a woman as one will meet in a thousand, of the Southern Methodist order. She has several fine sons, who do all in their power to make us comfortable. They are as kind to their colored servants as to their own family. May the Lord reward them for their kindness to us. My health is much improved; indeed, I am quite well.

This is a fine, healthy country; with the most lovely prairies, hills, and woodlands. It is very dry. There has been no rain in this part of the State but once since last Feb., and no prospect of any; yet the soil is such that it bears the drought well. When we get a home once more, I think we shall like much; but when I think of the long, long miles that intervene between here and my friends, and especially the dear brethren and sisters I used to meet at the Wilbraham camp-ground and Collin-ville, it makes me homesick. It is two months since I have seen a Crisis. We had one of them with us; and in Indiana, where we visited some two weeks, it was read with much avidity, and passed from house to house. And some of Bro. H.'s "Scripture Searchers" and tracts are still going around there, and had been the means of opening the eyes of several to see the truth on the great question of Life as a reward, and Death as a punishment. One physician and son were so much interested, they begged of me to send them more books. And I would here say, if you, Bro. G., or H., could spare a few tracts, of just the right kind, especially some "Searchers," they will meet a hearty reception. The people are Campbellites, or, as they call themselves, "Christians." They showed great earnestness to hear and learn for themselves. Direct to Edgar P. Henry, Burnett's Creek, Ind.

I wish the brethren and sisters would write me. And, as my time is so much taken up, having a great many letters to write to relatives, "the children" must each one think this their letter. I would say, also, that our freight all came safely. The old people bore the journey bravely. Of course this is not "Paradise." Far from it. I expect sickness in my family, and disappointments, until Jesus comes.

Do not forget to give us your prayers. I wish some of the children would come this way to preach. The people would be willing to hear. They are as kind people all through the State as ever I met with. Of course, we do not say any thing to aggravate them about the subject of Slavery; it would do no good, only make ourselves obnoxious to them. The slaves, as far as I have had an opportunity of learning, (and we traveled in ox wagons a good many days, and stayed with slave owners mostly,) were cheerful, as well dressed as the white people at large, had as good log houses, as good clean beds, patch quilts, etc., etc. I have been in a good many cabins, and if it were not for the selling and buying part, I think they are as well off in this State as the free negroes at large. But I have not turned pro-slavery yet; was only giving my observations.

Eaton, St. Clair Co., Mo., June 24.

From Sr. L. A. Wheeler.

"For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world, to confound the mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are; that no flesh should glory in his presence."—1. Cor. 1: 26–29.

When I consider those our Father hath chosen to proclaim his coming nigh, many of them unlearned, and sent out like the apostles without scrip, or two coats; and then notice the effect that attends their preaching, I am led to exclaim, "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." If we were dependent alone on those who had been so favored by fortune as to gain much learning, or even those upon whom nature had bestowed strong intellectual faculties, the household would lack meat in season.

God will have an humble and obedient people, and will work in and through such, and none others. Oh, then, let us be obedient, standing in the fear of God, and not in the fear of man. Heed not the reproach; remember it is the weak and foolish things of the world that God hath chosen. He has chosen them out of the highways and hedges, that they may go and compel others to come in. Soon the King's house will be filled, and the marriage celebrated. Shall I be there?

Hawley, Mass.

From Eld. J. Parry.

Bro. Grant:—Our poor little flock were somewhat startled yesterday, on the receipt of the Crisis, to see themselves so conspicuously in print. We read one article from Bro. A. P. Moore that gave, we thought, rather too glowing a picture of our little society, its present state, and future prospects. It is a pleasure to leave a good impression on the minds of our friends in the good cause, as they pass us by, and tarry for a night; and one who was predisposed to look favorably upon us might not be disappointed in his expectation, but have his spirit refreshed in union with a few of the people of God of "like precious faith;" and the contrast of such a green spot in the wilderness, with the outward pomp and show of a worldly and popular church, might well make a favorable impression on the heart of a christian brother; and we are glad to have the sympathy of all such, and make allowance for the partiality of a friend.

But when we cast our eye on a succeeding article, on the same page, by our Brother Grant, much in the same strain of unmerited commendation, we really felt ashamed of ourselves, and began to inquire, what will the people think of all this glorification? We fear our friends think of us more highly than they ought to think.

Brethren, the little church at Sandy Hill has much to be thankful for to our Heavenly Father for all his mercy and love toward us, in sustaining us hitherto amidst the trials and conflicts of this present evil world. But we have nothing to boast of. We are but small in numbers, in means, in talents, and in christian graces. We have to struggle hard against the world, the flesh and the devil; and in this conflict we need especially to be kept humble, faithful and prayerful. Hitherto we have been on the defensive, striving to defend ourselves against the pride and prejudice of a popular church and an ungodly world, that have been in league against us. We intend, by God's grace, in future, to be on the aggressive, and attack the enemy in his strongholds. We know and feel that we have the truth; and we have the promise that a little one shall chase a thousand, and two shall put ten thousand to flight. In the name of Israel's God, we draw the sword of the Spirit and throw away the scabbard, and trust in God to defend the right. We are already accused of drawing the live members out of the churches. I am sure we want no others; and if this accusation be true, the great mass of professors must have a name to live while they are dead.

Brethren in Christ our life, we want not your praise, for we do not deserve it; we are but unprofitable servants: but we want and need your prayers, that God may make us faithful in every good word and work, and at last crown us with glory and immortality with all the redeemed in the kingdom of God.

Obituary Notice.

Died, in Shields, Marquett Co., Wis, June 24th, 1860, Sister Eliza Young, wife of John C. Young, in the twenty-ninth year of her age.

Sister Young was born in the town of Brookfield, Orange Co., Vt., July 21st, 1831; and experienced a hope in Christ and united with the Congregational Church in 1846.

She with her husband removed to Wisconsin about nine years ago. She was not only blessed with personal beauty and loveliness, but with an amiable disposition, refined by education and religion.

Sister Young, with her husband, became interested in the doctrine of the Advent of the Savior, and of immortality through Christ at the resurrection, while on a visit East last fall.

Though ardently attached to her family and friends, she was not only resigned to die, but longed to be relieved by death from suffering, and be at rest. The funeral sermon was preached by the writer, from a text of her choice, found in Job 19: 25–26.

She did not believe she should see her Redeemer at death, but at the latter day, not in a disembodied state, but in her flesh, upon the earth.

She leaves a husband, two daughters, a father, a brother and sister, besides relations far away in the land of her birth, and numerous friends of her childhood and riper years, to mourn her loss; whom she, dying, bade farewell till the resurrection morning

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

[Per Vandebilt, July 4th.]

THE PAPAL STATES

Rome, June 30 The fermentation here has been increasing since the agitation commenced at Naples, and General Lamoriciere is hastening to return to Rome.

Marseilles, July 3. Letters have arrived from Rome, all asserting that a crisis was imminent, and that the attitude of parties toward each other was provocative of a collision.

NAPLES.

Naples, June 29. A state of siege has been established here.

Marseilles, July 3 According to advices from Naples to the 30th ult, assemblages of the population commenced on the evening of the 26th ult. The populace shouted "Garibaldi forever!" "Annexation forever!" "Death to the Police!" The following day a panic took place, the police were maltreated, and disappeared as soon as the same cries were repeated by the populace.

ONE DAY LATER.

New York, July 16 The steamship City of Baltimore, from Liverpool July 4, with telegraphic advices via Queenstown of the 5th, has arrived.

The trade of London is very dull. Three firms connected with the Manchester trade have failed. Immense failures have occurred in the leather trade.

Garibaldi remains quiet. It is reported that concessions by the King of Naples had determined him to precipitate annexation with Sardinia. He has applied to friends in London for two steamers, armed with the Armstrong guns.

It is reported that the King of Sardinia declines alliance with Naples, but Napoleon urges due consideration of the Neapolitan overtures.

SIX DAYS LATER.

[Arrival of the Steamship Connaught.]

St. John's, N. F., July 19 The steamship Connaught, from Galway July 10, arrived at this port at 4 o'clock this afternoon, en route for Boston.

The news is generally unimportant.

The Prince of Wales embarked at Plymouth on the 9th, for Canada.

The acquiescence in the proposed conference by all the great powers is considered certain. It will be held at Paris in October, the several powers being represented by their Ambassadors to France.

Nothing later is known as to Garibaldi's movements against Messina. The reports of fighting near Messina lack confirmation.

The Papal government has released the political prisoners in the Romagna.

France had notified the Turkish government of its intention, jointly with the other powers, to stop the massacre of the Christians in Syria.

[Eastern Correspondence of the Traveller.]

The Civil War in Syria.

Beirut, June 21.—Zahleh has fallen! The last stronghold of the Christians has been taken, plundered and burnt, and its surviving inhabitants are flying like sheep from the wolves that are now on their track. The Christian army has been annihilated and the Christian power, which has been for ages competed with the Druses, has been crushed. The fleet lay quietly at anchor in the harbor of Beirut, while Zahleh was besieged, sacked and laid in ruins—and the Consuls General, who have hitherto been so potent and mighty, have held daily and nightly consultations in vain. The desolation of the "goodly Lebanon" was decreed, and the besom of destruction has laid it waste.

The Consuls were in secret conclave all night, after the news of the sacking of Zahleh was received, to devise ways and means for the rescue of the surviving Christians of the country from a general massacre. What they have done has not transpired, but the butchery of the remainder of the one hundred and fifty thousand Christians is a sad thing to contemplate.

The "Queen," an English line-of-battle ship, has just arrived from Gibraltar, and is saluting the town. Twenty-one guns from H. B. M.'s ship of one hundred and twenty guns, and twenty-one guns from the battery of the town, have a warlike sound, but they are mere courtesies and have no effect upon the war. The Druses continue to butcher the Christians, to burn their towns, and kill their children, within hearing of these courteous salutes. The policy of England with reference to Turkey is fraught with many evil consequences Determined at all hazards to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, she is unfavorable to the investigation proposed by Russia into the condition of the Christians in Turkey, and declares that the Hatti Hamayoun is not a dead letter. England doubtless fears the effect of an investigation, and dreads the partition of Turkey. And we all see with regret that England has intimated to the Sublime Porte that if the Sultan objects to the investigation by Consuls, she will not insist upon it. Thus in the plainest manner advising that the Consuls be not allowed to participate in the investigation. If the Commission is purely Turkish, all the evidence collected by the Consuls will be of no use. We await the issue with much anxiety. Missionary work is at a stand-still in Mount Lebanon. It may be that all Franks will be driven from the land, for a time at least.

The United States Consul has repeatedly warned the Americans of their danger, and informed them that a residence in the mountains is no longer safe Many have come down. To-day the mission at Beirut passed a vote requesting Rev. Mr. Calhoun of Aleip, the President of the College at that place, together with Mr. Bird of Deirel Kenir to come to Beirut at once.

The Christians throughout this war have been most cowardly, but the defence of Zahleh, the most warlike town in Lebanon, was conducted with much spirit. As an illustration of the manner in which the desperate forlorn hope of the Christians behaved in this last battle, in which about seven thousand Druses and Arabs were engaged in the siege, I will refer to one case only at present.

The Druses had gained the suburbs of the town, and had succeeded in setting fire to about a score of houses, when the Christians rallied and drove them out upon the plain. The Druses were led by a most ferocious and bloodthirsty chief, Kange el Amed. In the Christian army was a lad of fourteen years of age who determined to die in defence of his home. He rushed into the ranks of the enemy, and shooting the chief, fell, pierced by spears and bullets.

The chief was killed, and the little hero shared his grave.

The destruction of Sidon has just been reported. Two thousand and five hundred Christians are said to have been killed by Moslems and Druses This intelligence requires confirmation, and is not generally credited.

A Brilliant Meteor.

On Friday evening, July 20th, a remarkable meteor was seen by many astonished observers. The following account describes its appearance, as seen in Philadelphia:

"Last evening about half-past nine, a very extraordinary meteor made its appearance in the heavens. The writer was riding in Broad street, below the city, and had a fair view of the phenomenon in its whole course It arose in the northwestern part of the heavens, from a cloud which was not revealed until the light of the meteor made it visible Then an object, about the size of the full moon, and as bright, suddenly started from the cloud, traversed, in a direct easterly line, the whole extent of visible space, dropping fire, apparently, in its course, like a rocket, till it passed so far eastward as to resemble a red ball, about twice the size of the planet Mars, visible in the southeast. So soon as it disappeared, a flash like heat lightning, revealed a cloud to the eastward, low down in the horizon, which continued to emit flashes of light for half an hour afterward. The phenomenon at one time seemed to separate like a rocket when it bursts, but the larger portion keeping in a straight course to the eastward. It was witnessed by many persons, and caused considerable wonderment for the time, and was certainly the most extraordinary appearance that we ever saw in the heavens Its motion was not so fast, apparently, as that of a rocket, though its height and the vast extent of space that it traversed, proved that its velocity must have exceeded that produced by any known force which we are acquainted with. The phenomenon, from all appearances, must have been electrical."

Organ Grinders' Prayer Meeting.—In the open lot adjoining the Five Points House of Industry, there was held last Sabbath afternoon a prayer meeting of the organ grinders in the city. So numerous have these persons become that they are a distinct class of population, and are accustomed to band together for religious worship, as well as for mutual protection The services were conducted in the Italian language, and under the leadership of one of the number. Though numerically small, the meeting was earnestly carried on, and all seemed eager to take part in the exercises.—N. Y. World.

Notices, &c.

Campmeeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a campmeeting in Levant, Me., commencing Sept. 17th and continue one week. Bro. Howell is requested to make arrangements to attend, and others are invited to come as the Lord may direct. Particulars hereafter.

The cause of truth demands that the church should make an effort to give new impetus to the cause, by a general gathering of the brethren and sisters to comfort and strengthen one another with the words of truth. We expect this meeting will result in good to the church and exert a salutary influence upon community. The people want to hear the reasons of our hope. Let all come that can. Begin now to plan your business so that you can come Begin to pray about it, talk about it, and get your tents ready for the camp. Above all, do not forget that you will need on the armor, so that you may be ready for the work as soon as you get on the field of battle. Brethren, make your business bend to this meeting. Get your Lamb, and come up to sacrifice to the Lord. If you have not a lamb, take a kid, or a pair of doves, only let your heart be in the work and God will bless you. J. Hemenway, for the brethren.

Notice.

A meeting will be held at the school-house near Bro. Whitaker's, two miles north of Edenboro, Erie Co., Pa., Saturday, July 28th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 29th at 9 o'clock, A. M.

Also, a grove meeting in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Edenboro, Erie Co., Pa., August 25th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Oxley, Evangelist.

GENERAL CAMPMEETING at Wilbraham, Mass.

Providence permitting, a general campmeeting will commence at Wilbraham, on the old ground upon the hill, Monday, Aug. 20th, and continue one week.

This meeting is pleasantly located in a neighborhood noted for sustaining good order, and for acts of kindness towards those who assemble there from year to year to worship the God of our fathers. We anticipate a large gathering of the Lord's dear children, and that much good will be accomplished. Those who were present last year will remember that the great object of the meeting was for the salvation of sinners, and the comfort of saints, and that the effort was greatly blessed. We hope that our brethren and sisters will come again this year, strong in the Lord, and bring their unconverted children and neighbors for the purpose of persuading them to be christians.

All who believe in Christ as our Savior, and are willing to labor for the salvation of sinners, are invited to take part in the meetings. We would earnestly request all to make this meeting a subject of special prayer, that many wanderers may be reclaimed, the saints greatly strengthened, and the name of the Lord magnified among the people.

Ample accommodations will be provided for board and horse keeping. Board at 50 cents per day; or one shilling per meal for breakfast and supper, and 25 cents for dinner. The fare is reduced to half price on the Western R. R., which will be $2.50 from Boston, for both ways.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co. by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fare at the ticket offices, can have free return passes by application to Geo T. Adams, 167 Hanover street, Boston, Mass., when they purchase their Western tickets for the camp ground Those coming from Albany will pay full fare to the camp ground, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee Those coming from North Adams, Pittsfield, and intermediate places, also from Worcester and intermediate stations, will call for campmeeting tickets at the ticket offices.

Those coming on the Connecticut River R. R. from South Vernon, Vt., and intermediate stations, will pay full fare, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee.

N. B. All who wish to take the cars from Boston for the campmeeting, should remember that they can obtain their tickets only of Geo. T. Adams, 167 Hanover Street.

Full particulars of arrangements with other R. R. Companies will be given in due season.

R. E. Ladd, Hiram Munger, Geo. T. Adams, } Committee of Arrangements.

Grove Meeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a grove meeting on land owned by Newman Briggs, by the side of Peach Pond, in the town of North Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y., about four miles southeast of Brewster's Station, on the Harlem R. R. The meeting will commence August 9th, and continue over the Lord's day. We expect to have a tent to sleep in, and we want the brethren and sisters to bring beds, blankets, etc If any have tents, bring them We invite all to come and labor with us to the glory of God. We want the preaching brethren to follow the Lord and come in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. Brethren and sisters, pray for this meeting, that God's signal blessing may attend our efforts. There will be ample preparations made to accommodate all who desire to come to the meeting. There will be conveyance from the depot to the ground at noon.

George L. Teeple.

Quarterly Meeting.

The first Quarterly meeting of the General Association of the Church of God, in Western N. Y., will be held at East Springwater, commencing Friday evening, August 24th, and continue over the following Sunday. We have a beautiful grove which will be fitted for the meeting on Sunday.

A general invitation to ministers and laymen is hereby given. We hope to have a general gathering of the lovers of Bible truth from the surrounding country at this meeting.

B. M. Morris, A. L. Hunt, Elijah Wetmore, } Committee of Arrangements.

T. G. Newman, Secretary.

Conference.

There will be a quarterly conference at the Boyington school-house, in Jefferson, Me., three miles east of Turner's Hill, commencing Thursday, Aug. 9th, and continuing over the Sabbath We invite the brethren and sisters to come. We want the preaching brethren to come and labor with us.

S. K. Partridge.

Grove Meeting.

If the Lord permit, there will be a grove meeting in Morris, Ct., commencing Thursday, Aug 16th, and continuing over the following Sunday. Eld H. Pratt is expected to attend, with such preachers and laborers as the Lord may send. We shall have one or more tents, and accommodations, as far as practicable, for brethren from abroad. Come brethren, come one, come all, and let us have a heavenly sitting together, whilst the burden of our prayers may be for the edification and upbuilding of the church in the most holy faith, and for the enlightening of the people and the salvation of sinners.

We hope for a general gathering from the surrounding vicinity, and for a profitable meeting. Let such as can, bring blankets and provisions, prepared for a safe dwelling and sleeping in the woods.

The meeting will be in the vicinity of the Lake, near Footville, ten miles west of Plymouth Hollow depot, and six miles from Litchfield Centre. T. S. Canfield, In behalf of the brethren

An Inquiry.

Who wants a "real good," "free," "general" camp or grove meeting in Maine this season? Let all who feel an interest in the matter, and are willing to help by their prayers, presence and funds, send word to the Crisis without delay. Bro. Grant will publish their names, and if there is interest enough in the matter, a good place will be selected for the meeting, notice given, and preparations made. What is done must be done very soon. Come, brethren and sisters, speak "all at once."

As several have expressed an interest in this matter, I take the liberty to make the inquiry. If I have done wrong, forgive.

R. R. York.

☞ A. Cleaveland will preach at North Troy, Vt., Sunday, July 22d, and once in four weeks the ensuing year.

Commence a quarterly meeting Saturday, July 28th, at South Troy, to hold over the Sabbath. Preaching brethren are invited to attend. He will also preach at South Troy once in four weeks through the year.

N. Orcutt.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping. We shall expect those preachers present that feel sent. Further particulars hereafter.

D. Codswell, M. Gorson, L. Mills, } Committee.

☞ I expect to preach at the Clark Meeting-house in Barnstead, N. H., on Sunday, the 29th of July; and, if it should appear to be duty, may hold meetings for a day or two following. T. M. Preble.

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Corliss, Lowell; E. Heath, Lynn; S. Ayers, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

God Unchangeable.

"For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee."—Isaiah liv.

"I have redeem'd thee," like a signet ring,
I've placed thee on my hand to keep and save;
Death hath its bounds, "fear not," eternal spring
Shall bring my plants of beauty from the grave.
All things shall work together for thy good,
"For thou art mine," though perils shall increase;
I'll bring thee safely through the foaming flood,
And through the fire unscath'd, in perfect peace.

More than my life I've loved thee, fearful one,
My blood flowed for thee from my wounded side;
And though my Father loved his only Son,
He freely gave me to be crucified.
I've slept within the grave, that I might bring
My children from its prison, dark and strong;
I robbed the monster of his cruel sting,
And gave an earnest of the victor's song.

I wandered homeless, and the mountain air,
With chilling dews, swept o'er my grassy bed;
Bright angels heard my agonizing prayer,
While stars shone dimly on my weary head.
With gushing love I've borne earth's cruel jest,
And throbbing temples witness'd to my pain;
While I was mock'd by consecrated priests,
I'll was for thy sake, and canst thou doubt again

I'm fitting thee a home, where gold and gems
Are shining in their native beauty fair,
With golden harps and starry diadems,
And garments of rejoicing rich and rare.
And when the warfare is accomplished here,
And in the furnace thou art sanctified,
My hand shall wipe thy last, thy brightest tear,
And thou shalt reign with me my spotless Bride.

Immortality Triumphant.

A SHORT SERMON FOR THINKERS.

My object in this article will be to examine the subject of immortality as revealed in the Holy Oracles, as it stands related to God and man. How much has been written upon this subject, and yet how few understand it. It is, when properly understood, the ultimatum of the christian system, and the very climax of Jehovah's purpose with regard to man in his final destiny. Hence its importance is vast and the issues interesting.

To find a proper answer to the subject of immortality, must we go to philosophy or to revelation? Does philosophy give us a true answer? No. Its principles do not reach the subject of deathlessness, for everything in nature is dying and corruptible. Therefore we must come to the Bible as the only source from which to gather light concerning the subject before us. Our appeal is to the christian, who believes the word of God. Yes, to you we make our appeal, and call your attention to what God has said. Are you not willing to hear the issue with Omniscience—with the Eternal, whose truth outshines the king of day, and blazes in unending glory around his throne.

Christianity has much use for the word immortality. Hence its meaning should be well understood, the word should be properly applied in order to avoid misapprehension, and thereby save confusion in theology. We hear the word used with much confidence, and certainly we ought to know just what it means, and how the word is applied in the Scriptures of truth. With these remarks we proceed to inquire:

1st, Into the philological meaning of the word immortality.

This word is properly Latin, being compounded from "im," not and "mortalis," subject to death. Hence the word strictly means not dying, or not subject to death.

The Greek word, translated immortality, is "athanatos," or "athanasia," which is a compound word coming from "a," which, according to Donnegan, "In compound words, this letter has often a primitive or negative force, like that of the particles, in, im, un, ir, in English" (see Don. Lexicon); and "thanatos," which, according to Greenfield, means "death, the extinction of life, whether naturally or violently," etc. Hence the word, as it stands in the Greek, literally signifies undying, or that which is not subject to death; deathlessness.

The above definition is in accordance with Greenfield, Lidell & Scott, Donnegan, and Groves, whose Lexicons the reader can imagine.

Inasmuch as the philology of the word means deathlessness, or that which cannot die, it would certainly be applied to man in the present state, if he was in possession of a nature designated by athanatos, but the truth is, the word is nowhere in the Bible applied to man in his present state, in the sense of pointing out his nature. And he is nowhere represented as possessing that nature in the whole Bible. The word is nowhere applied to the soul of man, nor to his spirit. But it is applied to God, the Immanuel of the age to come, and this brings us to notice:

2d, The Scripture use of the word immortality.

The word occurs five times in the Bible, all of which we will examine.

1 Tim. 6:16—"Who only (the king of kings) hath immortality."

This text presents God as the only one who hath immortality, by which we understand that God is self-existent, eternal in his duration. It points out clearly his nature as absolute and unchangeable. God's immortality is not derived. Every creature in the universe, which has attained the undying state, has derived it from God. He is the great fountain of existence; all creatures are dependent.

Here we have immortality in its ultimate inhering in God. The extremity of the immortal nature is reached in God. He stands forth in the universe as a living example of the true meaning of the word immortality. Does the Bible affirm this of man? No. He has an humbler title.

Job. 4:17—"Shall mortal man be more just than God?" Here we have an opposite nature affirmed of man—mortal man! Think of it, reader. The same book that affirms self-existence of God, affirms mortality of you. It is the word of God which makes this contrast of the two opposite natures. We ask you how it is possible for the word of Jehovah to make statements so directly opposite, if man has a part of the Eternal inhering in his nature, or that which will ever live by virtue of its own undying qualities. Thus the Scriptures beautifully exhibit the contrast between God and man. But before we leave the point of contrast between the two, we wish to remark that the Bible teaches the immortality of God as a unit being. Would it not sound strangely to say that God's soul is immortal, but his body is mortal? This would be no more inconsistent than, when the word of God declares man to be mortal, to assert that his body is mortal, but his soul is immortal! The truth is, the Bible affirms the immortality of God as a unit being, and the mortality of man as a unit being. This must be apparent to the reader.

Hence the conclusion is irresistible that God and man have two natures, distinct and separate. Paul shows this point most clearly in his epistle to the Romans, ch. 1:23. In speaking of the abominations of the wicked, he says, "And changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man."

Here the same great truth is shown: God is uncorruptible in contrast with man, who is corruptible. And keep in view the fact that Paul is speaking of them as unit beings. He is not talking about a part of God, and a part of man, but about them in their unity. This contrast is further shown in the Scriptures. God is perfect—man is imperfect. God is unchangeable—man is changeable. God is Omniscient—man is limited in his mentality. God is Omnipotent—man's power is limited. God is sinless—man is sinful. And thus we might go on, showing the contrast between God and man. Now if man had the nature of God, it seems to me, we should not behold such a vast contrast as there exists in the two beings. Man is created subject to decay, while God's existence wings its flight from eternity to eternity.

O, why will poor, puny man try to rank with God in nature and duration, when so feeble and powerless? Ah! tradition has marred the glory of God, and exalted men to the sky, while the Bible declares him "of the earth, earthy."

This brings us to notice in the next place how man is to gain the immortal nature. Paul most clearly shows how man is to obtain it, and that is by seeking for it by patient continuance in well doing. Rom. 2:7.

It is the intelligence of man that is required to seek for immortality. Not that the immortal soul is seeking immortality, for the mortal body; but the intelligent man is to seek for it. Hence the intelligent man has not got that immortality for which he is required to seek. Therefore the intelligent man is mortal. Furthermore, "what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for it." Hence the point is clear that he has not got it in possession at all. No part of him is immortal. Man is mortal, and there is no half-way work about it. God did not say, "shall the mortal half of man be more just than God, but mortal man. And it is worthy of remark that God is talking about the man that is trying to be just, not the mere clay aside from its intelligence, for, according to the theology of the day, that could not be just at all. Therefore mortality is affirmed of the man that is trying to be just, or in other words, the man is mortal, including his intelligence. We have remarked that athanatos is nowhere applied to man in his present state, but that he must attain it by actions in harmony with the law of God. And further, that it is not affirmed of parts of the man. It cannot be applied to the soul, for the Bible teaches its deathlike nature. Please read Josh. 10:35, 37, 39. ch. 11:11. Ps. 78:50. Ezek. 18:4. Now if the soul is undying in its existence, the Scriptures make a wrong application of the word death, for it applies it directly to the soul of man. The thoughts of man are not by virtue of this nature, susceptible of endless existence, for the Bible most clearly reveals the fact that at death the "thoughts perish," Ps. 146:4. Hence man, including his intelligence, is dying and subject to decay. His thoughts perish at death. Hence they do not survive his bodily existence. Therefore Paul was in the right when he informed man to seek for immortality.

We next inquire how this immortality was made known to man? Was it revealed to man by heathen philosophy? If so it is not a matter of revelation, nor of gospel revealment. But Paul declares that it was brought to light by the gospel. 2 Tim. 1:10. This opens the way for man to look beyond the mortal veil over into the regions of immortality, where the pure and glorified reign. A Socrates, a Plato or a Cicero, may boast that they found something in man that is immortal; yet the Word of the Eternal proclaims in thunder tones that it was brought to light by the gospel. Hence the gospel becomes the medium through which this precious boon is revealed. Oh, that the world would believe this heart-cheering truth, that Jesus hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. But mark! He could not have brought it to light without abolishing death. Thereby showing that immortality cannot be bestowed on man until after death is abolished.

We have a beautiful example in the person of the Son of God. He fell a victim to the chariot-wheels of death, and was crushed to the earth. But he broke the bolts of death and triumphed over the grave, and now stands forth a living monument of immortality. How did Christ abolish death? We answer, by receiving an undying nature at the time of his resurrection. Jesus came off victorious from the contest, hence death lost its prey in his case. But death is not yet abolished in its relation to the church, for they yet are under his power. But Paul says, "behold I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, ... for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. . . Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." "Oh, death, where is thy sting. Oh, grave, where is thy victory."

The victory over death will then be won. This mortal will then put on immortality. Jesus abolished death over himself when he received the immortal nature, so will the saints abolish death when they change their nature. Hence those who have sought for immortality through the gospel, will obtain it at the resurrection morn. Oh, glorious hope! We wait for thy fruition. Kind reader, you must wait till that "change" comes before you can have immortality. Just as sure as God is true, immortality will be triumphant. It will gain the victory, though the contest be long, yet victory shines and dazzles on the crowns of life, beyond the grave.

The grave cannot hold the precious saints of God. Then let us continue in the warfare until the coming of the conqueror, whose chariot-wheels we now hear rumbling in the distance; his stay will not be long, for he will soon speak, and at his voice the earth will give up her dead—and immortality will sing its triumph-song through eternal ages. May we be there, is the prayer of the writer.—H. V. REED.

For the Crisis.

A Desideratum.—No. 2.

BY F. B. M.

We have styled this a want of knowledge concerning ecclesiastical matters. And now have noticed briefly how it can exist among an honest and earnest people.

Among the occasions of such a want, there has been one nearly universal amongst ourselves as a people—quod ubique, quod ab omnibus. This has been our conviction relative to the specific character of our work. The idea has obtained that, in having given to us so great a work, we ought not to rest day or night until all the world shall be properly enlightened upon the questions at issue between us. But here have arisen two evils. On the one hand, there has been no little contention on the part of ourselves as to the exact nature of this specific work. Evidently there has been a bringing out of many fundamental Bible truths, which if not wholly—theoretically, as well as practically—lost to the Church, had evidently fallen into desuetude; but a question has arisen as to which shall be called the leading truth. The discussion of this question may have argued well for zeal, may be we should say for godly zeal; but evidently it has given origin to something akin to sectarianism, if at times it has not degenerated to absolute partizanism.

Some have contended for the question of immortality, as that grand central truth around which all others culminate. Others again have made the Kingdom of God the question. Others the subject of the personal Advent of our Lord with the signs of the times and the fulfillment of prophecy. While yet others have said it is all of these—all that was lost by the introduction of sin into our world, and which is to be restored through Christ at his second Advent to earth.

On the other hand, a rigid one-idea-ism has taken possession of many otherwise sterling minds. The consequence has been, that many a sacred gem—a precious truth—has been passed by; and in lieu of all truth, a miserable, gaunt hobby-horse has been substituted. The devoted veteran has been called an extremist, and may be has suffered—like a martyr. While the Bible is the touch-stone by which all theories may be tried, time it is that tests the practical character of everything. And no hobby-horse-riding, or unduly magnifying one truth—however true it may be of itself—yet its being unduly magnified never has subserved and never can subserve the end God has in view in the gift of truth—that is to say, directly. That it may not, like the wrath of man, be over-ruled, and so ultimate in the glory of God, is not for us to say.

The consequence of all this is, that men have been made akin to demi-gods—a theory has taken the place of the gospel, and a party the place of the Church. Christianity has run the guantlet, and the devoted in many places now pitifully gaze at each other and ask if they yet survive. Men, unaided men, have undertaken to "save,"—not the King, but—"the cause!" With solemn looks they have assembled in conference, declaring they had surrounded this mountain long enough, but failing to ignore the evils inseparable to their present position, they surround "this mountain" yet.

With all this, why marvel at our lack of ecclesiastical equipage? Why marvel that the people "perish for lack of knowledge?" But the past is not without its lessons; from this we may take courage and hope for better days in the future.

For the Crisis.

Then and Now.

Once earth was in Eden-like beauty adorned,
But a shadow has clouded it all,
And this beautiful ruin bears still on its breast
The blight and the curse of the fall.

Jehovah once ruled as a leader and king,
Humanity strove for the throne,
Oh, Israel! thy God in his wrath turned away,
And man wields the sceptre alone!

O Zion, how hallowed the presence of Him
Whose glory shone 'round thee of yore;
Alas! it gilds never our altars again,
The shekinah is lighted no more.

Awake, for the trumpet is sounding, awake!
From the wrath that is coming, oh fly!
Cast from thee the sackcloth, and gird thee with light,
For the day of redemption is nigh!

Unmindful of dangers and storm-clouds that rise,
We'll cut through the foam and the spray,
Till we land on the love-girded shores of that home
Whose brightness fades never away.

Confidence in God.

"For I know whom I have believed."

Knowledge, like the shining sun, is ever emitting rays of light and brilliancy over our benighted pathway, thus illuminating its darkness, and cheering the moral torpitude and gloom, that would otherwise brood undisturbed over the precarious vision of all created beings. 'Tis the possession of knowledge that enables us to claim superiority over the brute creation, by which also we are made to understand that our likeness is in fashion of Him who is "Lord of all and blessed forevermore." 'Tis through this medium that we are made susceptible of those refined sensibilities for which the Savior of mankind graciously capacitated the human family, rendering them capable of understanding his will concerning them, in the sure word of prophecy, contained in the Holy Oracles, unto which we would all do well to "take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise."

If then there is a knowledge, the acquisition of which will secure to us an inheritance among the sanctified, and the neglecting of which will place us far beyond the reach of hope and mercy, how important that we give earnest heed to its holy requirements, lest at any time we should let them slip, and at last not be able to escape, having neglected so great salvation. The Psalmist beautifully describes the word of God, as a lamp unto the feet and a light unto the path; while the illustrious Pollock of modern times joins the apostrophe of praise and calls it the "Star of Eternity," whose luminous rays gild the pathway to the tomb with the hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. The Apostle Paul also lends his affirmation to the history of the Lord Jesus as contained in the sacred page, by saying, "I know whom I have believed." And this divine knowledge, emblazoned upon the holy record, possesses manifest superiority over every other specimen of information, in that it is attainable by all of every kindred, tribe and tongue; none are so poor as to be unable to buy the wine and milk with which it is stored, which is without money and without price; and none are so weak in intellect, though they be wayfaring men and fools, but what they may find life therein.

'Tis not so with the riches of earth, or the wisdom pertaining to earthly things. These often rise up before us in their worth and beauty, and our feelings and desires are at once enlisted to possess them; we accordingly put forth an effort, to make them our own. But, owing perhaps to both mental and physical inability, they are beyond our grasp, and hence we must submit to the disappointment, and content ourselves by beholding the wished for bounty in the possession of others more fortunate than ourselves.

But the religion of the Bible, or a lively hope of a glorious resurrection, may be obtained on the easy terms of "repentance toward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ." While the long cloud of witnesses, from righteous Abel down through the line of the Fathers and the Prophets, to the humblest saint of yesterday's adoption into the heavenly family, all bear ample and indubitable testimony to the preciousness of Christ to those that believe.

It may be a matter of doubt in the minds of some, whether the strong faith and blessed assurance of the Apostle Paul is transferable to any and every humble follower of the Lamb. His mind, however, seems to be perfectly clear in this matter; for, at the time of his departure, having fought the good fight, and finished his course with joy, and now anticipating the crown of glory that awaited him, he says, "and not for me only, but for all those that love his appearing." Let us then forever wonder and adore, at the stoop of condescension made by the great God and everlasting Father, in the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ in the glorious plan of redemption, as made manifest to the lost and ruined of Adam's sons and daughters, that all who in truth and sincerity lay hold of the hope set before them in the gospel, may be joyful partakers of that hope, and say, even with the Apostle, "I know whom I have believed."

Extracts from Beecher's Sermon on the "Cross of Christ,"

DELIVERED IN MUSIC HALL, BOSTON, MAY 27th.

When Christ was teaching men what was the highest conception of human character, what did he say? The serene, large-browed intellect, the deep, calm, untroubled oceanic enthusiasm, the exquisite sensitiveness of taste and purity combined, that large, flexible nature which revolves in orbits of beauty, and stands the point of admiration to all round about, beautiful and harmless! Was that the conception of character? Such is the notion we have of beauty and genius. These are the men that we love to paint to ourselves—men that do no harm, to be sure, but that are self-cultured, and work off every part of themselves with elaborate workings, and make themselves, according to some preconceived model of human development, symmetrical and large and manly and perfect, and stand, simply, in that self-poised strength and power! Does Christ say that is the idea of character? Not at all. Self-seeking and self-building, as an end, were simply hateful to God, as they should be hateful to men, but are not. What, then, was Christ's ideal of manhood? Weakness, subtleness? insificance of character? No, no! but power in the head and power in the heart and art in the hand,—the sovereignty of man in every single one of his faculties; but the whole of it taken with sweetest humiliation of love and carried down into the lowest place and meanest, to that which is weak. It is strength glorified with purity and beautified with taste, making itself a servant, as Christ is said to have made himself a servant. The Divine ideal of character is that it is a power, no matter how resplendent, how high, so that it is devoted to the welfare of those who are about us; first to those who are the lowest and furthest removed from our taste and sympathy. The man you hate is the man you ought to love most, that is, with benificence; the man that shocks every taste and sentiment is the man who should receive the contribution of your being,—that is the man into whom and around whom you are to pour yourself, that by all the influences in which you are superior to him, he may find the ocean tide of your life buoying him up and taking him from out the mud and sand in which he swelters, and giving him at last launching and sea-room. That is the conception of the highest character. Christ says, "He who would be chiefest among you——." What is he? The man with a hand big to get and small to leave, is that the ideal man? The gold-getter, thrifty, shrewd, world-encompassing and world-reaping man? Not at all. He that has an eye to behold and the hand to execute, in works of art—is he the man? The serving soul is the royal soul, the slave is the master; that is, if it is the right kind of slave. Not he that is brought from Nubia, not he that is bought on the stand, but he that knows how to make himself for another man, he is the highest man.

It is narrated of a Moravian—I know not if in any other name of Christians could be found any instance that can parallel this—a Moravian Christian heard of the sufferings of the West India slaves, and desired to be a missionary to them; but when he reached them, he found they were driven to the field so early, and came home so late, that there was no life or strength in them to listen to his instructions, neither did they believe that any man whose face was white had a heart that was other than black, and they would not listen to him: and he found, at last, that there was no way to preach to them unless he preached to them in their sufferings while he suffered with them himself. He sold himself, and was driven afield with them himself, that while he suffered and toiled as they did he might have opportunity to preach to them the unsearchable riches of Christ. Now, I ask you if there reigns a king upon his throne that was so lordly, so large a man as that poor, sweating Moravian, who, for the sake of serving these poor, miserable, dying slaves in the field, had sold himself into like estate to preach the riches of Christ. The largest conception of manhood is that which knows how to take itself as though of no consequence to itself, but of all possible consequence to those to whom it may make itself an offering, a power, and an instruction.

* * * *

How different a thing it is, my friends, to be a christian as men become christians, and to be one according to the example of Christ and the spirit of the Apostle Paul. If you are to become such an one as Christ, if you are to be emptied of yourself, if you are to live for others, I ask you, will not that change be like a resurrection from the dead? Oh, look how selfish, how hard, how unfeeling, life is! See how men hate one another! See what prejudices separate them! See what ten thousand things are thrown in the way, even by good men, making the wheels turn slowly and hard. See what attrition there is! See how every part of the machinery of life draws hard.

Now, tell me, if there should come on such natures the royalty of love—if there should be a change that should make men love as easily as violets smell sweet—if there should be a change that should make a man's heart come out as odors do, furnishing that which men delight in, but not diminishing the supply—would it not be a change just as great as to make a man all over again? And if that is so, what objection have you to saying so that they are born again? I think it would not hurt some men to be born twenty times more! I think we all need to be born again; that there is a continual re-creation and recreation, with higher conceptions and purer spiritual realizations. No man who looks at men as they are, and holds up before them the bright ideal of Christ's character—no such man can say, if they receive such a symbol as that, that it is not a new creation.

* * * *

My dear christian brethren, it requires a great deal of the spirit of the cross for a man to suffer for himself; but the evidence of the extent to which the nature of Christ has penetrated into your heart, is to be measured by the affluence of that spirit in you which makes it sweet to you to make any man better by diminishing yourself in doing it.

I do not know where to look for such a man. I see him in Paul. If there ever was a man who almost forgot his own personality, and thought only of those whom he might serve, it seems to me to have been Paul; but beside him I can scarcely find another, and the nearer home I get the more rarely I find them. I have a bright ideal of what it is to use the whole of my life and powers for other men, or a shaking of myself out of myself; but that cursed individuality still brings my thoughts and feelings back to myself, checks my enthusiasm, and I cannot pour out my life like a libation for God. That I feel in myself, and I therefore interpret it in you.

* * * *

You never know how much one loves until you know how much he is willing to endure and suffer; and it is the suffering element that measures love. And all characters that are high must, of necessity, be characters that shall be willing, patient, and strong to endure for others. It is not so much the pleasure we have in affection. To be able to have bright affections playing upon you and giving great joy to your nature, is one thing, and to hold your nature in the willing service of others, is another; and that is the divine idea of manhood, of the human character.

* * * *

Let no man think himself called to be a reformer or builder in modern times, unless he has made up his mind that the call includes life itself. And if you are called to suffer, count it all joy when you are called into diverse trials. Rejoice and be exceeding glad when God calls you to suffer for righteousness' sake. But, oh, what shall we do with that ragged and broken band of men who come fleeing from life's battle, crying out, "We are belied; we are beset on every side with misconstruction!" Why not? Is the servant greater than his master? If they called him Beelzebub, will they call you less? Are you not willing to do good. The degree with which you are willing to do good, is according to the degree in which you are willing to take misconstructions, opposition, and suffering in the world. You may depend upon one thing, that there is nothing men will resist so universally as any effort to transplant them to a higher range from a lower.

* * * *

It is not only how good you are that makes you a christian, but how good you are, and how good you make other people to be. All great growth, in human life, must be in the development of this element of voluntary service and suffering one for another. All great growth, I say, must be in this element of suffering one for another.

What does neglecting Prayer Meetings seem to say?

ACTIONS SPEAK LOUDER THAN WORDS.

1. I do not believe there is power in prayer, or that there is more power in united prayer than in the prayer of one christian alone, though the Savior says there is. (Matt. 18.)

2. I do not wish the church to rise, increase, and flourish, at least if it cannot without my frequenting the prayer-meeting, it shall not.

3. I do not trouble myself about sinners going to hell, therefore I do not go to the prayer-meeting to plead with God to save them.

4. I have no sympathy with my pastor, who makes so much of prayer-meetings and such a stir about a revival of religion.

5. I do not want too much religion, I like the middle way, and wish to avoid all extremes, especially being extremely zealous in religious matters.

6. I do not believe that God cares whether I go or not, nor do I think that he will ever trouble me or himself about it.

7. I say let those go who have nothing better to do, I can employ my time better than in going to prayer-meetings.

8. I used to go once, because I fancied good was to be done by going, but I found out my mistake, and therefore I gave up going.

9. I am concerned to take care of the main chance, I mean my business, therefore I give myself to it, and just take spiritual things by the way.

10. I do not believe that God requires the like of me to go to prayer-meetings, who have so much on my head, hands, and heart without. "He will have mercy and not sacrifice."

Reader, do you neglect the prayer-meeting? If so, is the above your portrait? Is it not all like you? Is there no resemblance? Is it not just putting into plain words what you say every week by your conduct? Let conscience be honest for once, and give a plain and direct answer.

PASTORAL VISITING.—John Wesley said, "By repeated experiments we learn that, though a man preach like an angel, he will neither collect, nor preserve a society which is collected, without visiting them from house to house." A writer in an exchange says:—"One hundred years of Methodistic labors, sufferings and successes, have greatly added to the strength of the remark."

☞ "Abuse," says Dr. Johnson, "is often of service. There is nothing so dangerous to an author as silence; his name, like a shuttlecock, must be beat backward and forward, or it falls to the ground."

Hold on, Boys.

Hold on to your tongue when you are just ready to swear, lie, or speak harshly, or say any improper word.

Hold on to your hand when you are about to strike, pinch, scratch, steal, or do any improper act.

Hold on to your foot when you are on the point of kicking, running away from study, or pursuing the path of error, shame, or crime.

Hold on to your temper when you are angry, excited, or imposed upon, or others are angry about you.

Hold on to your heart when evil associates seek your company, and invite you to join in their games, mirth and revelry.

Hold on to your good character, for it is and ever will be your best wealth.

"Give us this Day our Daily Bread."

In a miserable cottage at the bottom of a hill, two children hovered over a smouldering fire. A tempest raged without—a fearful tempest—against which man and beast were alike powerless.

A poor old miser, much poorer than these shivering children, though he had heaps of money at home, drew his ragged cloak about him as he crouched down at the threshold of the miserable door. He dare not enter for fear they would ask pay for shelter, and he could not move for the storm.

"I am hungry, Nettie."

"So am I; I've hunted for a potatoe paring, and can't find any."

"What an awful storm!"

"Yes the old tree has blown down. I guess God took care that it didn't fall on the house. See, it would certainly have killed us."

"If he could do that, couldn't he send us bread?"

"I guess so; let's pray 'Our Father,' and when we come to that part, stop till we get some bread."

So they began, and the miser, crouching and shivering, listened. When they paused, expecting in their childish faith to see some miraculous manifestation, a human feeling stole into his heart; God sent some angel to soften it. He had bought a loaf at the village, thinking it would last him a great many days, but the silence of the two little children spoke louder to him than the voice of many waters. He opened the door softly, threw in the loaf, and then listened to the wild, eager cry of delight, that came from the half-famished little ones.

"It dropped right from heaven, didn't it?" questioned the younger.

"Yes, I mean to love God forever, for giving us bread because we asked him."

"We'll ask him every day, won't we? why! I never thought God was so good, did you?"

"Yes, I always thought so, but I never quite knew it before."

"Let's ask him to give father work to do, all the time, so we need never be hungry again. He'll do it—I'm sure."

The storm passed—the miser went home. A little flower had sprung up in his heart; it was no longer barren.

In a few weeks he died, but not before he had given the cottage, which was his, to the poor laboring man.

And the little children ever after felt a sweet and solemn emotion, when in their matinal devotions they came to those trustful words: "Give us this day our daily bread.

The Idle Christian.

To be idle is not to be like Christ. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

To be idle is to neglect to glorify God. "In this is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit."

To be idle is to be false to the Church. She needs help; she is entitled to the service of all her sons. "Here am I; send me."

To be idle is to be cruel to dying souls—as cruel as one who would leave a wounded man to perish by the wayside, when he might save him. "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death."

To be idle is to hinder a blessing. "Bring all the tithes into the storehouse."

To be idle is to be weak. "But exercise thyself rather unto godliness."

Idleness has no promise, "So run that you may obtain." "Let no man take your crown."

Idleness brings a curse. "Curse ye Meroz; curse bitterly; because they came not up to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

The idle are liable to a disastrous end. "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness."—S. S. Banner.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,
Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$2.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	.50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	22.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the paper within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a cheap price, which will enable them to supply the poor, within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Reminiscence of '54.

BY VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

'T was sunset hour, when a crimson cloud
Was floating in beauty by,
That looked like the folds of a snowy shroud,
Dipped in a golden dye.
A little boy clapped his hands with glee,
Saying, "Mother! dear mother, come!
'Lijah's firey chariot's come for me,
Get your bonnet, and we'll go home."

But a shadow rested on that young brow,
As onward passed the bright cloud;
Still patiently waited the hour to go
Up to the blest abode;
And talked of home as the night drew on,
And he rested his tired head,
Saying, "God will paper my little room,
And he'll make me a pretty bed."

Now years have passed, but he does not ask,
"When will my dear Savior come?"
For he fears the sound of the trumpet's blast,
And the fiery day of doom;
And I ask, would there now be half the joy
With some that have looked for Him,
That dwelt in the heart of my gentle boy,
Should they witness the coming King?

The New Birth.

The doctrine of the new birth is reduced by the modern church to mere christian experience; and accordingly consists in a moral change of character, which takes place at the event of conversion, and according to their theology means one and the same thing.

In the first place, I consider the doctrine of the new birth to be exclusively applicable to the introduction of the world to come. As proof of which, I shall consider the nature of that new birth through which the Lord Jesus Christ passed; which will be found to be so intimately connected with the new birth of the saints, that, to ascertain the nature of the one, we must necessarily understand that of the other.

Then as Adam was the first man whom God created in the present world, so Jesus Christ, the second Adam, is declared to be the first man whom he created of the inhabitants of the world to come. This truth is conveyed in the following language, in relation to Jesus Christ, thus: Who is "the beginning of the creation of God,"—Rev. 3 : 14—which we shall find to be the new creation. The apostle, speaking of the order of the resurrection of the dead, gives Christ the precedence, he being the first of that resurrection upon whom God conferred immortality. That this act was done at his resurrection, the following testimony proves: "If the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. 8 : 11. Again, speaking of Christ being in the grave, the apostle says: "His soul," or himself, "was not left in Hell, neither his flesh did see corruption."—Acts 2 : 31. Here, then, it is positively stated that Jesus Christ was mortal, and that he was dead and buried. All, therefore, that is included in the term Jesus Christ, actually lay in the grave, dead. And, also, that he was raised from the dead, not by his own power, but by the power or Spirit of God; and as that, he being mortal, and having been quickened, or brought to life, by the Spirit of God, it must have rendered him, what he was not before, immortal. These are plain, and indeed unavoidable facts, and can not be evaded by saying that it was nothing but his body which lay in the tomb.

I said that, in the order of the resurrection, Christ had the precedence. This may be seen by such passages as the following: "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward, they that are Christ's at his coming; then cometh the end."—1 Cor. 15 : 23. He is also declared to "be the first born among many brethren."—Rom. 8 : 29. And again it is said, "that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead.—Acts 26 : 23." Again, "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep,"—Heb. 13 : 20. Then it is clear that he had the precedence of the first resurrection; and also that it was not accomplished by his own native energy, which indeed would have been an improbability; for how could he, when dead, put forth any act whatever, much less that power and skill requisite to raise the dead; and more especially to raise himself from the dead. I am aware he declared while living, that he had power to lay down his life and to take it again. This is more properly rendered liberty or right. The Scriptures repeatedly affirm that God raised him from the dead. His second life, or birth, was as much the work of God as he was begotten by the power of the Highest at his first birth. This introduced him into mortal life, and the second birth into immortal and incorruptible life; this being the resurrection life, and effected by the Spirit of God, it is, therefore, called a spiritual birth.

I think now we shall appreciate the doctrine of the new birth brought to view in the conversation between Christ and Nicodemus. In answer to some inquiries he had proposed to Jesus, we have this answer given: "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." But Nicodemus did not understand how a man could be born when he was old; and Jesus repeats the assertion, but with additional instruction, thus: "Except a man be born of water (natural birth) and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." Thus we have the natural birth, the production of which is corruption, flesh and blood, and the new birth, qualifying its possessor to be an inhabitant of the kingdom of God, which, as it is said, corruption can not inherit.

We have seen that he is said to be the first born among many brethren; and now if it be ascertained that this birth was indeed from the dead, then, also, the new birth of his brethren, of whom he was the first fruits, must necessarily be affixed to their resurrection from the dead; and if so, the nature of the new birth is established. Now if Christ is the first born among his brethren, it follows that his birth is the example of that of his brethren. In further confirmation of this, I quote the following: Says the revelator, speaking of Christ, "Who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead."—Rev. 1 : 5. Again, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore."—Rev. 1 : 18. His thus being begotten from the dead, is the same expression implied to represent his first birth at infancy. Thus, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee."—Ps. 2 : 7; Acts 13 : 33; and of course implies that his resurrection birth to second life, was as literal as that of his natural birth. And he being the example, it follows that the spiritual birth of his brethren was not only to be from the dead, but that it will be as literal as that which first introduced them into being.

But again says the apostle, speaking of Christ, "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature . . . . And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first born from the dead, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence."—Col. 1 : 15–18. Now it is evident that his being the first born of every creature, or the beginning of the creation of God, went no further back in the history of the world, than the event of his birth by the virgin Mary; for then he was actually born, and consequently could not have been born prior to that period. But that his being the first born of every creature could not have referred to his natural birth, is also evident; for every creature of the human race up to that period had been born prior to himself; but he was also born from the dead, and at this spiritual birth he assumed the image of the incorruptible God, being corruptible before that time, because in possession of fallen humanity. It was at this time, therefore, that he became the beginning of the creation of God, or the first born of every creature of that creation. Here Jesus Christ, the second Adam, having now obtained the pre-eminence, being the first one God formed for the incorruptible kingdom, or the new creation of the world which now groans to be delivered, now stands at the head of that creation, as the first Adam stood at the head of the primeval or old creation; he being the first creature of that creation, and the generations of the first Adam being that of corruption, introduced his offspring into the life that now is, which is the first birth; while the new birth is that of the Spirit, and introduces its subjects into the life which is to come, rendering them incorruptible and immortal.

In closing this epistle, I shall only refer to a few more passages of scripture in relation to the new birth, and which will also be found to corroborate the views herein advanced. And first, it is said, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed," the incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever, "remaineth in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God."—1 John 3 : 9. Again, "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body: it is sown in corruption; it (the body) is raised in incorruption: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power."—1 Cor. 15 : 42–44. And hence after they are thus born again, they not only do not commit sin, but are incapable of such transactions, because of being born again of the incorruptible seed, the Spirit of God, which ushers its immortal subjects into the world to come! The idea, therefore, that men are born again when converted to Christianity, is perfectly irreconcilable with such texts as these, unless it be contended that they are incapable of transgression after that event, which idea is refuted by christian experience, as well as by the whole tenor of scripture on this point.

In order then to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, we must be born again; and if begotten, quickened by the Spirit: and, to carry out the figure, let us be careful lest an abortion be produced, and we be brought forth in an unnatural state, and the "wrath of God" abide upon us.

The Lord's Anointed.—No. 3.

"Stand up for Jesus."

How can Gal. 4 : 4, Rom. 1 : 3, 2 Tim. 2 : 8, Gal. 3 : 16–19, be harmonized with the FACT that Christ "was rich" and "became poor," was "in the beginning with God," "came down from heaven," was "before all things," and "all things were made by him?"

"How can they be harmonized?" I do not see any lack of harmony. Truth is harmonious—the Bible is truth, and that is harmonious too. Let us read the texts. Gal. 4 : 4; "But when the fulness of the time was come, God SENT FORTH his "Son, made of a woman, made under the law," etc. Penn renders it "begotten of a woman, born under the law." McKnight renders it, "born of a woman, born under the law."

God "SENT FORTH his Son." Then he had a SON to SEND. What can be plainer? The word rendered sent forth is peculiar—it is exapostello. Now, apostello signifies to send out or send off upon an errand or mission; and so those that Jesus sent are called apostoloi, apostles, or those who were sent. But the word here has ek prefixed to it, which signifies out of, so it is defined "to send OUT, away," etc. Apostello is used where we read "there was a man sent, para, of, or by, God."—John 1 : 6. But this word, EXAPOSTELLO signifies a sending out, not merely with reference to the outside world, not out INTO, but out OF, or out from, so we should understand it; God sent forth his Son, i. e., forth or out from his former position, "in the bosom of the father." Observe! the passage does not say he sent forth his Son into the world, as if the sending was consequent upon, or subsequent to, his birth. He does not say that his Son was born and then he sent him, but he sent him, and then he was born of a woman under the law. And the word exapostello beautifully expresses this; it was the sending out of Christ from where he "was in the beginning with God."

The word is used in the New Testament ten times besides Gal. 4 : 4. Luke 1 : 53; "The rich hath he sent empty away." This was not sending them to any place, but sending them out from the feast where he "filled the hungry with good things." Luke 20 : 10, 11. The husbandmen "beat him and sent him away empty. Here the sense is the same; he was driven from the vineyard. Acts 7 : 12. Jacob "sent out our fathers first." That is they left his home, sent out to go and find corn. Acts 9 : 30. When Paul's life was in peril, the brethren "sent him forth to Tarsus;" not on a mission, but to escape from the Jews. Acts 11 : 22. "The church sent forth Barnabas"—he was their delegate, sent forth out of the midst of the living church of Jerusalem, and he went forth to minister to the brethren at Antioch. Acts 2 : 2: "The Lord hath sent his angel and delivered me," etc. This angel was sent forth, not sent as John was of God on earth, but sent as Jesus was from God in heaven. So the same word is used to express the sending of him forth. Acts 17 : 14. "The brethren sent away Paul," when the Jews had stirred up the people of Berea. Here he was sent out, not allowed to stay. Not sent forth on an errand, but sent out from Berea, rather than to some other place. Acts 22 : 21. "I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." This sending was not spoken merely of his going to the Gentiles, but of the getting away from the Jews, who would not receive his testimony. And as he seemed determined to stay and preach Christ where he had persecuted him, the Lord commanded him peremptorily to "DEPART;" and said he would send him out far from there to the nations. Gal. 4 : 6. "God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." This is the next verse but one after the passage which declares that God sent forth his Son. The same word is used to express the sending. Did God really send forth his Spirit into our hearts? And was it not his Spirit before he sent it? Then he did also send forth his Son, and he was his Son before he sent him.

I have quoted every passage where the Greek word occurs, and it agrees with the testimony of prophets and apostles in showing that the Son "came forth from the Father." So I think that passage does not need any harmonizing.

Rom. 1 : 3. "Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made (genomenos) of the seed of David according to the FLESH." The word made is rendered born by McKnight, the expression being the same as that in the other passage. Gal. 4 : 4. How does this need harmonizing? Does any one assert that according to the FLESH, or "with respect to the FLESH," as McKnight renders it, Christ was not of the seed of David? He was of the seed of David according to the FLESH, and no further; as to his Spirit, in him dwelt all the fullness of the godhead embodied. That which is born of the flesh is flesh—that was Davidic and human, but as concerning his higher and veiled nature, was that of the seed of David? Nay, verily, and men knew it when he brake the bands of death and triumphed over all his foes, rising from the dead.

2 Tim. 2 : 8. "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel." How does this need harmonizing? Jesus Christ is of the seed of David, but it is only his fleshly nature. This fact must be remembered, because Christ is now the only living heir to David's throne. No other being can trace his lineage back to the Royal Shepherd of Israel: hence it is to be remembered that Jesus Christ of the seed of David, as rightful heir to the throne, is not dead, but is raised from the dead, and liveth to die no more.

But is Christ nothing but the seed of David? This question arose ages since. When the Pharisees came to Jesus with their entangling questions, he easily answered them, and then turned to them with the following query, "What think ye of the Anointed,—the Christ,—whose Son is he? "They said unto him the Son of David." Then followed another question: "How, then, doth David in spirit call him LORD?" In this day of "disobedience to parents," when the youngest person in a house is regarded as lord of all, and the eldest as servant of all, the question might be answered. But in those days when no man ever called any but a superior, lord or master,—when to call a man lord was to make yourself his servant,—when no father would ever call his son lord, much less would a king call a far distant and unborn descendant his lord, this question could not be so easily disposed of.

It put an eternal quietus upon the questioning of the Pharisees. No man could answer him a word, or a reason, and from that time no man dared to ask him any more questions. Matt. 22. The Pharisees were put to silence and to shame. They believed that the Christ was David's son, and nothing more. Then why doth David in spirit or by inspiration (Ps. 110) call him his ruler or his lord? It may be said he called him his Lord because he was going to be his Lord. This would be about as reasonable as if the twelve patriarchs had called Peter and James and John Lords, thousands of years before their existence, because they should yet sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; or, as if, in case A. Lincoln should be elected president, some one had called him president, not merely when he was navigating a flat-boat on the Mississippi, or splitting rails out west, but before he or his father, or his father's ancestors for ages back were born. A man is not president till he is elected; he is not properly king till he is born or crowned; much less is he Lord, and Lord of a KING like David, ages before he has any existence whatever.

"How is he then his Son?" The answer is given by Christ himself in Rev. 22 : 16. In almost the last words he ever spoke to his church, he unraveled his own deep mystery, and answers the question that was too obscure for Jewish subtlety and Pharisaic guile. Thus he said: "I am the ROOT AND THE OFFSPRING of David—the bright and the morning star." This unseals the "dark saying of old" which had been kept secret from the beginning of the ages. Christ was David's root, from which the poet king of Israel and all mankind sprang, and he was the offspring of David in that he took upon him the likeness and the seed of David's line, and became his son according to his bodily nature. As the Creator and Lord of all, he is David's root and LORD. As the man of sorrows, the child of Mary, he is the branch out of David's roots; and so he is his son. To those who thus see the divine glory as well as the human abasement of Christ, the words which speak of Christ as the "seed of Abraham," "to whom the promise was made," (Gal. 3 : 16 : 19) present no obscurity and need no harmonizing. They are harmonious.

Two parts of a musical composition harmonize when each has a different melody; but all chord, or agree, and chime together in sweet sounds. So these Scriptures make a harmony. They tell both sides of one story. Like the shield which had one side of silver and the other of gold, Christ's character has both the human and the divine. With those who cannot see this distinction, I have no quarrel. They need a mightier teacher than I, even him of whom Jesus spake, when, after Peter had said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," he replied, "FLESH and BLOOD hath not revealed it unto thee, but MY FATHER which is in heaven." May he teach us as Christ taught his disciples, that "all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father."

I must conclude. I have this day reached home after an absence of about three months, since April 19th. I have written these few remarks that any inquiring mind might be guided into truth. As for those who are disposed for controversy on this, or any other point, I have no time nor inclination to mingle in disputes. Christ is to me more than man, while his humanity is to me as real, as palpable, as my own. I come near to his heart of humanity as to an elder brother's side, and then I look above "all principality and power, and every name that is named both in this world and that which is to come," and like the royal psalmist, I bow my head and adore him as my Ruler. Like the beloved apostle, I fall at his feet, and reverence him as "the Almighty." Like "all the angels," I bow and "worship him,"—yea, like the most cool, doubting and sceptical of his own disciples, I cry out, "My Lord and my God."

For the Crisis.

Christian Union.

The religion of our Savior is unquestionably a theme inexpressible in its nature, as well as unfathomable in its merits. It swallows up every notion of moral good; every feeling of self-sufficiency; all aspiring thoughts of self-aggrandisement: and silently and mysteriously stamps, guages, and levels the monarch with the serf—the king with the beggar; while they bring their tithes and offerings into one common treasury—the heart's first precious gift to a crucified Lord. There is no difference between Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female; but all are one in Christ Jesus.

Some men's hearts are like store-houses; they are made the receptacle of other men's chattels. They are always willing to accept, gratuitously, any plan or theory that looks feasible, without a moment's sober reflection upon the possibility of reconciling their notion with truth and righteousness. From this baneful evil have sprung all the schisms, popular traditions, and unphilosophical notions that run riot among christian churches; and, from their convenience, likely to continue in favor and fashion.

The Apostle Paul, in his letter to the saints and brethren that were at Colosse, exhorts them to attain unto that hope which was laid up for them in heaven; and to continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel: and then when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. Now it was through this fear expressly—this being moved away from the hope of the gospel—this forgetting to look for the glorious appearing of the great God our Savior Jesus Christ, that he thus admonishes them:—"Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men."

But some professing christian may say, "What of all this? we believe all this is true enough,—our confession of faith embodies all these tenets, and we suppose them to be pre-requisite to the attainment of eternal life." [illegible] has been abided by:—"Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." I ask no indulgence for mere speculation, (though the readers of the Crisis may act the part of jurors,) when I assert that this is the point in christian philosophy where error gains a foothold; while truth stands in the background, half wondering at the unwarranted presumption of her successful rival. And all because humanity are determined not to accept any more of the gospel than they think adequate to their spiritual wants.

Through this neglect come all divisions, heresies, false doctrines—Spiritualism. Now the Apostle says: "Let love be without dissimulation." "Be kindly affectioned one to another, in honor preferring one another." Where these graces find fit temples to dwell in, Satan with his whole programme of alluring baits can never decoy or estrange the affections of the people of God. If the world will think more of their creeds than they do of their Bibles; if self must be satiated before Christ can be honored; if a puerile notion of self-sufficiency is suffered to drown the command of God, as a secondary consideration; and if those who style themselves the people of God will cage themselves in a fabricated network of theological opinion, instead of entrenching themselves behind that bulwark of defence—the Bible—the church of Satan will grow and flourish, and there will be added to it daily such as shall be lost.

I do not wish to be understood as believing every doctrinal point essential to salvation; or, in other words, that mankind cannot be saved because they do not see that they are the fundamental principles of christianity; but if salvation is accepted on the reasonable terms of the gospel, it carries along with it all its elements, all its vitality and vigor, every requisite necessity that operates in the work of regeneration. The foot may not say of the hand, I have no need of thee; neither may the ear say of the eye, I have no need of thee. If I break a finger from the hand of the statue Apollo Belvidere, I injure the harmony of its grace and perfectness: if I detach another, it is less valuable, and less to be admired than before. And this law of separation will hold good, until it will cease to be a statue. So with truth. God has laid down great and divine laws, to guide and govern us. They are in perfect keeping with his divine will. They are in harmony with his character. But if a class of frail specimens of the dust deem a portion of them not necessitous, and, by not accepting them as special obligations, create a schism in the great plan of salvation; it is no proof whatever against their practicability, or reasonableness—no proof of their insufficiency to perfect for another state, where speculation gives place to divine realities.

Again. To say that some doctrinal points are superfluous, involves the divine economy of God; and is making the holy oracles a nullity and a fable. But he has given them to us for our special benefit; to enlighten our darkened understanding, and to show us his will concerning us.

2d. To create a disposition among christians to fellowship in harmony, love and peace, there must be a great vital principle adhered to, namely: making Christ their all in all. If the meekness and gentleness of Christ is made the example of christian character, there may be a concession on the part of either, without alienating the affections from God, or departing from a strictly divine command. "Let not your good be evil spoken of." Paul, when with Jews, became a Jew. He became anything for Christ, if perchance he might win some.

The retention of first love is the most important item in preserving harmony and union among christians. Just let your memory wander back, until it tremblingly hovers over the spot where you were first rocked into spiritual life—where the healing virtues of that pellucid stream washed away our stains—where your heart drank anew of unutterable joy, as you basked in the light of Christ's divine acceptance—where a vision of Calvary's summit, wreathed in cloud, drew from your soul its unspeakable offering, and bade you trust his love. And then tell me, if Christ was not your all in all. Tell me if your love did not grasp the world. Tell me if all who did the will of your Father in heaven were not your mother, and sister, and brother. Tell me if there was any contention, disagreement, strife of words, anger, malice, or self-righteousness, to mar the harmony and tranquillity of that soothing love as it flowed, pure as life's river, through the channels of your melting heart. If these unholy passions found no resting-place there, let me ask, by what agency were the seeds of discord sown, that [illegible] sermons—the still whisperings of captivating philosophy—you forgot to exercise that eternal law of rectitude, duty; while custom, fashion, popular favor, began to fill up the entire vision,—the substantial virtue of your first love began to wane, and you became joined to your idol.

Lastly, let me notice among many of the remedies submitted for the cure of this loathsome and pernicious disease, one that possesses those medicinal properties which, if properly and judiciously applied, will restore the patient to his lost estate.

Jesus speaks to us, for whom he gave his very life to save. He speaks in all the pity of unmeasured love, as he exhorts us to love one another. He says: "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you." "If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." Again he says: "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." Thank God we can well afford to be separated from the company of the worldly-minded; for if we abide in Christ, our reward shall be great, and we shall be called the children of the Highest. We can well afford to continue in Jesus' love, for when he shall appear we shall be like him, and see him as he is. We can well afford to be separated from the company of scribes and pharisees, for the sake of continuing in the love of a risen Lord; because he hath said, He that overcometh shall walk with me in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name from the book of life; but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. And last, but not least; we can well afford to make the teachings of the Son of God the infallible chart that shall guide us over the sands of the desert of life, even at the loss of the friendship of this world, (for that is at enmity against God,) because he has admonished us, "Let not your hearts be troubled, neither let them be afraid." "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

With these heavenly assurances, then let us apply this healing balm to our wayward hearts. It will make them impervious to the blighting schisms that seethe the soul with the scorching blasts of scurrilous rebuke. It will form a protective armor against the assaults of ungodly men. It will ever insure us acceptance with our Savior; and through its influence the spirit of grace will link our hearts together with bands which nought but death can sever.

Let this be our mission in this life, to prepare to meet our God in peace. And when earth's scenes shall close—when our absent Lord shall come, wrapt in the glory of Jehovah's power—when amid the thunders of a dissolving world, he shall come with all that hierarchy of sinless seraphs that cast their crowns at the feet of divine Omnipotence—when that imperial mandate shall reverberate through heaven, earth, and sea, "Give up thy dead," amid the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds, we shall be wrapt up far above the clouds to meet him. And he will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it. And in a fairer clime of perennial bloom, in temples where angels hold their endless sabbaths, with the glory of God shining ever, we shall be made kings and priests unto God. That city will have no need of the sun to shine in it; the Lamb shall be the light thereof.

Reminiscence of '54.

BY VESTA E. CUDWORTH.

'T was sunset hour, when a crimson cloud
Was floating in beauty by,
That looked like the folds of a snowy shroud,
Dipped in a golden dye.
A little boy clapped his hands with glee,
Saying, "Mother! dear mother, come!
'Lijah's firey chariot's come for me,
Get your bonnet, and we'll go home."

But a shadow rested on that young brow,
As onward passed the bright cloud;
Still patiently waited the hour to go
Up to the blest abode;
And talked of home as the night drew on,
And he rested his tired head,
Saying, "God will paper my little room,
And he'll make me a pretty bed."

Now years have passed, but he does not ask,
"When will my dear Savior come?"
For he fears the sound of the trumpet's blast,
And the fiery day of doom;
And I ask, would there now be half the joy
With some that have looked for Him,
That dwelt in the heart of my gentle boy,
Should they witness the coming King?

The New Birth.

The doctrine of the new birth is reduced [by] the modern church to mere christian [ex]perience; and accordingly consists in a [mor]al change of character, which takes [pla]ce at the event of conversion, and accor[din]g to their theology means one and the [sa]me thing.

In the first place, I consider the doctrine [of] the new birth to be exclusively applica[ble] to the introduction of the world to come. [In] proof of which, I shall consider the na[tu]re of that new birth through which the [Lo]rd Jesus Christ passed; which will be [fou]nd to be so intimately connected with [th]e new birth of the saints, that, to ascer[tain] the nature of the one, we must neces[sa]rily understand that of the other.

Then as Adam was the first man whom [Go]d created in the present world, so Jesus [C]hrist, the second Adam, is declared to be [th]e first man whom he created of the inhab[ita]nts of the world to come. This truth is [con]veyed in the following language, in re[lat]ion to Jesus Christ, thus: Who is "the [be]ginning of the creation of God,"—Rev. [3:] 14—which we shall find to be the new [cre]ation. The apostle, speaking of the [or]der of the resurrection of the dead, [giv]es Christ the precedence, he being [th]e first of that resurrection upon whom [Go]d conferred immortality. That this [...] was done at his resurrection, the fol[low]ing testimony proves: "If the Spirit [of] him who raised up Jesus from the dead, [dw]ell in you, he that raised up Christ from [the] dead shall also quicken your mortal [bod]ies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." [Ro]m. 8: 11. Again, speaking of Christ [lyi]ng in the grave, the apostle says: "His [so]ul," or himself, "was not left in Hell, [ne]ither his flesh did see corruption."—Acts [2:] 31. Here, then, it is positively stated [tha]t Jesus Christ was mortal, and that he [wa]s dead and buried. All, therefore, that [is] included in the term Jesus Christ, actu[all]y lay in the grave, dead. And, also, [th]at he was raised from the dead, not by [hi]s own power, but by the power or Spirit [of] God; and as that, he being mortal, and [ha]ving been quickened, or brought to life, [b]y the Spirit of God, it must have rendered [h]im, what he was not before, immortal. [T]hese are plain, and indeed unavoidable [f]acts, and can not be evaded by saying that [i]t was nothing but his body which lay in [t]he tomb.

I said that, in the order of the resurrec[tion], Christ had the precedence. This may be seen by such passages as the following: "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward, they that are Christ's at his coming; then cometh the end."—1 Cor. 15: 23. He is also declared to be the first born among many brethren."—Rom. 8: 29. And again it is said, "that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead.—Acts 26: 23." Again, "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep."—Heb. 13: 20. Then it is [...] clear that he had the precedence of the first resurrection; and also that it was not accomplished by his own native energy, which indeed would have been an improbability; for how could he, when dead, put forth any act whatever, much less that power and skill requisite to raise the dead; and more especially to raise himself from the dead. I am aware he declared while living, that he had power to lay down his life and to take it again. This is more properly rendered liberty or right. The Scriptures repeatedly affirm that God raised him from the dead. His second life, or birth, was as much the work of God as he was begotten by the power of the Highest at his first birth. This introduced him into mortal life, and the second birth into immortal and incorruptible life; this being the resurrection life, and effected by the Spirit of God, it is, therefore, called a spiritual birth.

I think now we shall appreciate the doctrine of the new birth brought to view in the conversation between Christ and Nicodemus. In answer to some inquiries he had proposed to Jesus, we have this answer given: "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." But Nicodemus did not understand how a man could be born when he was old; and Jesus repeats the assertion, but with additional instruction, thus: "Except a man be born of water (natural birth) and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." Thus we have the natural birth, the production of which is corruption, flesh and blood, and the new birth, qualifying its possessor to be an inhabitant of the kingdom of God, which, as it is said, corruption can not inherit.

We have seen that he is said to be the first born among many brethren; and now if it be ascertained that this birth was indeed from the dead, then, also, the new birth of his brethren, of whom he was the first fruits, must necessarily be affixed to their resurrection from the dead; and if so, the nature of the new birth is established. Now if Christ is the first born among his brethren, it follows that his birth is the example of that of his brethren. In further confirmation of this, I quote the following: Says the revelator, speaking of Christ, "Who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead."—Rev. 1: 5. Again, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore."—Rev. 1: 18. His thus being begotten from the dead, is the same expression implied to represent his first birth at infancy. Thus, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee."—Ps. 2: 7; Acts 13: 33; and of course implies that his resurrection birth to second life, was as literal as that of his natural birth. And he being the example, it follows that the spiritual birth of his brethren was not only to be from the dead, but that it will be as literal as that which first introduced them into being.

But again says the apostle, speaking of Christ, "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature .... And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first born from the dead, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence."—Col. 1: 15-18. Now it is evident that his being the first born of every creature, or the beginning of the creation of God, went no further back in the history of the world, than the event of his birth by the virgin Mary; for then he was actually born, and consequently could not have been born prior to that period. But that his being the first born of every creature could not have referred to his natural birth, is also evident; for every creature of the human race up to that period had been born prior to himself; but he was also born from the dead, and at this spiritual birth he assumed the image of the incorruptible God, being corruptible before that time, because in possession of fallen humanity. It was at this time, therefore, that he became the beginning of the creation of God, or the first born of every creature of that creation. Here Jesus Christ, the second Adam, having now obtained the pre-eminence, being the first one God formed for the incorruptible kingdom, or the new creation of the world which now groans to be delivered, now stands at the head of that creation, as the first Adam stood at the head of the primeval or old creation; he being the first creature of that creation, and the generations of the first Adam being that of corruption, introduced his offspring into the life that now is, which is the first birth; while the new birth is that of the Spirit, and introduces its subjects into the life which is to come, rendering them incorruptible and immortal.

In closing this [article], I shall only refer to a few more passages of scripture in relation to the new birth, and which will also be found to corroborate the views herein advanced. And first, it is said, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed," the incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever, "remaineth in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God."—1 John 3: 9. Again, "If is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body: it is sown in corruption; it (the body) is raised in incorruption: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power."—1 Cor. 15: 42-44. And hence after they are thus born again, they not only do not commit sin, but are incapable of such transactions, because of being born again of the incorruptible seed, the Spirit of God, which ushers its immortal subjects into the world to come! The idea, therefore, that men are born again when converted to Christianity, is perfectly irreconcilable with such texts as these, unless it be contended that they are incapable of transgression after that event, which idea is refuted by christian experience, as well as by the whole tenor of scripture on this point.

In order then to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, we must be born again; and if begotten, quickened by the Spirit: and, to carry out the figure, let us be careful lest an abortion be produced, and we be brought forth in an unnatural state, and the "wrath of God" abide upon us.

The Lord's Anointed.—No. 3.

"Stand up for Jesus."

How can Gal. 4: 4, Rom. 1: 3, 2 Tim. 2: 8, Gal. 3: 16-19, be harmonized with the FACT that Christ "was rich" and "became poor," was "in the beginning with God," "came down from heaven," was "before all things," and "all things were made by him?"

"How can they be harmonized?" I do not see any lack of harmony. Truth is harmonious—the Bible is truth, and that is harmonious too. Let us read the texts. Gal. 4: 4; "But when the fulness of the time was come, God SENT FORTH his "SON, made of a woman, made under the law," etc. Penn renders it "begotten of a woman, born under the law." McKnight renders it, "born of a woman, born under the law."

God "SENT FORTH his Son." Then he had a SON to SEND. What can be plainer? The word rendered sent forth is peculiar—it is exapostello. Now, apostello signifies to send out or send off upon an errand or mission; and so those that Jesus sent are called apostoloi, epostles, or those who were sent. But the word here has ek prefixed to it, which signifies out of, so it is defined "to send OUT, away," etc. Apostello is used where we read "there was a man sent, para, of, or by, God."—John 1: 6. But this word, EXapostello signifies a sending out, not merely with reference to the outside world, not out INTO, but out OF, or out from, so we should understand it; God sent forth his Son, i. e., forth or out from his former position, "in the bosom of the father." Observe! the passage does not say he sent forth his Son into the world, as if the sending was consequent upon, or subsequent to, his birth. He does not say that his Son was born and then he sent him, but he sent him, and then he was born of a woman under the law. And the word exapostello beautifully expresses this; it was the sending out of Christ from where he "was in the beginning with God."

The word is used in the New Testament ten times besides Gal. 4: 4. Luke 1: 53; "The rich hath he sent empty away." This was not sending them to any place, but sending them out from the feast where he "filled the hungry with good things." Luke 20: 10, 11. The husbandmen "beat him and sent him away empty." Here the sense is the same; he was driven from the vineyard. Acts 7: 12. Jacob "sent out our fathers first." That is they left his home, sent out to go and find corn. Acts 9: 30. When Paul's life was in peril, the brethren "sent him forth to Tarsus;" not on a mission, but to escape from the Jews. Acts 11: 22. "The church sent forth Barnabas"—he was their delegate, sent forth out of the midst of the living church of Jerusalem, and he sent forth to minister to the brethren at Antioch. Acts 2: 2: "The Lord hath sent his angel and delivered me," etc. This angel was sent forth, not sent as John was of God on earth, but sent as Jesus was from God in heaven. So the same word is used to express the sending of him forth. Acts 17: 14. "The brethren sent away Paul," when the Jews had stirred up the people of Berea. Here he was sent out, not allowed to stay. Not sent forth on an errand, but sent out from Berea, rather than to some other place. Acts 22: 21. "I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." This sending was not spoken merely of his going to the Gentiles, but of the getting away from the Jews, who would not receive his testimony. And as he seemed determined to stay and preach Christ where he had persecuted him, the Lord commanded him peremptorily to "DEPART;" and said he would send him out far from there to the nations. Gal. 4: 6. "God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." This is the next verse but one after the passage which declares that God sent forth his Son. The same word is used to express the sending. Did God really send forth his Spirit into our hearts? And was it not his Spirit before he sent it? Then he did also send forth his Son, and he was his Son before he sent him.

I have quoted every passage where the Greek word occurs, and it agrees with the testimony of prophets and apostles in showing that the Son "came forth from the Father." So I think that passage does not need any harmonizing.

Rom. 1: 3. "Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made (genomenos) of the seed of David according to the FLESH." The word made is rendered born by McKnight, the expression being the same as that in the other passage. Gal. 4: 4. How does this need harmonizing? Does any one assert that according to the FLESH, or "with respect to the FLESH," as McKnight renders it, Christ was not of the seed of David? He was of the seed of David according to the FLESH, and no further; as to his Spirit, in him dwelt all the fullness of the godhead embodied. That which is born of the flesh is flesh—that was Davidic and human, but as concerning his higher and veiled nature, was that of the seed of David? Nay, verily, and men knew it when he brake the bands of death and triumphed over all his foes, rising from the dead.

2 Tim. 2: 8. "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel." How does this need harmonizing? Jesus Christ is of the seed of David, but it is only his fleshly nature. This fact must be remembered, because Christ is now the only living heir to David's throne. No other being can trace his lineage back to the Royal Shepherd of Israel: hence it is to be remembered that Jesus Christ of the seed of David, as rightful heir to the throne, is not dead, but is raised from the dead, and liveth to die no more.

But is Christ nothing but the seed of David? This question arose ages since. When the Pharisees came to Jesus with their entangling questions, he easily answered them, and then turned to them with the following query, "What think ye of the Anointed,—the Christ,—whose Son is he? "They said unto him the Son of David." Then followed another question: "How, then, doth David in spirit call him LORD?" In this day of "disobedience to parents," when the youngest person in a house is regarded as lord of all, and the eldest as servant of all, the question might be answered. But in those days when no man ever called any but a superior, lord or master,—when to call a man lord was to make yourself his servant,—when no father would ever call his son lord, much less would a king call a far distant and unborn descendant his lord, this question could not be so easily disposed of.

It put an eternal quietus upon the questioning of the Pharisees. No man could answer him a word, or a reason, and from that time no man dared to ask him any more questions. Matt. 22. The Pharisees were put to silence and to shame. They believed that the Christ was David's son, and nothing more. Then why doth David in spirit or by inspiration (Ps. 110) call him his ruler or his lord? It may be said he called him his Lord because he was going to be his Lord. This would be about as reasonable as if the twelve patriarchs had called Peter and James and John Lords, thousands of years before their existence, because they should yet sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; or, as if, in case A. Lincoln should be elected president, some one had called him president, not merely when he was navigating a flat-boat on the Mississippi, or splitting rails out west, but before he or his father, or his father's ancestors for ages back were born. A man is not president till he is elected; he is not properly king till he is born or crowned; much less is he Lord, and Lord of a KING like David, ages before he has any existence whatever.

"How is he then his Son?" The answer is given by Christ himself in Rev. 22: 16. In almost the last words he ever spoke to his church, he unraveled his own deep mystery, and answers the question that was too obscure for Jewish subtlety and Pharisaic guile. Thus he said: "I am the ROOT AND THE offspring of David—the bright and the morning star." This unseals the "dark saying of old" which had been kept secret from the beginning of the ages. Christ was David's root, from which the poet king of Israel and all mankind sprang, and he was the offspring of David in that he took upon him the likeness and the seed of David's line, and became his son according to his bodily nature. As the Creator and Lord of all, he is David's root and LORD. As the man of sorrows, the child of Mary, he is the branch out of David's roots; and so he is his son. To those who thus see the divine glory as well as the human abasement of Christ, the words which speak of Christ as the "seed of Abraham," "to whom the promise was made," (Gal. 3: 16: 19) present no obscurity and need no harmonizing. They are harmonious.

Two parts of a musical composition harmonize when each has a different melody; but all chord, or agree, and chime together in sweet sounds. So these Scriptures make a harmony. They tell both sides of one story. Like the shield which had one side of silver and the other of gold, Christ's character has both the human and the divine. With those who cannot see this distinction, I have no quarrel. They need a mightier teacher than I, even him of whom Jesus spake, when, after Peter had said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," he replied, "FLESH and BLOOD hath not revealed it unto thee, but MY FATHER which is in heaven." May he teach us as Christ taught his disciples, that "all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father."

I must conclude. I have this day reached home after an absence of about three months, since April 19th. I have written these few remarks that any inquiring mind might be guided into truth. As for those who are disposed for controversy on this, or any other point, I have no time nor inclination to mingle in disputes. Christ is to me more than man, while his humanity is to me as real, as palpable, as my own. I come near to his heart of humanity as to an elder brother's side, and then I look above "all principality and power, and every name that is named both in this world and that which is to come," and like the royal psalmist, I bow my head and adore him as my Ruler. Like the beloved apostle, I fall at his feet, and reverence him as "the Almighty." Like "all the angels," I bow and "worship him,"—yea, like the most cool, doubting and sceptical of his own disciples, I cry out, "My Lord and my God."

H. L. HASTINGS.

Providence, R. I.

For the Crisis.

Christian Union.

The religion of our Savior is unquestionably a theme inexpressible in its nature, as well as unfathomable in its merits. It swallows up every notion of moral good; every feeling of self-sufficiency; all aspiring thoughts of self-aggrandizement: and silently and mysteriously stamps, guages, and levels the monarch with the serf—the king with the beggar; while they bring their tithes and offerings into one common treasury—the heart's first precious gift to a crucified Lord. There is no difference between Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female; but all are one in Christ Jesus.

Some men's hearts are like store-houses; they are made the receptacle of other men's chattels. They are always willing to accept, gratuitously, any plan or theory that looks feasible, without a moment's sober reflection upon the possibility of reconciling their notion with truth and righteousness. From this baneful evil have sprung all the schisms, popular traditions, and unphilosophical notions that run riot among christian churches; and, from their convenience, likely to continue in favor and fashion.

The Apostle Paul, in his letter to the saints and brethren that were at Colosse, exhorts them to attain unto that hope which was laid up for them in heaven; and to continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel: and then when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. Now it was through this fear expressly—this being moved away from the hope of the gospel—this forgetting to look for the glorious appearing of the great God our Savior Jesus Christ, that he thus admonishes them:—"Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men."

But some professing christians may say, "What of all this? we believe all this is true enough; our confession of faith embodies all these tenets; and we accept them as pre-requisite to the attainment of eternal life." But the question finds a new birth when it craves to know if these beliefs are made practical; if the injunction of Paul has been abided by:—"Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." I ask no indulgence for mere speculation, (though the readers of the Crisis may act the part of jurors,) when I assert that this is the point in christian philosophy where error gains a foothold; while truth stands in the background, half wondering at the unwarranted presumption of her successful rival. And all because humanity are determined not to accept any more of the gospel than they think adequate to their spiritual wants.

Through this neglect come all divisions, heresies, false doctrines—Spiritualism. Now the Apostle says: "Let love be without dissimulation." "Be kindly affectioned one to another, in honor preferring one another." Where these graces find fit temples to dwell in, Satan with his whole programme of alluring baits can never decoy or estrange the affections of the people of God. If the world will think more of their creeds than they do of their Bibles; if self must be satiated before Christ can be honored; if a puerile notion of self-sufficiency is suffered to drown the command of God, as a secondary consideration; and if those who style themselves the people of God will cage themselves in a fabricated network of theological opinion, instead of entrenching themselves behind that bulwark of defence—the Bible—the church of Satan will grow and flourish, and there will be added to it daily such as shall be lost.

I do not wish to be understood as believing every doctrinal point essential to salvation; or, in other words, that mankind cannot be saved because they do not see that they are the fundamental principles of christianity; but if salvation is accepted on the reasonable terms of the gospel, it carries along with it all its elements, all its vitality and vigor, every requisite necessity that operates in the work of regeneration. The foot may not say of the hand, I have no need of thee; neither may the ear say of the eye, I have no need of thee. If I break a finger from the hand of the statue Apollo Belvidere, I injure the harmony of its grace and perfectness: if I detach another, it is less valuable, and less to be admired than before. And this law of separation will hold good, until it will cease to be a statue. So with truth. God has laid down great and divine laws, to guide and govern us. They are in perfect keeping with his divine will. They are in harmony with his character. But if a class of frail specimens of the dust deem a portion of them not necessitous, and, by not accepting them as special obligations, create a schism in the great plan of salvation; it is no proof whatever against their practicability, or reasonableness—no proof of their insufficiency to perfect for another state, where speculation gives place to divine realities.

Again. To say that some doctrinal points are superfluous, involves the divine economy of God; and is making the holy oracles a nullity and a fable. But he has given them to us for our special benefit; to enlighten our darkened understanding, and to show us his will concerning us.

2d. To create a disposition among christians to fellowship in harmony, love and peace, there must be a great vital principle adhered to, namely: making Christ their all in all. If the meekness and gentleness of Christ is made the example of christian character, there may be a concession on the part of either, without alienating the affections from God, or departing from a strictly divine command. "Let not your good be evil spoken of." Paul, when with Jews, became a Jew. He became anything for Christ, if perchance he might win some.

The retention of first love is the most important item in preserving harmony and union among christians. Just let your memory wander back, until it tremblingly hovers over the spot where you were first rocked into spiritual life—where the healing virtues of that pellucid stream washed away our stains—where your heart drank anew of unutterable joy, as you basked in the light of Christ's divine acceptance—where a vision of Calvary's summit, wreathed in cloud, drew from your soul its unspeakable offering, and bade you trust his love. And then tell me, if Christ was not your all in all. Tell me if your love did not grasp the world. Tell me if all who did the will of your Father in heaven were not your mother, and sister, and brother. Tell me if there was any contention, disagreement, strife of words, anger, malice, or self-righteousness, to mar the harmony and tranquillity of that soothing love as it flowed, pure as life's river, through the channels of your melting heart. If these unholy passions found no resting-place there, let me ask, by what agency were the seeds of discord cemented, that sundered the tie [illegible] sermons—the still whisperings of captivating philosophy—you forgot to exercise that eternal law of rectitude, duty: while custom, fashion, popular favor, began to fill up the entire vision,—the [illegible] virtue of your first love began to wane, and you became joined to your idol.

Lastly, let me notice among many of the remedies submitted for the cure of this loathsome and pernicious disease, one that possesses those medicinal properties which if properly and judiciously applied, will restore the patient to his lost estate.

Jesus speaks to us, for whom he gave his very life to save. He speaks in all the pity of unmeasured love, as he exhorts us to love one another. He says: "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you." "If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." Again he says: "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." Thank God we can well afford to be separated from the company of the worldly-minded; for if we abide in Christ, our reward shall be great, and we shall be called the children of the Highest. We can well afford to continue in Jesus' love, for when he shall appear we shall be like him, and see him as he is. We can well afford to be separated from the company of scribes and pharisees, for the sake of continuing in the love of a risen Lord; because he hath said, He that overcometh shall walk with me in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name from the book of life; but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. And last, but not least; we can well afford to make the teachings of the Son of God the infallible chart that shall guide us over the sands of the desert of life, even at the loss of the friendship of this world, (for that is at enmity against God,) because he has admonished us, "Let not your hearts be troubled, neither let them be afraid." "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

With these heavenly assurances, then let us apply this healing balm to our wayward hearts. It will make them impervious to the blighting schisms that seethe the soul with the scorching blasts of scurrilous rebuke. It will form a protective armor against the assaults of ungodly men. It will ever insure us acceptance with our Savior; and through its influence the spirit of grace will link our hearts together with bands which nought but death can sever.

Let this be our mission in this life, to prepare to meet our God in peace. And when earth's scenes shall close—when our absent Lord shall come, wrapt in the glory of Jehovah's power—when amid the thunders of a dissolving world, he shall come with all that hierarchy of sinless seraphs that cast their crowns at the feet of divine Omnipotence—when that imperial mandate shall reverberate through heaven, earth, and sea, "Give up thy dead," amid the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds, we shall be wrapt up far above the clouds to meet him. And he will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it. And in a fairer clime of perennial bloom, in temples where angels hold their endless sabbaths, with the glory of God shining ever, we shall be made kings and priests unto God. That city will have no need of the sun to shine in it; the Lamb shall be the light thereof.

For the Crisis.

Answer to an Inquiry.

I am asked "if any part of man is conscious, or knows anything after death?"

In my articles lately published in the Crisis, I have insisted on the distinction between consciousness and the separate existence of the soul, waiving all [illegible] of the former. The above question, therefore, is not relevant to my present [illegible]. But I have recorded an opinion on [illegible] in my "[illegible]" [illegible]. My reasons for that opinion are not given at large, but it was given deliberately, with the full expectation that it would satisfy neither my orthodox nor my [illegible] friends—and I am not disappointed. I [illegible]

For the Crisis.

Pre-Existence.—To Bro. Durgin.

I notice in the Crisis of July 11th, a request for some specified brethren to reconcile certain texts cited, "with our views of the existence of Jesus as a being before he was born of Mary his mother." Perhaps others may speak before I do. But it may not be amiss if we all speak. I will therefore say

1. There does not appear to me a want of harmony between the descriptions of Christ's pre-existence, "as a being," and those texts cited.

2. But if such did appear, I should feel bound to believe the many positive and clear statements of Scripture texts asserting such existence, though I might not comprehend the way out of the mystery of "God, manifest in the flesh."

3. I have seen and heard the ideas about the supposed difficulty, and therefore know where the light is needed, and will say, Christ the anointed of God did not exist until the birth mentioned. Jesus the Christ was born and grew to manhood in the form of a servant, for certain work; but before this, that portion of Christ not of the seed of David, existed as a being, in form, and in fact; as an intelligent being too.

God said, "let us make man," etc. Christ said, "Before Abraham was, I am." Christ says, "I proceeded forth and came from God." Paul said, "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same. . . . He took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren." "He took upon him the form of a servant," etc. Now all these, and a host of other texts, show that a being existed with the Father, who took action, made choice, held council with the Father, agreed to conditions, to labor, to suffer, to rise and conquer, reign, and enter the glory he had "before the world was."

"That being, called "THE WORD," could, by the Almighty, be transformed, by being united with the flesh—"seed of David," and so become "in form of a servant," "in the likeness of sinful men," that intelligence be mingled with, or developed by, the new organism which constituted "the Christ." Paul says, "it is a great mystery." I believe Paul told the truth. I believe the Father capable of doing it. Facts show it was done. Christ acknowledged it as being done. I must believe it, although unable to say how the thing was accomplished. I do not know the process by which matter was brought first to form solid bodies; nor how they were shaped into earth and water; neither how the mechanical work of forming man of the dust was done; and of taking the rib from his side and making Eve of it; but it was done, I am told by Paul, it is "Through FAITH we understand the worlds were framed by the word of God." Let us have a little more faith, and we shall also understand that he who was "the word," "in the beginning," had an existence as a being "before Abraham;" had glory with the Father before the world was;" that he "came down from heaven;" was combined with the seed of David, constituted Immanuel—God with us. He was the Son of God, the son of man, the seed of the woman; the seed of David, which suffered and died for us; was raised by the Father, "and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." He ascended "up where he was before." Come, let us have faith in revealed facts, let it lead to whatever results it may. I am not afraid to believe God, though I cannot explain all his works.

Yours in the hope of eternal life through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Grant of Justinian.

We decree, according to their prescripts, (viz., those of the Holy Synods,) that the Most Holy Pope of ancient Rome have the primacy of all the Priests; but that the most Blessed Archbishop of Constantinople, or new Rome, hold the second place after the apostolical See of the elder Rome, yet that he have the precedence before all other Sees. (Justinian, New Tales, Constitution 131, Cap. 2.)

THE GRANT OF PHOCAS.

In the year 606 he (Phocas) granted to Boniface III. that he should be held as UNIVERSAL BISHOP of ROME; not only that he should have precedence before the rest in rank and honor, as Justinian gave decree establishing the primacy of the Holy Synods, but that the whole world should be his diocese. ([Brightman,] Revelation Revealed, p. 205.)

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, AUGUST 1, 1860.

"Strip Him."

We find the words used for our heading in a "Pastoral Letter," from the Archbishop of Baltimore to the clergy. The "letter" is found in The Catholic, published at Pittsburg. The expression is used with reference to the intentions of the powers of Europe, which are arrayed against the Pope and his supporters. This corresponds with a prophetic declaration in Rev. 17: 16, where the church at Rome is most clearly the subject. One of the last items in her history, as mentioned in this verse, is the following:—"The ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, ["strip her"] and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." It appears certain that the work of desolation has commenced, and that the remainder will soon be accomplished.

The Papal finances are in a low condition, and draining rapidly. Her waters are drying up. We clip the following from the "Pastoral Letter" to which we have referred:

"Their object is doubtless to strip him of all his dominions, and make him a mere dependent on the civil government, or a victim and martyr: but the devices of the impious are vain, whilst the divine counsels cannot be defeated. In his own good time God will come to the aid of his servant. The tiara may be torn from his head, and he may be cast into a dungeon, but he will come forth full of majesty, as his predecessor, the seventh Pius, came forth in triumph, and was welcomed by his devoted people.

A duty devolves upon us, in consequence of the loss of the revolted province, the revenue of which had enabled the Pontiff to meet the expenses of his ecclesiastical adminstration. In the reduced state of his finances, we should supply our portion towards the support of our chief Bishop, who governs the Universal Church with a view to the spiritual interests of all. . . . We solicit, therefore, special donations according to the means furnished you by Providence: and we appoint the first Sunday of September for a general collection in all the churches of our ecclesiastical province, that all may have an opportunity to cast their offerings, even the smallest, like the widow's mite, into the treasury of the Church."

Queries.

"In investigating the parable of the ten virgins, can we come to any other conclusion than that the wise virgins considered the request to give oil (if complied with) as hazarding their admittance into the marriage? or, in other words, taking their crown?"—Rev. 8: 11.

STEPHEN L. GORDON.

[We should answer in the affirmative.

Please explain 1 Cor. 15: 29.

F. A. DIKEMAN.

The text reads as follows: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?"

This passage has puzzled many minds, and received a variety of comments. Dr. Clarke says, "This is certainly the most difficult verse in the New Testament." It certainly is difficult for those who believe sprinkling to be baptism; but very plain, we think, to those who receive immersion as the only true baptism, and understand its signification.

Dr. Clarke makes some very good and truthful remarks on this subject. When speaking of the primitive christians, he says:

"The baptism which they received, they considered as an emblem of their natural death and resurrection. This doctrine St. Paul most positively preaches, Rom. 6: 3–5. Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead, even so we also should walk in newness of life; for if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in his resurrection." It is evident from this, that all who died in the faith of Christ, died in the faith of the resurrection. . . .

The sum of the apostle's meaning appears to be this: if there be no resurrection of the dead, those who, in becoming christians, expose themselves to all manner of privations, crosses, sufferings, and a violent death, can have no compensation, nor any motive sufficient to induce them to expose themselves to such miseries. But as they receive baptism as an emblem of death, in voluntarily going under the water; so they receive it as an emblem of the resurrection unto eternal life, in coming up out of the water; thus they are baptized for the dead, in perfect faith of the resurrection."

We think the Dr. has expressed the true object of baptism, in the foregoing remarks. Paul is arguing the resurrection of the dead, in this part of his letter to the Corinthian Church; and asks them why they were baptized, "if the dead rise not at all?" as much as to say, your baptism is meaningless, if there is no resurrection of the dead. As they expected the whole man was to rise, so they baptized, or immersed, the whole man. We can find no proof that any thing short of immersing the whole body was considered baptism in the third century. The first variation [illegible] pouring water upon him, while on his bed. Subsequently, others took the position that a little water in such cases was as well as much; till finally, sprinkling was adopted by the Romish Church and copied by the Protestants.

When the candidate is laid beneath the yielding wave, his living again in this world depends upon his being raised out of the water; so, if he goes into the grave, his future life in the world to come depends on the resurrection of the dead; this great truth he shows by his baptism, when he attends to the ordinance understandingly. But "if the dead rise not at all," why be baptized? We are baptized by faith, into the death and burial of Christ, when we are laid under the water, and show our faith in his resurrection when we are raised out of the water. This is a likeness of his burial and resurrection, which becomes meaningless, if the dead never rise.

Paul expresses this idea very plainly in his letter to the Colossian brethren, chap. 2: 12. "Buried with him in baptism [immersion,] wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead."

It will be seen at once, that baptism is intimately associated with the resurrection; hence, when one denies the literal resurrection of the dead, to be consistent, he should also refuse to be baptized, and call the ceremony only a farce, without a meaning.

If men who die can obtain a future life in any other way than by a resurrection of the dead, then we see no reason for baptism. Paul tells us in this same fifteenth chapter of 1 Cor. that "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised . . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are PERISHED." No language could be plainer and stronger to show that the ONLY hope of future life, if we die, is based on the resurrection of the dead. Death is the end of us if we rise not. But we show by our baptism, that we believe Christ rose from the dead; consequently, he will raise us according to his promise, where he says, "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."—John 5: 28, 29.

"The Personal Epoch."

An English minister, who is interested in the signs of the times, and looking for the speedy personal coming of Christ says:

"The epoch of the Holy Alliance has passed away, and the age of Napoleon has revived. A more marvellous spectacle has never been witnessed by mankind. After the battle of Waterloo, in 1815, Napoleon fell, never to rise again! His family was crushed down, his empire partitioned; his dynasty proscribed; his very name obliterated. Great was the exultation of Europe: England, and each nation, claiming for itself the glory of destroying the giant. . . . .

Now the Time has come for the Personal Epoch;—for the gathering up of ten thousand energies in the person of ONE MAN. . . . .

The Personal Epoch of the Son of God is to be preceded for a while by the Personal Epoch of the Son of Perdition. . . . The nineteenth century began with a Personal Era: The First Napoleon was the centre and the representative of that era. . . . . The Third Napoleon concentrates in himself whatever still remains of the strong will and the wide capacity of the human mind. . . . . That man has no rival, and no coadjutor. Alone he draws the strings, and moves kings, and statesman and armies, like puppets. He is the most absolute of monarchs, and yet worshiped by the democracy. He is the head of the European democracy, yet the leader of monarchs. . . . .

The hero of the nineteenth century bears a name which is already familiar to all the globe. . . . . It has swallowed up every other name, and eclipsed them all by its magnitude, as some disastrous comet eclipses the fixed stars. Scripture tells us that there is but one name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved,—the name of Jesus of Nazareth. The Devil's scripture tells us that there is but one name by which the world can be set aright; and that name, you may be assured, will soon be publicly preached, and supersede the name of Jesus! . . . .

The most vehement opponents are giving way,—and the little stars of rivalry are fading off in the supernatural light of one unparalleled NAME! The Personal Epoch has begun.

Around one man there is now drawn a circle which embraces the entire globe. Let us advance the compass from Cape North, amidst the Norwegian snows, and describe the circumference. Scandinavia, Russia, Persia, China, Siam, Nubia, Egypt, Abyssinia, Palestine, Turkey, the whole Mediterranean coast, all central Europe, North Africa, the United States of America—in fact, the nations of the world—are drawn together around one man; to watch his looks, ponder over his words, and humbly follow in the line of his policy. His immense schemes have penetrated even the forest of Ethiopia, and crossed the mountains of Thibet. Men of every clime, color, feature, and passion, are equally spellbound by his arts. The fiery Arab, whose hand is against every man,—the ferocious Abyssinian, who lives upon raw flesh,—the refined and elegant Persian,—the immutable Chinese,—the barbarian of Siam,—the discordant races of Europe,—the men whose hearts are on fire beneath the southern sun,—the men who are wrapt around by the stormy visions of the north [illegible] the same man for the accomplishment of their desires, and to the same mind for the marking out of their course. So enormous a combination, so complete a reduction of mankind to one point, has never before been—not only seen, but—imagined: all nations fixing their eyes and suspending their hopes upon a single man. It is, indeed, a PERSONAL Epoch; for one person sums up in himself the thoughts and aspirations of the world. It is more, it is a New Religion, in which one living man is a God, and all other men are the worshipers. Flesh and blood is worshiped by flesh and blood; and not even the mantle of death is any longer thrown around the idol. In every sense a New Religion has sprung up, more sensual, more fervent, and more widely spread, than any former worship of a false god, or of the True. . . .

The dark mysteries of SPIRITUALISM have been added to complete the solemnities of the New Religion. In England, in America, over the continent, and above all, in Paris. Spiritualism has spread its mysterious empire. It began by the mere animal operation of table-turning. Having thus taught the world its alphabet, it proceeded to write out its fearful oracles; and whether Spirituality be a delusion or a reality, it is equally hastening on the work of the Dragon, and the Apostasy of the last days. We ourselves believe it to be REAL—a direct operation of the Devil. Like the Gospel of Christ, it has its peculiar faith, without which it can do nothing, and with which it can do everything. And now we find ourselves enveloped by all the terrors of the last days,—in a scene of nations gathered round one man,—in the presence of ONE man, more marvelous than the heroes of antiquity,—and with the gloomy spirits of the bottomless abyss rising up before us, and gliding along our path. Such is the Personal Epoch of Man and Satan.

The PERSONAL EPOCH of the Eighth Head is only permitted as a judgment for sin, and as a preparation for a personal Epoch of a far different kind. It is to be observed that, in all ages, great men of the highest order have been raised up at moments of especial degeneracy. The Judges of Israel, Alexander, Cæsar, and Charlemagne—all of them—appeared at a time when the surrounding world had begun to melt away in luxury, in cowardice, or in direct apostasy. A man of superhuman strength is indispensably required when society is falling to pieces by unusual weakness. The GREAT MAN is the massive beam which props up the falling house. The love of luxury abroad, the love of money in this country, the forgetfulness of God, and the idolatrous worship of man, have broken down society. Everything is demoralized; everything we see is weak, and flabby, and degenerate. Our religious societies have ceased to be divine, and have sunk into idolatry of MAN. They think no longer of the glory of God, but merely of subscriptions and noisy speeches. The society of Jesuits is not the only one which has ceased to be the society of Jesus. As a judgment upon such apostasy, the world will be left to the devices of Satan, and will strive to prop up its weakness by the strength of one man. It will find a man of supernatural force of mind, and will say to him, "Let this RUIN be under thine hand!" He will accept the charge, support the world upon his shoulders, and be borne down at last, world and all, in indiscriminate ruin. Then will God come forward with his man: and a new Personel Era will begin.

"These are hard times for the poor. Meat, vegetables, bread, everything of the kind, is dear. Meat has risen to such a price that poor people cannot buy it. The butchers deplore this as much as their customers. They cannot sell out their stock, and beef and mutton rot in their shops for want of customers."

Minutes of the Convention met at Providence, R. I., July 25th, 1860, in pursuance of a call published in the Crisis, which was as follows:—

CIRCULAR.

As a number of brethren have expressed the desire for a more efficient system of action, whereby the cause of truth may be advanced, and especially those great principles with which we as a people are more particularly identified; therefore,

Resolved, That we will, and hereby do, call a Convention of brethren, to be holden at Providence, R. I., commencing Wednesday, July 25th, to take into consideration the wants of the cause, and to adopt some measures which shall serve as a more successful plan in carrying on this work.

J. S. WHITE,	M. GRANT.

Wednesday, 10 o'clock, A. M. Bro. Berick called the meeting to order, and it was opened with singing and prayer, led by Bro. Edwin Burnham. A statement of the objects of the meeting was then read, as follows:

In order that the object and business of this Conference may be opened, we will state as follows:

The call for this meeting was issued and published after consultation and correspondence, in which, though nothing of detailed plan was agreed upon or suggested, yet it was felt that more of efficient and systematic co-operation was needed to further the interests to which we profess to be devoted.

Upon further expression of opinion, we are ready to say, that we think there is among us a lack of system in several particulars; a lack which brings some inconveniences, and exposes us to some hazards.

Ere we name any particular, we are happy to disclaim, at the outset, any desire for change in respect to individuals who occupy various places of labor and duty among us. We feel the utmost confidence in the integrity of all those who have for years past stood prominent as advocates of the forms [illegible] relieve some of burdens which they wish no longer to bear, or direct and sustain others in the duties they now perform. We wish, in general, that the responsibilities of each one should be better understood, and that each one may gain the strength and support which may result from such understanding.

Passing to details, we think there may be system.

1. In the issue of various publications—particularly in the publication of books and tracts. We need not dwell on the advantages of a Tract Society. We will only name the increased facilities for printing and circulation, for collection of contributions, and the benefits of a selection of such works as may be generally approved among us. We ought also to remark that our Tract Society has been in fact created within a few years or a few months past by one of our number, who ardently desires, for his health's sake, to be free from its duties and its cares.

2. In the interest of our weekly paper, the same principles may in fact apply. The risks and responsibilities of its proprietors, and commonly unenviable duties of its editor, should be clearly understood. The differences of opinion, which are inseparable from all free thought and discussion, should be duly represented or adjusted, so that the general interest may suffer by the dislikes of no class.

3. Our annual campmeeting, which has become an institution, requires that the individuals who have so faithfully and laboriously served it should be supported by some systematic action. The collected funds may fail to defray their expenses. In the selection of those who shall preach, and in other arrangements, they have important and delicate duties, in which they may be sustained, if not directed, by some mode of representation by the friends at large.

4. In the recognition and ordination of preachers, we think there may be more system, which shall promote the good repute and general interests of our churches. Without infringing on the most perfect liberty of prophesying which the christian may claim, or on the congregational right of the local church, we would suggest that something may be done in this regard.

5. In conclusion, we think that advice might be given, if not measures taken, respecting the organization of local churches, the labors of itinerants or evangelists, and the collection of funds for various interests; and that by due measures the co-operation and efficient action of many friends of christian truth may be enlisted or promoted.

Remarks were then made on the general subject of organization, by Brn. Hastings, Burnham, W. S. Campbell, Couch, Ludington, P. White, Jr., and J. D. Brown. Adjourned until 2 o'clock.

2 o'clock, P. M. Opened with singing and prayer, led by Bro. Couch. Present, E. Burnham, J. Couch, M. Grant, S. P. Babcock, C. W. Baker, H. V. Davis, F. H. Berick, Phineas White, Jr., W. S. Campbell, L. S. Ludington, Hiram Munger, G. T. Adams, Jos. D. Brown, B. P. Manning, C. F. Hudson, Walter Pratt, M. R. Phetteplace, J. Caird, J. T. Sweet, H. L. Hastings, J. C. Humes, and others. On motion, Bro. W. Pratt was called to the chair, and C. F. Hudson appointed clerk. The statement of the objects of the meeting was again read. Voted that the chairman appoint a business committee, consisting of five. Pending the appointment, remarks were continued on the subject of organization and denominationalism, by Brn. Hastings, Berick, Campbell, Burnham, Hemenway, Manning, Davis, Munger, Grant, and Adams.

The chair appointed as a business committee, Brn. Couch, Hastings, Hudson, Campbell, and Berick. Adjourned until 8 1-2 o'clock, to-morrow.

Thursday, 8 1-2 o'clock, A. M. Opened with singing and prayer, led by Bro. Hemenway. The committee reported a Constitution, remarking that their Preamble would be brought in soon. Their report was accepted, and the adoption of the first article was moved. After some discussion, the Preamble was reported and accepted. The discussion of the name to be given to the Society was continued, some preferring the title, "The Advent Christian Association," and nearly all the members participating in the discussion. After a free and full interchange of opinions, the question was put, and the article as reported was adopted. Under a motion to reconsider, Bro. Ludington moved that the Society be called "The Bible Christian Association." After debate, the amendment was lost. Bro. Manning then moved an addition to the proposed title, stating the object of the Association. This amendment was regarded as a repetition of matter contained in the Preamble, and was lost. The article was then again adopted. Adjourned until 2 o'clock.

2 o'clock, P. M. Opened with prayer, led by Bro. Berick. The remaining articles of the Constitution were then taken up and with some amendments were adopted. The Preamble was also amended and adopted. Whereupon the entire Constitution was adopted, and is as follows: [illegible] righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ; and

Whereas, we have turned from idols to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus who delivered us from the wrath to come; thus by patient continuance in well doing seeking for glory, honor, and immortality, which is brought to light in the gospel; and

Whereas, we have hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers, and of the resurrection of the dead, when all which are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation;—and of an inheritance in the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world; and

Whereas, the night is far spent and the day is at hand; the Judge standeth before the door, and the kingdom of God is at hand; and

Whereas, the Savior has bidden his disciples to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, and has declared that this gospel of the kingdom shall be proclaimed in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come;

Therefore, we, recognizing the authority of the divine command, and our obligation to save our generation by the aid of God, do associate ourselves for this purpose under the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

This Society shall be known by the name of The Christian Association.

ARTICLE II.

The objects of this Society shall be the promulgation of Bible truth and the promotion of vital piety, by the following modes, viz:

1. By the formation of a Christian Publication Society, for the issue of books, tracts, and periodicals.
2. By the organization of churches, and other means of preaching the gospel.
3. By the recognition and support of an efficient gospel ministry.

ARTICLE III.

The officers of this Society will be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and nine Directors; who shall together constitute a Board of Managers.

ARTICLE IV.

The members of this Society shall consist of all Pastors and Evangelists co-operating with the Society, and of Delegates from churches* also co-operating. Each church shall be allowed one delegate, and one additional delegate for every fifty members above the number of twenty-five members.

ARTICLE V.

The duties of the Officers shall be the same as are usually performed by such officers. And the Board of Managers shall, by means of Committees whom they shall appoint, or otherwise, provide for the discharge of the duties indicated in the second article of this constitution. A majority of the Board, at any meeting duly notified, and two-thirds present at any time without notice, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The Board shall also fill vacancies occurring, until the next annual meeting of the Society. The Board shall make annual reports of all funds received and disbursed, of business transacted, and of the condition of various interests of the Society. The Board shall be chosen by ballot, at the annual meeting of the Society.

ARTICLE VI.

The annual meeting of the Society shall be held at such time and place as shall be declared by adjournment of the Society, or appointed by the Board. Special meetings shall be called by the Society, by public notice given at least three weeks previously, at the request of ten members, either preachers or delegates from the separate churches.

ARTICLE VII.

This Constitution may be amended by a majority at any regular meeting, when two months' notice of the proposed amendment has been given; or, without such notice, by two-thirds of the members present at any annual meeting.

After the adoption of the Constitution, Brn. Berick and Grant were appointed a Committee to nominate officers. Pending their report, it was voted, That the Board of Managers be instructed to call a meeting of the Association, between this time and the tenth of November next, at such place as they think best, and that to be considered as the first annual meeting. The committee reported. Their report was accepted, and the following list of officers duly chosen:

H. L. HASTINGS, President.
D. T. TAYLOR, Vice President.
C. F. HUDSON, Secretary.
GEO. T. ADAMS, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:—M. Grant, W. S. Campbell, S. G. Mathewson, J. Couch, J. Hemenway, J. Howell, H. V. Davis, W. Pratt, A. Ross.

On motion, the thanks of the members of the Conference were tendered to the friends in Providence for their hospitalities and kindness during its meeting.

Adjourned sine die.

W. PRATT, Chairman.

C. F. HUDSON, Clerk.

* A Church is defined in the words of Wesley:—"A society of believers in Jesus Christ."

[illegible] The average expense per annum to the members of the different denominations throughout the United States, for the support [illegible]

Correspondence.

From Bro. W. A. Fenn.

BRO. GRANT:—I take the liberty to address you a few lines, concerning the state of things in this place, with regard to truth. I came to this place the second Sunday in April last, by request of some Methodist brethren. Found that some tracts, distributed by Sister A. S., had broken the walls of prejudice, so that the truth was heard with interest. There are several Methodist brethren who have received it, with a Congregational deacon and his wife. It has caused quite a stir in the church to which he belongs. The Congregational preacher has fired into us several times, and set up the cry of Sadduceeism, Infidels, Annihilationists, Epicureans, etc., which only makes the truth shine the brighter in the minds of those who have heard it.

Sandisfield, Mass.

From Bro. S. S. Brewer.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—After an absence of three months, we reached our home on the evening of the 10th of July. But oh, how lonely is home. All my loved ones are absent; the cheery warblings no longer break on father's and mother's ears, thrilling our hearts with the joyful song. No—all is silent. Oh, what an alternate state is this.

During our absence various indeed have been the mingled scenes through which we have passed. I have tried to preach the word in new places, and with what success, a coming day will manifest.

The little flock in Fairhaven, Mass., I found striving to bear up under a crushing weight of pecuniary embarrassment. We tried to comfort them with the Messianic balm—the coming of the Lord draweth specially nigh. The last prayer meeting at the house of Bro. Pease, on the evening of June 21st, will long be remembered by me. The Spirit did brood over us, and streaming mercy did fall in copious showers. We had a glorious Jerusalem shower. May grace, mercy, and peace, rest on that little church. We have spent two happy, peaceful years with them. Peace be with thee, dearly beloved. The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. Amen.

I found a growing disposition in some communities to hear on the doctrine that has distinguished us as a people. As concerning the hirelings, in some places, they did, and are doing, all in their power to fulfill the saying of Jesus, as recorded by Luke, 11: 52: "Verily, they shall receive their reward."

On our way home, we spent a few days visiting old friends in Providence, R. I., and endeavored to preach to them on Lord's day, June 24th, at Market Hall; and felt blest in the preaching of the word. On Wednesday, June 27th, visited the R. I. Conference, and remained until the 30th. Truly it was refreshing to meet some of my old companions, with whom we battled for the truth in days gone by. Truly this was one of those soft, mellow, subduing seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord that I have not been permitted to enjoy for years. The truth is simply this: it was free from fanaticism; and while there was perfect order, there was no stiff, cold formality. The last night at Bro. Peckham's was indeed a season of gracious mercy, when God manifestly answered prayer and applied the balm to an afflicted sister; instantly removing the pain of body, causing her to leap for joy and shout aloud the praises of the great physician.

From Centreville, we journeyed to Scituate, and, by request, we tried to preach twice on the 4th of July, in the grove, to warn sinners of approaching doom, and cheer the waiting ones in view of the approaching emancipation of the Abrahamic family, when the Son of man shall sit on THE THRONE OF HIS GLORY. A goodly number were collected, and listened with marked attention.

In many places effectual doors were opened, although there were many adversaries. The most painful of all my trials, during my last tour, was what I experienced from a so-called Advent society. This was most unexpected; yet I do not wonder at it, for we are all only frail mortals.

Well, dear lovers of Jesus, the season for Campmeetings has almost arrived, and it will, in my opinion, be in all probability among the last we shall ever enjoy. It may be the last. Let us all come from our homes, in the expectation of being a blessing to each other. Keep your family altars smoking with holy incense. Let God witness your holy fervor, and hear your importunate invocations in the secret place. Get blest at home, and bring the heavenly heart-burn with you. Do not come expecting to get happy because others are. None are ever happy, possessing a constant, sweet, abiding sense of their acceptance with God; walking in the sunny light of his reconciled countenance; but such as obey him, denying themselves, taking up their cross daily, to follow Jesus.

The Lord is a sun and a shield; he will give grace and glory, and withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly. Do [illegible] hold! he cometh. By faith we hear the rumbling of his chariot wheels. It cannot, in the condition of things, be long ere the object of our love will be fully revealed to our anxious, longing, and admiring eyes.

The harvest seems to be almost ripe. Religionists reject the plain truth, scoffers ridicule, formalists curl their lip in supercilious contempt, infidels defy, spiritualists fester in pools of moral putrefaction; apostates, Pharaoh-like, harden their hearts; formalists hug their filthy rags of self-righteousness; backsliders glory in their shame, and hirelings fatten for the day of slaughter. On, on it rushes with irresistible impetuosity; and soon the last tear will fall, the last successful prayer be offered, the last warning uttered, the last soul saved, and the Judge of quick and dead appear. Oh, Lord, have mercy upon us. Amen.

I remain, as ever, a pilgrim.

S. S. Brewer.

From Eld. J. Blain.

Bro. Grant:—As brethren love to hear from traveling ministers, and learn about the spread of our blessed truths, I will take time to give a brief account of my labors since I came from the east last Oct.

I left home in Jan. for Ind., where I had been requested to come, and had the promise of having expenses paid, although six hundred and fifty miles distant. While there, I preached forty-one times in eight weeks, in eight places, mostly new fields;—sold seventy dollars' worth of books, which shows that an interest was felt in our views. I then spent a month in Chicago, on a visit to my children—preached twice in a Universalist house, which was cheerfully granted, free of charge; and sold a number of works in the city. There is no Advent meeting held there, but several substantial brethren are spreading light, and "labor not in vain."

In April, I left Chicago for C. W., in parts where our views have not been known till of late, and where I had been requested to visit. In five weeks, in five localities, I preached twenty-five times, and sold thirty dollars' worth of our works—all I had with me. I returned to "sweet home" in May, having been absent four months.

In June and July, by request, I spent three weeks more in C. W., in the same places where I had been—sold forty-five dollars' worth of books, and preached fifteen times—also visited and sold works in Toronto.

I can give but a few particulars of these towns west, but must record the goodness of my Master in some of his kind dealings with me. One is, in granting me health to preach oftener and with more feeling than ever before—averaging five times a week for four months. Another item is, in giving me the joy of seeing more solemnity and real seriousness among the unconverted than in any of my travels for eight years. I account for this by the fact that I labored more directly for their conversion than heretofore; applying our truths to their condition, and urging them to seek eternal life in God's appointed way. As in the west, our hearers are mainly non-professors. In some cases, I took Paul's course when he appealed from the Jews to the Gentiles, and they gladly received the truth—(see Acts 13: 46–8,) and witnessed a like effect. They attended every meeting, bought many books, did a part of my support, and urged my return.

Brethren, we should not forget the sinner and backslider, while we endeavor to comfort the saints. I shall hope to meet some of those western "sick" in the soon-coming kingdom.

The increased call for books and tracts is another cause of encouragement and thankfulness. Though times are hard in the West, and in C. W., (and I preached in only fifteen places, mostly new ones, and but few brethren,) yet I sold at least $140 worth of works, besides many given to the poor, and those waked up enough to read, but not to buy. Though I traveled over seventeen hundred miles, my expenses were paid, and a few dollars over; which is one proof in such times that truth is prized. The Lord water the seed sown, and send more laborers where numerous calls for help are heard, in the great West. Most of two small Baptist churches, and their pastor, Eld. James Sim, in C. W., have embraced the life and death doctrine, and soon coming of Christ. They are about seventy-five miles west of Toronto, in the Co. of Waterloo. I went still further west towards Goodrich, in a new region.

The Lord willing, I shall start for the East again this week, and spend a few months there. Shall attend all the campmeetings with a supply of my works, and an assortment of our generally approved publications.

Brethren wishing for books, or to send pay for those sold, can write me at Buffalo, and their letters will be attended to and answered.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN

By the arrival of the steamship Jura, we have London news to July 10th.

Napoleon is said to have authorized the formation of a Rifle Association, under the command of Jules Gerard.

Paris, July 11. Commanders of the French war vessels at Syria have been ordered to protect the French Consul, but to abstain from all intervention.

Palermo, July 3d. Garibaldi had reviewed 9000 volunteers. The Inspector of Police had been murdered at Palermo.

Nearly all the Neapolitan exiles at Turin were returning to Naples.

The papal army had reached 19,000.

Two French and two English war vessels have been ordered to Beirout.

A dispatch from Rome says the Irish volunteers are leaving for Spoleto, where 10,000 will be concentrated before the fortress.

Accounts from Rome say that the Pope not only is disposed to grant a liberal Constitution, but is further inclined to adhere to the suggestion of Napoleon to constitute a Federal Empire, as the best solution of the Italian question.

It is rumored that Garibaldi had determined to besiege Messina.

The Paris Patrie states that the siege of Messina is decided upon, but that the great heat, so terrible in Sicily during July and August, will render operations extremely difficult.

THE MASSACRES IN SYRIA.

Beirut, June 23. Affairs in this province are looking blacker and blacker. Yesterday we had the fearful news of the village of Dheis-el-Kamar being sacked, burnt, and every Christian male, to the number of 2000 and more, being put to the sword by the Druses, who a fortnight before had disarmed them in cold blood. The women and children were allowed to escape, and reached the mouth of the Damoor river half way between this and Sidon, yesterday, whence they were brought up last night and this morning, to the number of 1100, by H. B. M. steamers Gannet and Mohawk. Of the men of Dheis-el-Kamar, not more than thirty have escaped. The town is all burnt.

From the correspondence of the Traveller we take the following in regard to the slaughter now going on in this unhappy country:

Beirut, June 23. The state of this poor country beggars description. The large towns of Zaleh and Deir el Kamr have been put to the sword, and thousands of dead bodies lie exposed to the jackals and hyenas which infest that part of the mountain.

The news is heartrending. Men that we knew have perished in this awful butchery. Widows and orphans are creeping slowly towards Beirut for safety. But alas! they will find no safety here. Moslems are in arms, and Christians are trembling in their houses, fearing a general massacre.

Even while I am writing I am surrounded by multitudes of men, women and children, crying for protection. The house of a Frank is considered as an asylum, and the house of every American is filled with the despairing unfortunates. Beirut is now filled with Turkish troops, just landed from a Turkish man-of-war, but what confidence can be placed in them when their conduct indicates hostility to all Christians.

Such an intense excitement prevails at this moment as to prevent me from finishing this letter. Christians have closed their shops and have retired to their houses, where they tremblingly await the issue. Moslems are rushing about the town, crying, "this is the time to kill the Christians!" and their women and and children are rushing along the streets shouting, "may God cut off the Christians!" It is impossible for us to buy provisions, and our servants are rendered useless from fear. Christians have been beaten, and some of them most severely.

The want of harmony and concord among the naval commanders and the Consuls may result in a most serious evil. There is a want of unanimity as to the propriety of landing troops for the protection of British and other foreign subjects. The Pasha was requested to invite the co-operation of the European Admirals now in Beirut, which he refused to do, saying he saw no necessity for foreign interference. The Consuls do not believe that the Turks are acting in good faith.

Yesterday the American Consul called a meeting of Americans, warned them of their danger, offered his house as an asylum to all, and proposed that upon the first alarm all Americans should go at once to the American printing establishment as the best place for mutual protection as it is a castle in itself and affords ample facilities for resisting an attack or standing a siege. Provisions have been placed there, and there is now at least an American organization. This step has already inspired confidence.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

Turin, July 7. The Hungarian, Colonel Turr, the companion of Garibaldi in the expedition to Sicily, and who contributed to the victories of Calatafimi and Palermo, arrived here last night by the last train from Genoa.

A letter from Messina, dated the 2d, says: "A large number of crimes are committed daily with impunity; none of the authorities possess the courage to have the assassins or the robbers arrested. God only knows what will be the end, if Garibaldi does not come soon. Several invitations have been sent to him to come. On Saturday night 2000 men were sent into the hills to watch the approach of the enemy; about 30 of the soldiers deserted and were fired on, one only being killed. During the last week 250 deserted. The garrison of Messina is at present about 18,000 men strong.

A French Armorer has sent to Garibaldi a gift of a coat of mail, dagger proof and bullet proof. Its workmanship is perfect, and it is valued at upwards of five thousand francs. It may be worn under the uniform like a shirt, for it is extremely flexible, light, and portable.

Marshal Castellane has become, by the death of Prince Jerome, the senior Marshal of France by age. Marshal Vaillant, who was promoted to that rank in 1851, has, however, held the position longer than any other Marshal.

Garibaldi, according to a correspondent of L'Eco d'Italia, writing from Milan, June 27th, contemplates a feat which will throw all his previous exploits in the shade. This is no more than a sudden invasion of the States of the Church by sea, and a march upon Rome. It is thought that, in such an event, the Pope will have to seek refuge in Austria.

General Avezzana has addressed the following letter to the opera singers who assisted at the Garibaldi benefit at the Academy of Music, on the 11th:

"Signore and Signori:—in these days of trial, when our country solemnly appeals to her generous children to aid General Garibaldi in his heroic undertaking of national emancipation, you have not delayed in making a noble response. Moved by the deepest love for your country, you have fulfilled a sacred duty to it, in uniting all your forces to aid the efforts of our Marion; and in the great pleasure which I experience in forwarding to him the sum of $1334, 19, the fruit of your labors, I offer you, in the name of our country, the most cordial thanks.

For the Committee, Gen. Guiseppe Avezzana, President.

A Paris letter thus states the conditions on which the King of Sardinia will give his good will to the King of Naples:

"They require that the Neapolitan people shall signify [illegible] in a manner not to be mistaken, their readiness to accept the liberal concessions made by the King, their perfect confidence in his sincerity in offering and his resolution to maintain them, and their willingness to try once more how far a Neapolitan Bourbon can respect his solemn oath; that the King of Naples shall in reality, and not in form, detach himself from Austria as completely as if Austria had disappeared politically from Europe; and above all, that no attempt shall be made to recover the possession of Sicily by force of arms, for doubtless M. Cavour regards Sicily as already gone."

A Palermo letter of the 24th ult., says the plan ordered by Garibaldi, of melting down the church bells to make cannon, continues in active operation. Every one of the churches is to supply at least one bell, and those edifices in Palermo are very numerous.

FOUR DAYS LATER.—THE MASSACRE.

The English Government have received intelligence of a fearful massacre of the Christians at Damascus by the Druses. Five hundred Christians have been butchered, among whom was the Dutch Consul. The American Consul was wounded.

Naples, July 14. Patrols are constantly traversing the streets. The moderate party are full of apprehensions. A former Inspector of Police was stabbed on the 12th inst., in the strada deteldo.

A proclamation of Garibaldi against the Bourbon dynasty has been distributed in Naples. He says, "I am a royalist, (?) but prefer Victor Emmanuel, who will head us against Austria."

Naples, July 17. A conflict has occurred between the troops and the people, in consequence of popular manifestations in favor of the refugees who disembarked at Naples, and several were killed.

A correspondent of the London Morning Star says:—"A great deal of secret communication is at this moment being carried on between Garibaldi and the King of Sardinia. The bondage in which the latter is held is supposed to occasion the necessity of secrecy between the two. The Marquis Trossi, at one and the same time one of Victor Emmanuel's ordnance officers and Garibaldi's aide-de-camp, has sole charge of these secret messages, and passes his whole time in journeying from Turin to Palermo and back again."

Necessities of the Pope. Archbishop Hughes of New York delivered a sermon on the Italian question as it affects the States of the Church. In urging his hearers to join in the work of forwarding material aid and sympathy to the Pope, he said:

"An American Prelate, lately returned from Rome, intimates that this aid cannot reach the Holy Father too soon. He has to sustain, as yet, the expenses of the Papal Government, whilst the resources, to a great extent, have been cut off. It has even been intimated that if things go on as they are now for any prolonged period, the Pope will not have the means to supply the wants of his own household."

☞ Archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, and the Bishops of Wheeling, Richmond, Erie, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Charlestown, Florida and Savannah have issued a pastoral letter expressing their "devoted attachment to the See of the Apostle Peter, and to the illustrious Pontiff who now occupies it, denouncing as sacrilege the attempt to deprive the Pope of his temporal dominions."

GENERAL CAMPMEETING at Wilbraham, Mass.

Providence permitting, a general campmeeting will commence at Wilbraham, on the old ground upon the hill, Monday, Aug 20th, and continue one week.

This meeting is pleasantly located in a neighborhood noted for sustaining good order, and for acts of kindness towards those who assemble there from year to year to worship the God of our fathers. We anticipate a large gathering of the Lord's dear children, and that much good will be accomplished. Those who were present last year will remember that the great object of the meeting was for the salvation of sinners, and the comfort of saints, and that the effort was greatly blessed. We hope that our brethren and sisters will come again this year, strong in the Lord, and bring their unconverted children and neighbors for the purpose of persuading them to be christians.

All who believe in Christ as our Savior, and are willing to labor for the salvation of sinners, are invited to take part in the meetings. We would earnestly request all to make this meeting a subject of special prayer, that many wanderers may be reclaimed, the saints greatly strengthened, and the name of the Lord magnified among the people.

Ample accommodations will be provided for board and horse keeping. Board at 50 cents per day; or one shilling per meal for breakfast and supper, and 25 cents for dinner. The fare is reduced to half price on the Western R. R., which will be $2.50 from Boston, for both ways.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co. by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have free return passes by application to Geo. T. Adams, 167 Hanover street, Boston, Mass., when they purchase their Western tickets for the camp ground. Those coming from Albany will pay full fare to the camp ground, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee. Those coming from North Adams, Pittsfield, and intermediate places, also from Worcester and intermediate stations, will call for campmeeting tickets at the ticket offices.

Those coming on the Connecticut River R. R. from South Vernon, Vt., and intermediate stations, will pay full fare, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee.

N. B. All who wish to take the cars from Boston for the campmeeting, should remember that they can obtain their tickets only of Geo. T. Adams, 167 Hanover Street.

Full particulars of arrangements with other R. R. Companies will be given in due season.

Campmeeting.

The Westford campmeeting is to commence on Tuesday, Aug. 28th, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a very pleasant location, near the depot, about eight miles from Lowell, on the Stony Brook Railroad. We think that tickets from Boston and back will be half price, as last year,—one dollar. This meeting will not interfere with the meeting at Wilbraham, being one week after. Those who can, and choose so to do, may attend both. We hope that all who can will make it duty as well as a privilege to be at this meeting. We doubt not the arrangement and management of the meeting on the part of the committee will be perfectly satisfactory, as they were last year. The meeting will be conducted on free christian principles. Come then, one and all, with the heart full of the love of Jesus and his word, with a mind to be good, do good, and get good, and so enjoy that liberality with which those are blessed who enjoy the freedom of the gospel.

J. S. White.

Notice.

The campmeeting committee, appointed at East Kingston, July 4th, to arrange for the meeting in August or September, are requested to meet at the chapel in East Kingston, Monday, July 30th, at 2 o'clock, P. M.

R. W. Currier, F. Gale, O. Haley, C. Stevens, L. Brown, C. P. Whitten, E. Rowell, S. J. Eaton, J. Powell, Committee.

J. H. Colby, Clerk.

The chairman of the committee of the Westford campmeeting has proposed to the committee of the East Kingston campmeeting a union of the two. The matter will be considered, and notice will be given accordingly.

Quarterly Conference.

The next session of the Western Central Quarterly Conference in Maine will commence Thursday, Aug. 23d, at 1 o'clock, P. M., in Rome Town House, and continue over the Sabbath. Will all the ministers, and as many others as can, come to the work, and come in the work, praying for God's blessing upon the people. We want to see sinners converted, and God's word to run among the christians. Call on Brn. David Watson, Fletcher, Blaisdell, Martin, etc.

H. B. Savey, Chairman.
I. C. Wellcome, Secretary.

Richmond, Me., July 25th, 1860.

Savoy Campmeeting.

This meeting will commence Aug. 27th, and continue one week. The object of this meeting is to persuade men to accept of the gospel, and be saved in the kingdom of God. Then come, brethren and sisters, one and all, in the spirit of labor and love, and let us have a feast of fat things on the mountain top. Efficient laborers in the gospel will be present to preach the word of life. The committee wish to say, that no pains will be spared in trying to supply the wants of the brethren and public generally; and are confident from last year's experience that we can meet them more acceptably. Board and horse keeping will be furnished on reasonable terms.

E. M'Culloch, Rufus Starks, J. E. Healy, } Committee.

Campmeeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a campmeeting in Levant, Me., commencing Sept. 17th and continue one week. Bro. Howell is requested to make arrangements to attend, and others are invited to come as the Lord may direct. Particulars hereafter.

The cause of truth demands that the church should make an effort to give new impetus to the cause, by a general gathering of the brethren and sisters to comfort and strengthen one another with the words of truth. We expect this meeting will result in good to the church and exert a salutary influence upon community. The people want to hear the reasons of our hope. Let all come that can. Begin now to plan your business so that you can come. Begin to pray about it, talk about it, and get your tents ready for the camp. Above all, do not forget that you will need on the armor, so that you may be ready for the work as soon as you get on the field of battle. Brethren, make your business bend to this meeting. Get your Lamb, and come up to sacrifice to the Lord. If you have not a lamb, take a kid, or a pair of doves, only let your heart be in the work and God will bless you.

J. Hemenway, for the brethren.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping. We shall expect those preachers present that feel sent. Further particulars hereafter.

D. Cornwell, M. Gibson, L. Mills, } Committee.

Grove Meeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a grove meeting on land owned by Newman Briggs, by the side of Peach Pond, in the town of North Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y., about four miles southeast of Brewster's Station, on the Harlem R. R. The meeting will commence August 9th, and continue over the Lord's day. We expect to have a tent to sleep in, and we want the brethren and sisters to bring beds, blankets, etc. If any have tents, bring them. We invite all to come and labor with us to the glory of God. We want the preaching brethren to follow the Lord and come in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. Brethren and sisters, pray for this meeting, that God's signal blessing may attend our efforts. There will be ample preparations made to accommodate all who desire to come to the meeting. There will be conveyance from the depot to the ground at noon.

George L. Teeple.

Quarterly Meeting.

The first Quarterly meeting of the General Association of the Church of God, in Western N. Y., will be held at East Springwater, commencing Friday evening, August 24th, and continue over the following Sunday. We have a beautiful grove which will be fitted for the meeting on Sunday.

A general invitation to ministers and laymen is hereby given. We hope to have a general gathering of the lovers of Bible truth from the surrounding country at this meeting.

B. M. Morris, A. L. Hunt, Elijah Wetmore, } Committee of Arrangements.

T. G. Newman, Secretary.

Conference.

There will be a quarterly conference at the Boyington school-house, in Jefferson, Me., three miles east of Turner's Hill, commencing Thursday, Aug. 9th, and continuing over the Sabbath. We invite the brethren and sisters to come. We want the preaching brethren to come and labor with us.

S. K. Partridge.

☞ Bro. York and myself have arranged to be at the conference, as appointed.

I. C. Wellcome.

Grove Meeting.

If the Lord permit, there will be a grove meeting in Morris, Ct., commencing Thursday, Aug. 16th, and continuing over the following Sunday. Eld. H. Pratt is expected to attend, with such preachers and laborers as the Lord may send. We shall have one or more tents, and accommodations, as far as practicable, for brethren from abroad. Come brethren, come one, come all, and let us have a heavenly sitting together, whilst the burden of our prayers may be for the edification and upbuilding of the church in the most holy faith, and for the enlightening of the people and the salvation of sinners.

We hope for a general gathering from the surrounding vicinity, and for a profitable meeting. Let each as can, bring blankets and provisions, prepared for a safe dwelling and sleeping in the woods.

The meeting will be in the vicinity of the Lake, near Footville, ten miles west of Plymouth Hollow depot, and six miles from Litchfield Centre.

T. S. Canfield, In behalf of the brethren.

☞ Providence permitting, there will be a grove meeting at Plymouth Hollow, Ct., Sunday, Aug. [illegible] Evenings of 12th, 14th and 15th, where Bro. Canfield may appoint. [illegible]

Notice.

A grove meeting will be held in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Edinboro, Erie Co., Pa., August 25th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Oogley, Evangelist.

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Collins, Lowell; E. Heath, Lynn; S. Ayers, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon, otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

Unity.

"[illegible] be one."

[illegible], whose deep abyss
Nor man's nor angel's heart hath known,
What [illegible] scheme of thine is this,
That mortals should with thee be one?

O, love divine, whose mighty flood
Rolls on throughout eternal time,
Shall we be made the sons of God,
In name and nature both divine?

Yes, one in thee, and with thee one,
Partakers of thy life and love,
We who thy saving grace have known,
Shall thine eternal goodness prove.

O, Lord of love, we seek thy side,
To thee our hearts and souls we give;
Ever may we in thee abide,
And by thy life forever live.

Then we with all the saints shall know
The love that none can comprehend,
Its heights above, its depths below,
Its breadth, its length that ne'er shall end.

Drinking from that unfailing fount,
Our souls shall grace on grace receive,
Upward on eagles' wings shall mount,
And in undying glory live. H. L. H.

Did Christ Create all Things?

This question, as connected with the doctrine of the Trinity, or the pre-existence of Christ, is an important one, and is susceptible, I think, of a scriptural answer. If Christ did really exist as a living being before he was born of the virgin Mary; and if by him all things were created, as is alleged, does it not clearly follow that he is God? For Moses says, "God created the heavens and the earth." But here is the difficulty: if God the Father created all things, Christ the Son did not; for the Son is not the Father, and all the logic or sophistry in the world cannot make it so, it being unscriptural, and absurd in itself.

If Christ is the creator, then how can he be "the HEIR of all things?" How can a creator inherit that which he creates? But "the Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands." "All things are delivered unto me of my Father," says Jesus. Then is it not clear that Christ is the HEIR and not the creator of the world?

But again: CHRIST suffered and died according to the Scriptures: query, did God suffer and DIE? If not, then Christ is not God. And if Christ is not God, then Christ did not create all things.

But is not Christ called God? Yes. Isaiah says of him, "And his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Mark the language: the prophet does not say he is the mighty God, but only his NAME shall be CALLED thus. And when he is thus called, it must be in a qualified sense, or the Scriptures cannot be harmonised.

But what shall be done with Col. 1: 16? Simply give it a correct translation, so as to be in harmony with other parts of the Bible. Thus: "For (en) in him [i. e. with respect to, or in reference to him] were all things created that are in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible ..... all things were created (dia) through [or on account of] him and FOR him." I only change en by, and dia by, to in and through. Dia is rendered through one hundred times in the N. T.; because and because of more than fifty times; and for forty times. It is also rendered by reason of, etc. Thus showing that from the common usage of the translators, the change is admissible. So that with one simple change of the preposition is swept away what is considered the most positive and most reliable proof in the Bible that Christ, the Son of God, created all things.

But suppose that Christ is spoken of in the Bible as though he were in being before he was "MADE of a woman," or "before Abraham was." Does it therefore follow that he really existed as a distinct being from the Father? When it is remembered that God "calleth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4: 17), is it not more than probable that he only existed in the infinite mind or bosom of the Father as "a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," and as being inseparably connected with the plan of salvation, and not as a distinct living person? It is true that Christ "came down from heaven"—came forth from the Father, being conceived by the Holy Ghost; but this does not prove his pre-existence; it only proves his ORIGIN. Thus I am forced to believe, from all the knowledge I can obtain, that Christ is not only the Son of God, but that he was not a Son till he was begotten of the Father and born into the world. This being true, CHRIST did not create all things.

A Desideratum.—No. 3.

BY P. B. M.

In saying all need a better knowledge of ecclesiastical matters, it may not be out of place to point out, if possible, more definitely the character of some of these wants. In doing this we may mention, first, some most obvious and commonplace wants of our churches. To say that Christ died, the just for the unjust, is saying a great truth; but not all the truth a church needs to know and practice. There are, besides, what is usually demanded in our spiritual apprehensions, a great want of practical, common-sense, business-like tact. There are many healthy churches, vitalized with a sufficient spiritual energy, but, for want of this element, make a poor effort in getting on in the world; frequently becoming as though they had not been, so far as their organized identity is concerned. All of which might not only have been avoided, but they have lived to their own comfort and spiritual growth, and to the community to which God had appointed them as light-bearers.

Every christian needs these spiritual aids, which he cannot well enjoy severed from all christian association. But a popular error has so pervaded and permeated the church, that unless a certain measure of popularity can be instantly enjoyed, all effort for a nominal and visible standing is discouraged. It should be remembered that it is not mere quantum of human flesh we need for Christ. Nor should we be discouraged with small beginnings; we must not despise the day of small things. Nor should we fail to know that however much of prejudice may be excited in a community by a fair and candid, though earnest proclamation of the truth, it can, and, by a persevering effort, will be lived down. It is inherent in the genius of Christianity to demand respect of all thoughtful persons with whom it comes in contact. But to make its practical influence bear on community, it must maintain, independent of all without, a united, healthy, and compact, living economy. But, as the little foxes spoil the vine, so a little permanent want of business tact will insure the final nominal death of the church.

Now, then, to illustrate this matter briefly: Let a church neglect to come into order; how long before it is evident "what is every-body's business, is nobody's?"—How long before the acts of the church are without record? How long before it is apparent there is no moral responsibility to be attached to the congregation at large? How long before it will be seen that just a few bear all the burdens? Who cares for the meeting-house, (if they have one?) Who builds fires, finds fuel, lights, and cares for the orphans and the needy? Who is it that not only knows the laborer is worthy of his hire, but is forward to return into the hands of the laborer that which is due? But this thing can never be properly done by anything less than all the church intelligently doing what they can.

For want of this we lack houses of worship that we might have. We lack a good understanding of the order of God's house, the ordinances of God's house, and a becoming missionary enterprise.

War.

This seems to be the leading idea of the nations of earth. Look where we please, the war-clouds are lowering. Wish for peace as men may, WAR will show its grim visage. Dream of converting the world, as some deluded people do; it never will be done. Nothing can be done contrary to the plans of Jehovah; so mortals may as well acknowledge Him their king: but they wont do so. It seems as if nothing transpiring tends to make men look at the prophecy of these things. No matter what happens, they say it is all natural; such things have occurred, and will continue to. When such preparations as the following—among many—fail to make men reflect on what is coming, it is hard to tell what will.

THE FRENCH STEEL PLATED FRIGATE.—The completion of the steel-plated frigate Normandie, is being carried on with all possible dispatch. The plating is twelve centimetres thick, and is impervious to cannon shot unless the ball should strike the same place thirteen times; and on the thirteenth shot it will be perforated. The Normandie is about to receive her masts, which are colossal. Fore and aft appear grim-looking inplements of wholesale death, in the shape of curved scythes, which, rendered movable in every direction by steam, can cut the toughest vessel in two before time has been given for a round of shot to be fired.

AUSTRIAN PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.—Letters from Venice announce that the Austrian Government is making vast preparations for war. The quantity of ammunition which arrives daily is enormous. There are 70,000 men established in an entrenched camp at Peschiera, and 40,000 are in position on the frontier of the Romagnas.

Then add to these preparations, that of other nations, and imagine the improvements in various methods of putting warlike plans into execution; and how long will it [illegible] something will occur that will astonish the world? What will sleepy mortals think when all these warlike machines are[illegible] in operation? There are machines driven by steam that will throw stones hundreds of pounds in weight a long distance. Bomb shells, also, can be hurled by the same method. What will men think when they see a stone as large as a barrel flying towards them, crushing everything before it? What will they think, when they fire cannon-balls against a vessel, to have those same balls recoil back again to them with nearly the same velocity, instead of doing any injury to the enemy? What will they think, when, in their ships, they are preparing to bombard our cities, to have a sub-marine explosion beneath, hurling them high in mid air, dashing everything to atoms? What will they think, when encamped on the field of battle in fancied security, to behold a monster balloon above them showering down destructive missiles? These things will astonish some, and others will say "it is all natural."

When all the battles of earth are finished—when the echoes of the last cannon die away among the distant hills, and the glare of flashing musketry disappears in midnight gloom—when the last groan of the dying warrior passes away forever, and the shriek of the bereaved ones are hushed to eternal silence—when the prowling hyena and loathsome vulture have finished their last work on the field of death—when every scene of woe has vanished perpetually,—

I am glad there will be a never-ending day of PEACE—a never-ending day, when the nations shall learn war no more. May we be citizens of that land whose King will rule in righteousness.

Bible vs. Poetry.

The object of this article is simply to notice briefly a few stanzas contained in some of the popular hymns of Orthodoxy; and the writer trusts the reader will be able to see the wide difference when said stanzas are compared with the Bible.

"A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky."

Please note the contrast between this and the closing stanza:

"Help me to watch and pray,
And on thyself rely,
Assured, if I my trust betray,
I shall forever die."

How a never dying soul can forever die, I confess, is more than I am able to tell; but the Bible says, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

"I'll praise my Maker while I've breath,
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers."

Now I cannot imagine how "praise shall employ" the "nobler powers," when a person's "voice is lost in death," and I find myself under the necessity of appealing again to the Bible, which says, "The dead praise not the Lord."—Ps. 115: 17.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space,
Look forward to that heavenly place,
The saints' secure abode."

Conscientiously, I cannot look "beyond the bounds of "space" for "the saints' secure abode," because (1) it is too romantic; and (2) my Savior said, "The meek shall inherit the earth."—Matt. 5: 5.

"Why do we mourn for dying friends,
Or shake at death's alarms?
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends
To call them to his arms."

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."—1. Cor. 15: 26. Will Jesus destroy his own voice?

"Contend for nothing but the fruit
That feeds th' immortal mind."

Is there an "immortal mind" in man? "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Ps. 146: 4. Can he have an immortal mind" without thoughts?

"Then, in a nobler, sweeter song,
I'll sing thy power to save,
*When this poor lisping, stammering tongue
Lies silent* in the grave."

What! sing without a tongue? If a person be dead, and his tongue be silent in the grave, will he there think about praising God? The Bible says, "The dead know NOT ANYTHING."—Eccl. 9: 5.

Is it right to sing a hymn that contradicts the Bible? GEO. W. GREEN.

The Holy Spirit.

We need more of it. The head of the church is willing. His promise of the Spirit is just as good for us as for the primitive church. Evidently the churches need the Spirit as much as in the beginning; christian fellowship is just as necessary—just as precious—just as profitable—just as influential,—and as indispensable as after Pentecost.

But how shall we get it? By asking, by seeking, by knocking. In the use of such simple means? Yes. If that is so, where have the churches been? I can't stop to answer that question, but feel more like praying in faith, and pleading the blood of the covenant for an immediate baptism of the Spirit.

Sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, help! How shall we have the Spirit's cry, "Come, Lord Jesus?"—Rev. 22.—How shall we join in the saying, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him."—Isa. 25: 9. How shall we be quickened at the resurrection, (Rom. 8: 11,) without it? How? S. CURRY.

Second Thoughts.

1. If we believed in infant damnation, we would never more exhort others to become like them, that they might inherit the kingdom of God. We would forever teach that the evangelist was mistaken when he referred us to Jeremiah, who declared, "They shall come again from the land of the enemy, and possess their own border."

2. We would never more occupy the throne of grace with humble petitions, if we did not believe that our heavenly Father would hear and answer prayer.

3. We do not believe it is degrees in faith, but the right kind, that constitutes us fit subjects for the one baptism; after which, we are to grow in the knowledge of the truth.

4. We would never ask for the Holy Spirit, if we did not believe that God was more willing to give it to them that ask him, than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children.

5. We would never obey the commandment of the Apostle to resist the devil, that he might flee from us, if we did not believe there was one.

Selections.

Preach Christ.

A young man had been preaching in the presence of a venerable divine, and after he had done, he went to the old minister, and said, "What do you think of my sermon?" "A very poor sermon indeed," said he. "A poor sermon!" said the young man: "it took me a long time to study it." "Aye, no doubt of it." "Why, did you not think my explanation of the text a very good one?" "O yes," said the old preacher, "very good indeed." "Well then, why do you say it is a poor sermon? Didn't you think the metaphors were appropriate, and the arguments conclusive?" "Yes, they were very good, as far as that goes; but still it was a very poor sermon." "Will you tell me why you think it a poor sermon?" "Because," said he, "there was no Christ in it." "Well," said the young man, "Christ was not in the text: we are not to be preaching Christ always; we must preach what is in the text." So the old man said, "Don't you know, young man, that, from every town, and every village, and every little hamlet in England, wherever it may be, there is a road to London?" "Yes," said the young man. "Ah!" said the old divine, "and so from every text in Scripture, there is a road to the metropolis of the Scriptures,—that is, Christ. And, my dear brother, your business is, when you get a text, to say, 'Now, what is the road to Christ?' and then preach a sermon, running along the road towards the great metropolis—Christ. And," said he, "I have never yet found a text that has not a road to Christ in it, and if I ever do find one that has not a road to Christ in it, I will make one; I will go over hedge and ditch but I would get at my Master; for the sermon cannot do any good unless there is a savor of Christ in it."

Warm up the Prayer Meetings.

A writer in Zion's Advocate says:—I have seen many cold places in my day. More than once I have traveled in the northern portions of our country and the Canadas, amidst wintry storms which almost took my breath away. I have suffered from the piercing winds upon the summit of Mount Washington, and been chilled by the cold night air upon the heights of the Alleghanies. I have lain down to rest wrapped only in my shawl upon the glaciers of Switzerland, and been fanned by the breezes from the eternal snows of Mont Blanc. I have visited other regions where life in a short time would be endangered by exposure. But I have been in one place where I suffered more from the cold than in all these. That place was a formal, lifeless meeting, for prayer. There I have been chilled—yea, frozen through and through, until my vitality seemed almost gone, and all my heart as icy as a Greenland winter—Oh, it was terrible; and it took me a long time to recover my wonted warmth and vigor. And I wrote in my note book, "Let me die anywhere and anyhow, rather than be frozen to death in a prayer meeting."

Uncertain what to Do.

Some one touched the writer as he was leaving a prayer-meeting. He turned as he saw the face of a well-known christian brother; and close at hand stood a young lady, dressed in deep mourning, with whom he had been conversing—standing there, a child of sorrow. The big tears were slowly rolling down her cheek, and then she would wipe them away, as if she had been half-unconscious of their falling.

Here is a lady, said the gentleman, to whom I wish you to say a few words. She says she is "uncertain what to do." I soon saw that she was in spiritual trouble.

"Why are you uncertain what to do?" we inquired.

"I do not understand the next step to be taken," said she.

"Where are you now?" we asked.

"I have been coming daily to these meetings for four weeks, and all that time I have felt anxious about my soul, but all I do does not seem to make my case any better."

"And what do you try to do?"

"I have striven to convince myself that I am a sinner—as I know I am. But though I know it, as a truth, I do not feel about it as I should."

"How would you feel about it, if you could?"

"I would have deep conviction."

"What is your present impression about yourself?"

"That I am a great sinner—that is all."

"And what would you have more?"

"That is what I do not understand. My next step should be far deeper conviction. But what farther can I do?"

"Your mistake is a very common one. Your next step, and only step, is to go to Christ just as you are. Go to him at once. You can do nothing. Hitherto you have been relying upon yourself. Renounce all this as a dishonor done to Christ, as a Savior, and go to him for all the help you need hope for, or desire."

"Is that all?"

"That is all. You must repent now and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Go to Him, who says to you, 'Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.' All you have to do is, with true penitence, to believe in his mercy."

"O," said she, as if a new light had dawned upon her mind, "is that my next step?"

"Not your next step, as if you had already taken one or more right steps in religion. Going to Christ is your first step and only step. He does not say, come to conviction—come to a deeper sense of sin. But he says, 'Come unto me.'"

"O! what a self-righteous creature I am. I see it all now. I have been refusing Christ, while all this time I thought I was preparing to come to Him." She said this, evidently disappointed in herself.

"Will you go to Jesus now?" was hastily asked.

She looked up with a smile, and great resolution depicted in her intelligent face, as she answered, "I WILL.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

The Eternal God.

[We print by request the following translated poem, which some of our readers may have seen before. The original is the production of Derzhavin, a Russian poet of some note. It is said to have been translated into Japanese, by order of the Emperor, and hung up, embroidered in gold, in the temple of Jeddo. It has been translated also into the Chinese and Tartar languages, written on a piece of rich silk, and suspended in the imperial palace of Pekin.—Ed. Independent.]

O thou Eternal One, whose presence bright
All space doth occupy—all motion guide;
Unchanged through Time's all-devastating flight,
Thou only God! there is no God beside.
Being above all beings! Mighty One!
Whom none can comprehend, and none explore!
Who fill'st existence with Thyself alone;
Embracing all—supporting—ruling o'er—
Being whom we call God—and know no more!

In its sublime research, philosophy
May measure out the ocean deep—may count
The sands, or the sun's rays—but, God! for thee
There is no weight nor measure, none can mount
Up to thy mysteries; reason's brightest spark,
Though kindled by thy light, in vain would try
To trace thy counsels, infinite and dark;
And thought is lost, ere thought can soar so high,
Even like past moments in eternity.

Thou from primeval nothingness didst call
First chaos, then existence—Lord, on thee
Eternity had its foundation; all
Sprang forth from thee; of light, joy, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty, thine.
Thy word created all and doth create,
Thy splendor fills all space with rays divine;
Thou art, and wert, and shalt be glorious! great,
Life-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!

Thy chains the unmeasured universe surround;
Upheld by thee, by thee inspired with breath.
Thou the beginning with the end hath bound,
And beautifully mingled life and death
As sparks mount upward from the fiery blaze,
So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from thee,
And as the spangles in the sunny rays
Shine round the silver snow, the pageantry
Of heaven's bright army glitters in thy praise.

A million torches, lighted by thy hand,
Wander unwearied through the abyss,
They own thy power, accomplish thy command,
All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss.
What shall we call them? Piles of crystal light?
Lamps of celestial ether, burning bright?
Suns, lighting systems with their joyous beams?
A glorious company of golden streams?
But thou to these art as the noon to night.

Yes, as a drop of water in the sea,
All this magnificence in thee is lost—
What are ten thousand worlds compared to thee?
And what am I then? Heaven's unnumbered host,
Though multiplied by myriads, and array'd
In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the balance weighed
Against thy greatness—is a cipher brought
Against infinity! What am I then?—Nought.

Nought—but the effluence of thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reached my bosom too—
Yes! in my spirit doth thy spirit shine
As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew:
Nought! but I live, and on hope's pinion fly
Eager toward thy presence; for in thee
I live, and breathe, and dwell; aspiring high,
Even to the throne of thy divinity.

Doing Good.

Dr. Johnson was rather a rough and unpolished diamond, but, nevertheless, he uttered many sententious and wise maxims, and among others the following: "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do anything." A keen observer of human nature, and capable of comprehensive views of the motives of human actions, although too often blinded in his judgments of men by his predilections or prejudices, he threw out many suggestive sayings, calculated to incite us to activity for good. How many verify the truth of the remark above quoted, waiting for an opportunity of doing a great deal of good at once, and thereby losing the privilege of doing a little good every day.

How much better it is to improve our daily opportunities for usefulness, and thus, in the aggregate, accomplish a large amount of beneficial labor, than to wait with the delusive hope of doing some great thing at once, and thus, before we realise it, find that life has slipped away, and nothing done at all for good.

Let, then, the dreamers of doing something wonderful at once wake up, and go to work to-day. Go and visit the poor, the sick and the dying. Dry up some widow's tears; cause some lone orphan to bless you for your kindness; lead the feet of some outcast into the path of rectitude; let a gleam of sunshine into some darkened heart; pick up a ragged boy in the street, and carry him to the Sabbath School; persuade the poor inebriate to take the pledge; distribute choice tracts; do something to-day. There are ways enough to be useful, if you have the disposition to do good, and to make the world better for your having lived in it. But if you are waiting to do some great thing, you are cherishing an illusion, and you will die without accomplishing anything.—Watchman and Reflector.

Fate of the Apostles.

Matthew is supposed to have suffered martyrdom or was slain with the sword in a city of Ethiopia.

Mark was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, in Egypt, until he expired.

Luke was hanged on an olive tree in Greece.

John was put into a chaldron of boiling oil at Rome and escaped death. He afterwards died a natural death at Ephesus in Asia.

James the Great was beheaded at Jerusalem.

James the Less was thrown from a pinnacle or wing of the temple, and then beaten to death with a fullers club.

Philip was hanged up against a pillar, at Hieropolis, a city of Phrygia.

Bartholemew was flayed alive by the commands of a barbarous king.

Andrew was bound to a cross whence he preached to the people till he expired.

Thomas was run through the body with a lance at Coromandel, in the East Indies.

Jude was shot to death with arrows.

Simon Zelotes was crucified in Persia.

Matthias was first stoned and then beheaded.

Hygiene.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Throat and Lungs.

In a practice of seventeen years, devoted exclusively to the treatment of throat and lung affections, we have arrived at the following conclusions, that:

First: Throat-ail, or Clergymen's sore throat, called chronic laryngitis, is, in four cases out of five, originated in the stomach, and that to attempt to remove it by any other means than such as are adapted to improving the digestion and waking up the activities of the liver, is the sorriest absurdity of the age.

Second: When consumption of the lungs is threatened, or is actually present, the first great and efficient remedial agent, worth incomparably more than all the drugs on earth, is the spending of every hour of daylight possible, in the open air, in some moderate, unfatiguing employment, and the eating of as much plain, nourishing, and relished food as the stomach will digest. Next to that, as being more universally accessible, is an India-rubber Life Preserver, and for reasons which no physiologist of even ordinary acquirements would for a moment dispute.

The health of a man's lungs in reference to consumption, depends upon their capacity to receive the air he breathes. Hence that capability is called "vital capacity," and is measured by the amount of air the lungs can throw out at a full expiration. This capacity varies according to age, sex, weight, and stature; all of these can be safely left out of view in ordinary cases, except the height. One man can blow up a bladder, can fill it at a breath; another in equal health of lungs would require two breaths, showing that the lungs of the former had twice as much air as those of the latter. The cubic method is that adopted for the measurement of the air in the lungs, or by the pint; and it can be as accurately done as if it were water, to the fraction of a gill or inch.

Forty cubic inches make a pint: a man of ordinary size, in good health of lungs, will expire at a single effort, six pints of air, or two hundred and forty cubic inches.

If a man five feet ten inches high could distend fully at a single breath, an India-rubber bag, bladder, or other receptacle, which held two hundred and forty cubic inches of air, it would be a physical demonstration, that all his lungs were within him, that they were in full operation, and as a matter of course, there could not possibly be, under the circumstances, any actual consumption, which would be corroborated beyond all cavil, if the pulse was uniformly under seventy beats in a minute.

A person never becomes consumptive until for many weeks, and for months, the lungs have worked imperfectly; thus working imperfectly, the system receives at each breath, less air than it requires; the blood is that much less purified; the body is that much less nourished; hence, as a man falls more and more decidedly into consumption, he has less breath, less blood, less flesh, less strength; this, all know.

But suppose a patient becomes acquainted with the fact that his lungs are declining in their capability of receiving air, losing their vital capacity, the evident indication would be to arrest that decline, and not rest satisfied until it was fully removed. And what more rational course than to practice on the lungs; to exercise them artificially; to accustom himself several times a day to blow upon his India-rubber; to try more and more on each occasion to fill it more fully at a single breath?

Some months ago a man came to us who could expire with the utmost effort only ninety-four inches; we set him down among the incurables, considered it a certain death; still he was urged to try. He promised he would. Ten days ago, March 17th, he presented himself again, having practiced these artificial breathings, and gave a measurement of a hundred and forty-four. Perseverance and an equal rate of increase for a few months longer, will certainly restore him. But this is only one of a multitude of similar cases.

The lesson of the article is:

If coming consumption is always attended with a diminution of vital capacity, of lung activity, of capability of full, free breathing, it must be averted by such practices as will arrest that decline first, and then reestablish the activities. But nobody will heed these momentous lessons, because their practice would cost no money, and they have not the charm of mystery, nor the prestige of brazen trumpets and shameless falsehoods; hence we are not afraid of our practice declining by communicating the information, for we have done it for years, yet our report is as practically unbelieved as that of the prophet of the olden times.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Take Time to Sleep.

Those who think the most, who do the brain-work, require most sleep. The time saved from sleep is always destructive to mind, body and estate. Give yourself, your children, your servants—give all that are under you the fullest amount of sleep they will take, by compelling them to go to bed at some regular hour, and to arise in the morning the moment they awake; and within a fortnight, nature, with almost the regularity of the rising sun, will unloose the bonds of sleep the moment enough repose has been secured for the wants of the system. When this habit has become established, persons will go to sleep almost instantly upon going to bed, and that nervous restlessness, which is so annoying to some people, will be entirely avoided.

Memory as affected by Disease.

A gentleman of Brooklyn, who was once waylaid by robbers, and almost killed, afterwards recovered his physical health, but his mind was much shattered. He seemed to have forgotten every thing he learned during his life, and began to learn his letters again, as if he were a child. The sounds of his voice, it is said, constituted his chief source of amusement.

Dr. Beattie relates the case of a gentleman, who, in consequence of a blow on the head, lost his knowledge of Greek, but did not appear to have lost any thing else.

Dr. Abercrombie also relates a case of a lady who, in consequence of protracted illness, lost the recollection of a period of about ten or twelve years, but spoke with perfect consistency of things as they stood before that time.

Some ten years ago, a young man residing in Northern New York, after having made considerable progress in Latin as well as in the English branches, received a kick from a horse, over the left eye, which rendered him senseless for some days. On recovering the use of his faculties, his memory was found so much impaired that he had forgotten all his knowledge of Latin.

In other cases, disease, particularly fever, causes a quickened mental action.

Flint, in his "Recollections of the Valley of the Mississippi," says that, during the derangement occasioned by a violent fever, his memory was more than ordinarily exact and retentive, and that he repeated whole passages in the different languages which he knew, with entire accuracy; this he was unable to do on recovering his health.

Sunlight in Houses.

The following fact has been established by careful observation. That where sunlight penetrates all the rooms of a dwelling, the inmates are less liable to sickness, than in a house where the apartments lose its health-invigorating influences. Basement rooms are the nurseries of indisposition. It is a gross mistake to compel human beings to reside partially under ground. There is a defective condition of the air in such rooms, connected with dampness, besides the decomposing paint on the walls, and the escape of noxious gases from pipes and drains. It is strange that builders persist in doing violence to humanity, by still erecting houses with basements.

To prevent Sun-strokes.

A few green leaves worn inside the crown of the hat, will secure a person against danger from sun-stroke. A friend who tried the experiment, found that his head became far less heated than usual.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$1.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	.50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	22.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters, write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to Eld. Miles Grant, Boston, [illegible]

The postage on the Crisis, if prepaid, quarterly or yearly, at the office where it is received, will be 13 cents a year to any part of Massachusetts, and 26 cents to any other part of the United States.

☞ Canada Subscribers have to pre-pay the postage on their papers, 26 cents a year, in addition to the above [illegible] $1 will pay for twenty-three numbers of [illegible] a year. The same to all the Provinces.

Evening Devotion.

Now evening comes down with its mantle of glory,
And spreads to our gaze the blue, star-spangled skies,
And our souls bending low, Mighty Father, before thee,
Are hushed by the beauty that breaks on our eyes.

The tumult of day with its care hath departed,
The sun in its chariot of gold hath gone down,
And peaceful and thankful we gather warm-hearted,
To taste of the quiet and gladness of home.

O! God of the evening, we seek thy protection,
Thy mercy to keep us while night gathers o'er,
Thy strength to uphold us and give us direction,
When day shall illumine our pathway once more.

And when in the mansions of glory unclouded,
Our sun shall no more into shadows descend,
O! grant that in beauty supernal enshrouded,
We ever may dwell with our Savior and Friend.

Resurrection.

Unless I am greatly mistaken, thousands of professing christians who pretend to believe in a resurrection from the dead, have but vague ideas with reference to the subject, and treat the matter as scarcely deserving their attention. The resurrection in the days of Christ and his apostles was the foundation of the christian's hope; all future life was based upon it. But in later days the people have taken council against the Lord and his Anointed; they have imagined a vain thing; they fancy that they are immortal, and at what they are pleased to call the death of the body, the divine or immortal part takes its flight to unknown regions, and then and there commences the life that is to come, either in happiness or misery. In the name of Jesus Christ, I wish to raise my voice against such plain contradictions of God's word.

And here I will make the assertion that all the principal errors in theology, during the last eighteen hundred years, can be directly or indirectly traced to the false assumption that man has in him an immortal soul that is destined to live while eternity endures. Dr. Adam Clarke says, why it is that the resurrection, the foundation of the teachings of Christ and his apostles, has come to be the most neglected of any doctrine in the Bible, he does not know; but so it is. His exact words may be found in his Notes on 15th chap. of 1 Cor. Now while I would not claim to know as much as Adam Clarke, perhaps I might be allowed to suggest that the change of opinion in relation to the nature of the resurrection, has caused the change of opinion in regard to the importance of that event. Christ and his apostles taught the resurrection of the man; modern theologians teach the resurrection of man's house. In a figurative and important sense the mind is the man; strictly speaking, the body is the man; the man can exist without the mind; the mind cannot exist without the body. To illustrate. Open your watch that is keeping time. You say there is motion. You hear the tick. Now separate those wheels—disorganize the thing. Where is the motion and the tick? Let us restore again those parts to their proper place. Are the motion and the tick re-united to the organization, or is there a complete restoration of the watch, material and immaterial?

But we will examine the Bible a little. Perhaps that will tell us what is raised up, and what it is to be raised up. I understand from the record, to be raised up, to have a resurrection, is, to live again; and to live again I understand implies life, followed by the death of the person or thing, and then a restoration of that person or thing to life. But to the record. John 6: 54; "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, to him is eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Now mark; whatever eats is raised up or lives again. Question. How do we eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ; literally, or by faith? By faith. Is faith the act of the body or the mind? Again. John 11: 25;—"He that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live." Then, again, that which believes is spoken of as being dead and living again. John 6: 44;—"No man can come unto me except the Father draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." Now what is drawn? The Savior says it is the man. There is no escaping the conclusion that what is drawn is raised up at the last day. How is he drawn; by physical force, or by motives? Do we place motives before that which cannot think? Once more. Rev. 1: 18; "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore." Question. What talks, the body or soul? If man is a compound being, will not some one tell us? It will not do to say the soul dictates, and the body gives utterance; that which dictates must be the I in the text.

And so I might continue to cite passages, almost without number, to show that man entire wakes into life at the resurrection. But I forbear, and will close this article by saying to those who base the resurrection upon the immortality of the soul, and contend that the soul must live to preserve the identity, that they cannot prove there will be any resurrection; for it can never be said of a soul that lives forever after it is created, that it lives again; and every argument that is good against the resurrection of the man, must be good against the resurrection of his body. I submit, then, that the Bible proves the resurrection of the entire man through Jesus Christ at the last day, or there is no future life.

"Let us Reason Together."

The power of thought is the noblest faculty with which our Creator has endowed us. It is the diary of the past, the treasury of the present, the telescope of the future. It is the forerunner of every action, the budding of every invention, the birthplace of every sentiment that was ever uttered. It is the superiority, the cultivation and application of this power, which chiefly gives to man his ascendency over the brute creation. It is undoubtedly the fact that animals possess reasoning powers, capable of some degree of culture; and all who are happy enough to own a pet in the shape of a dog or kitten, will agree in saying that the main-spring of many of their actions cannot be instinct. Yet, while we should not be so selfish as to arrogate to ourselves all the reason in the world because, as the highest order of animals, we have the largest share, it is well to preserve our dignity by the remembrance that man was created "a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor." It is well, too, to preserve our humility, by reflecting that while it is our privilege to rise above the common level of humanity, we may, by neglect or dissipation, smother the light of reason, and sink below the level of the beasts. Too many, alas, are so degraded from the dignity of manhood that they might very appropriately be styled twin brothers of a dog; and even then the truth would be startlingly apparent that the dog "was the flower of the family!" Intellectual power is the great birthright of humanity, bringing with it a corresponding responsibility. Yet in many, this great gift lies dormant instead of being used to the glory of the Giver. Forgetful that of those to whom much is given shall much be required; forgetful that the sands of time have nearly run out; forgetful of the "moth and rust" that corrupt our treasures here; forgetful of the higher joys of immortality; their thoughts and aspirations rise no higher than the next presidential election, or the next new fashion. Of such the Master is even now saying, "Take from him the one talent, and give it to him that hath ten."

The generality of people do little or no business in the thinking line. If this were true of Americans alone, we should incline to the opinion that they did not find it lucrative enough to satisfy their love of money; but as the post of a thinker is an almost unoccupied one in all nations, we are forced to conclude that people are too lazy to think. It is a serious fact that they are almost too indolent even to read the thoughts of others.

Some are constantly walking back and forth in the same old beaten track, with no more variety in their ideas than in the tunes of an organ-grinder; like misers, who, having gained a few lumps of gold, sit down and gaze at them forever, without exerting themselves to obtain any more. Then there are some who have never earned for themselves a single idea; whose thoughts are purely hereditary, being handed down from their fathers and grandfathers, for many generations back, as heir-looms in the family. They pride themselves on a long line of ancestry, instead of being self-made men. From the armorial bearings of their predecessors, they derive honor; and the family arms are always borne in ostentatious triumph before every sentiment that dares to enter their minds.

Ministers are hired to think for those whose own tools are rusting for want of use. Commentators are employed to clear up mysteries, and to make them. Theological Seminaries are resorted to by many for the purpose of learning creeds instead of "searching the Scriptures;" and it is to be feared that many of their creeds first saw the light under the protecting arches of the Romish Vatican, and were tenderly nourished by the fostering care of the Romish Pontiff. It is not at all wonderful that those who have been educated under the modern force-pump system of indoctrinating children, should suppose that for their faith in many unsustained positions they have "internal evidence;" for "as the twig is bent so is the tree inclined;" and as our reason is capable of being either perverted or enlightened, it may be so educated as to make even monstrous errors appear plausible.

The uneducated reason of twenty different persons will point them twenty different ways. This being the case, it is very necessary to have a standard to which we may conform our "internal evidences." We are not to blame for following the dictates of our reason; but, as the responsibility of its education rests on our shoulders, we are to blame if it teaches us to do wrong, for we should have given it a correct education from the infallible instruction book, with which God has furnished us. We are culpable if we neglect to measure our reason by this standard; otherwise, it is a safe guide for no one. We are responsible not only for all the light that we have, but for all the light that we might have. Thought is the fountain-head of action, if that is pure, so will the stream of our life be pure. And it rests with us, whether we make reason the bane or blessing of life.

A Few More Thoughts Considered.

BRO. GRANT,—I take the liberty of enlarging to some extent upon what has already been written on the subject of FEMALE Preaching. Hope none will think me presumptuous. A sense of the unpopularity of the affair, is what makes me so anxious for the right of the matter to be made apparent. It is looked upon as indecent, unscriptural, and unnatural, for a woman to preach. How the "little horn" pushes against it; how those who partake of the garments that characterize and particularize the Scarlet Beast, will open their mouths and stretch their eyes if a woman stands up for Jesus. Females may stand up on an elevated platform; crowd into our galleries; step up to "the head" of our well-trained choirs, and call "sinners to the gospel feast," sing forth "the matchless worth," and "sound the glories forth, which in our Savior shine." They may take the lead in all our public tea-meetings, sewing circles, etc., etc.; and it is thought an honor to them. They may sing Jesus, but as for talking out anything about him, it is an absurdity unpardonable. Queens may come forth heading multitudes, and enter the castles of grandeur, and lead a nation to the laws of man; but their sisters may not go in the solitary places of sin and turn perishing mortals heavenward to walk in the statutes of our Creator! Mock consistency!

Some affirm that the apostle's language, "Help those that labored in the gospel," etc., meant simply those women that performed the ordinary work that devolves on woman; such as making and mending Paul's garments. But it should be suggested that the apostles dressed so differently from ministers at the present day, that very little stitching and starching kept them fit for the public eye. It is vain to say Paul called those who fried pork, boiled potatoes, besides pouring and sweetening poison, his fellow laborers in the gospel. This work is common to all females; then why should it particularize two or three? If such work is laboring in the gospel, then as soon as a woman takes the responsibility of housewifery she becomes initiated in the sublime mysteries of the spiritual vineyard of the Lord! Tell us that woman has no right to meddle with the gospel; then turn right round and say it is gospel labor to wash a preacher's clothes. We must see clearly that this will not do. Paul meant something else.

Some say he meant those females that went to their neighbors, privately, and told them of Jesus. But it is something more. Every christian, male or female, is commanded to have a godly conversation; and what christian is there that has never said "Come to Jesus" to her acquaintances? This could not particularize Paul's assistants.

Hear me a moment. When a man feels it duty and can preach, you bid him "God speed." Let a woman have like ability and promptings, and you crowd her back, causing her to live far from peacefully with God, and to grieve the Holy Spirit. The command to preach is given to the church as a whole. You say it means for the men to preach; but the rest must hold their peace. When we read of Timothy helping Paul, you are proud to admit he preached Jesus. But when the same words are spoken of females, you start back and say it means very differently. Now this is only pride lurking in your heart. When Jesus comes, and when that last great prayer meeting is in session, it will be a last thought, the propriety of a woman calling upon the rocks and mountains. Then let them be on the same level now, and unitedly call upon God for salvation. All are one in Christ Jesus. In the world to come, there will be equality among the sexes; the female voice will sound as loud and sweet as man's. She will wear as bright a crown, and stand quite as near the throne. Cheering thought!

In an old Crisis I read a touching appeal from Sr. S. P. G., of Plymouth, Vt., for preachers to visit that place. She mourns sadly and pitifully because the land is covered with darkness, and that the inhabitants are perishing for want of a voice to say, "Come up hither." There are many such voices, echoing to each other, which I hear in the Crisis. One Sister is "alone," in a region where the news of the Kingdom has never been told. Now to such let me say, instead of folding up your hands and murmuring these complaints, go to work yourselves. You're alone, and cannot pay a preacher's fare,—go at it yourself. Tell them of Jesus, at least. Tell them your hopes, and thus awaken an interest and open a way for others. Mostly all of you that mourn your loneliness are capable of giving a reason for your good hope. Remember, the Lord will soon come; if you mourn much longer, your neighbors will never hear of the kingdom. Certainly you might gain one if you persevere.

Sisters, if you can, it is your right to call on sinners to prepare to meet God. It is your duty, if your lot is cast to make a calling. You may smile at this; but whenever you see a sister in the capacity of preacher, I know in your secret thoughts you envy her; i. e., if she is "able." I do not care so much for the preaching; but I do want folks to know that it is perfectly right, and that God would bless me if I felt it duty to preach, just as readily as if my name was James. M. MATHEWS.

For the Crisis.

The Political Christian.

The idea of a converted world has been heretofore supposed as having its realization in the successful preaching of the gospel. But it seems now, if we may judge from their actions, and words as well, that many of the more zealous advocates for the conversion of the world are hoping for its realization, at least to a considerable degree, through voting—virtually, through State legislation.

They would not be guilty of seeking a union of Church and State. Oh, no! they would become "a pillar of salt" first! But they do make voting a christian duty, and a test of our zeal for the spread of christianity. Yea, more. It is often said to me, and it but fairly embodies their arguments generally, that "he who will not vote cannot be a christian," on the ground that "Christian measures are involved," which will, in the event of success, become established and generally regarded as a law of society, on the principle recognized in all legislation, that "the majority should rule;" but, if they fail of success, it will be only for want of votes—and, so far as I am concerned, for want of mine. [Amen. Ed.]

Who can separate the church from the State in this scheme? The success of these measures, as they claim, would be a success of christianity; but a disobedience to them, when thus successful, would be a rebellion against the State, and punished as such. This success would encourage the introduction of other "orthodox measures;" and, thus cementing the union of church and state, this voting would give to them the realization of their ideal of the success of christianity,—"a nation of christians"—rather a nation of bigoted persecutors.

Who does not know that "christian politicians," nearly all of them, aspire to this very thing, and seek for its realization in the scheme here presented? Does not our "voting," then, tend directly to a union of church and state; and, in the event of the church party becoming strongest, to the inauguration of a system of persecution, under color of rebellion, against the state? The instigators of persecution, of every age, have availed themselves of this trick, to make it appear that the victims of their hatred are guilty of some misdemeanor against the state; as, "a breaker of the peace,"—"an exciter of the people,"—"a mover of sedition,"—a nuisance to society," —"a vagabond," etc., etc. Thus it was with Christ, Paul, Peter, with the early New England persecutions, with the Methodists in England, and it has been so in my native town against Adventists, where I have seen them arraigned and tried as "disturbers of the peace," finding no more plausible pretext for exciting the people against them. Others in other places have shared the same fate; and I have no doubt that were the legislative power in the hands of the church party, according to their aspirations, they would not be long in issuing their "bull" against this "Sadduceeism," as they term this Bible doctrine of "life only through Christ." May we not, then, by voting, be digging a pit for ourselves? Should we not inquire with Charles Beecher, "Are we not acting over again the days of Rome?"

But some will say, "We do not vote with the hope of any such success as a conversion of the world, nor do we fear a union of church and state, again; for we expect the coming of Christ soon. But we ought, while we stay here, to use our influence for good, wholesome laws for the regulation of society." Though you may not fear anything like a union of church and state, still you co-operate with others in a course which tends in that direction; and, if the Lord should suffer such a state of things to exist for a time, before he comes, in order that the now barren, worldly church may be "purified, made white, and tried," you are, by "voting," helping to inaugurate this system of persecution. The "perilous times" are to be marked by a resistance to "the truth" by "men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith," yet "having a form of godliness," in a manner similar to the fierce struggle between Moses and those Egyptian magicians; which is not the case thus far.

And as to your anxiety for good, wholesome laws for the regulation of society, God's law is a sufficient code for all christians; it is designed to thoroughly furnish the man of God unto all good works. 2 Tim. 3: 17. Having this one law to ourselves, we have no right to dictate another to our neighbor, for his government.

You will say, "the powers that be are ordered or ordained of God." True. "Since then God works by means of the ballot, if we would work together with God, we must use our influence in the inauguration and support of these powers, by voting." If there is any weight in such an argument, it would prove that, in order to be right, we must be on the side of the majority always; since God expresses his choice through the majority: otherwise, we should claim to be wiser than God. If he does order the powers that be, then the Presidents were his choice for that office. Were they yours, too? If not, what did your vote avail? How many such votes as that of yours would it take to defeat God's choice? Would you not do as well to vote for the wind to blow from the South, and give us rain during to-morrow afternoon? If your vote could avail anything, it would be to inaugurate a power ordered of man instead of God. But if the powers that be are ordered of God, it would not probably give him much uneasiness about the government of the world to-morrow, to learn to-night that you had died suddenly, without being able to communicate your plans for its future government.

But let us labor as we will to have our own way in these things, we shall have to learn, sooner or later, the lesson which God taught Nebuchadnezzar:—"That the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."–Dan. 4: 17.

Why should we alter God's choice, if we could? Does God need our assistance in making his choice, that we should vote for the basest of men? Or shall we vote for some other man, for the satisfaction of having God prove our wisdom foolishness?

But our vote, besides being practically unavailable, will place us in the position of being aiders and abettors of that wholesale murder—war—so far as we exert an influence by our vote; all governments being maintained by war.

Again, if the church were to join in and vote with the world, would she not be of the world really? How could she do it, and not love the world? Were we not voters before we believed? and why is it that we are so opposed to voting now? When did we lose our love for voting? Was it not, in every case, when we found a love for Christ and his coming? As for myself, I recollect that I was surprised at the change I had found wrought in my heart in this matter. I had held politics as the "apple of my eye," and was surprised, after two weeks' experience, to find that God had removed all this filth, without consulting me in the matter. I had not even thought of politics, in the time, but my love for it was entirely gone. I then consulted other brethren, to see what it meant, and found that God had wrought the same change in them, at conversion, and they regarded it still. I praised God for his mercy; and hope, through his grace, that I may not, like the sow that was washed, return to wallowing in the mire again.

And, lastly, I would urge that the symbols selected by divine wisdom as the most fitting to represent the governments of this world, are "beasts," or "wild beasts," and a "dragon." Shall we, then, join and help make up that throng which God has branded with the character of wild beasts and dragons? I. K. LOMBARD.

"Stray Thoughts Arrested."—No. 1.

BY T. W. S.

Why is it that some ministers, who profess to preach the truth, do not do so? Is it the truth, for a learned divine to publish, or have published, that he will preach on the "Destruction of the wicked," and instead, preach on the destruction of their future enjoyments? Is it honest, for him to take the text, 2 Thess. 1: 9, and say it means the destruction of the happiness of the wicked? It seems to me that it would be wise, that it would be proper and just and honest for every one, to believe what the Bible says, and not to spend much of the little time left for mortals this side of the kingdom of Christ, in trying to make it mean something. Men are getting so wise, orthodox theologians especially, that the plain teaching of Scripture is not sufficient for man's salvation: they must paint it up a little, adding an ornament here, covering an apparent blemish there, until the seeker after truth can scarcely recognize God's word amidst their speculation.

Again. We would ask this seemingly foolish question—has a man three souls? We heard, a few days ago, a minister of an evangelical denomination speak thus:—"And the rich fool in the gospel, (suppose he meant the rich fool 'spoken' of in the gospel,) who had been accumulating riches,—who said to his soul, 'soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years,' etc; but God said to his inmost soul, thou fool! this night shall thy soul be required of thee." Thus we see a trinity of souls in one man—yet we suppose all one soul; a kind of three in one, and one in three, like another trinity we hear of. We confess our inability to understand these things. We have taken the Bible as an expositor of the facts concerning man's nature, and present and future relations. We do not feel desirous of being "wise above what is written."

When we see such perversion of scripture as some are guilty of, and so many absurd doctrines taught, and such a general forsaking of the plain teachings of God's word; and when we observe the eagerness with which the mysterious and intricate theories of men are sought after, and the hesitation and oft-times suspicion in which Bible truth is received, we are compelled to think that we are in the last days. Truly, iniquity doth abound.

My friend, you stand off there on the other side of the fence, grumbling because others do not do every thing just up to your idea of perfection. This one talks too much, that one dresses too well, while the other one out yonder walks too straight. Bro. A. does not do exactly to suit you; and our minister acts contrary to your expectations. He is not always on the guard, not quite perfect, sometimes steps aside and sins. Well, do you not think he is sorry for it all? And if God overlooks it, can't you?

But now, my fault-finding friend, do you really think man, mortal as he is, can be perfect in this life? "Well, but if a person join the church, let him live up to his profession." So he does aim at it; if he did not, perhaps he might be twice as wicked as he is. "But why don't he do as he tells us to? If he can't, let him give up." Now, my friend, you just walk out and give us an example. Won't you be a specimen christian? Show us how much better you can do. Come, try it. What better are you, to stand and do nothing than those who are trying; but sometimes fail a little? Who is doing the most, [illegible]

Garibaldi.

Who is he? And what is there about him that creates such excitement? He is a wonderful man; all are obliged to admit the fact. He was born July 4th, 1807, and performed his first service in the Sardinian Marine. When twenty-seven years old, he conspired against tyrants, but failed, and fled to France, and afterwards served the Bey of Tunis, when he became Captain of a Frigate. Then he enlisted under the flag of Uraguay, South America, fitting out a vessel at his own expense. In 1842, at the age of thirty-five, he was captured by the Brazilians, and subjected to cruelty, till his escape the following year, and then took command of the Uraguayan navy, giving battle to a superior force; was defeated; but, rather than surrender, burnt his ships, retreating with officers and men. Then on land at the head of a few hundred he still fought the enemy. His wife also was captured by the Brazilians, but she escaped.

In 1844 he fought for Montevideo against Rozas; and for three days, in three vessels, gave battle to ten ships of war, and again was defeated, and burned his vessels rather than surrender. He landed with his men, fought his way into Montevideo, took command of the troops, and performed valorously. In 1848 he was at Genoa. He was placed by the government of Milan at the head of three thousand men, and went to assist Bergamo and Brescia, but was obliged to abandon the undertaking, and finally fled to Switzerland.

In 1850 he was elected to the Piedmontese Parliament, but it was soon dissolved. The Pope fled from Rome, and he was again called to the field, where he opposed the French bravely. He attacked the Neapolitans at Palestrina, beat five thousand of them with only three thousand. Soon after he put King Ferdinand II.'s troops to flight, and was severely wounded; he fell back to Rome, which was invaded by the French; he fled to the mountains, was hunted like a wild beast by the Austrians, but succeeded in reaching Genoa, and then embarked for America. While flying for his life among the mountains, his wife died in his arms from exhaustion, and he buried her in a grave dug by his own hands, in the mountain pass. He arrived at New York, July 30, 1850, found a temporary home with an old Roman soldier engaged in making candles, at Staten Island. He commanded a vessel bound for South America with adamantine candles, and next sailed to California on a commercial venture; and in 1852 went to China, in service of the Peruvian government.

In 1854 he returned to Genoa, commanded a small merchant craft; when the Italian war broke out, finding his [illegible] bread humbly, when he sprang to arms for the cause of Italian liberty. It seems that an overruling power has preserved him for the present crisis in his country's affairs. He took the field with ten hundred and seventy men including himself, and aided by an undisciplined force of Sicilians speedily captured Palermo, where, at last accounts, he was preparing to start an expedition against Messina, which was to leave June 28th. It is stated that the King of Naples has hired a band of brigands to murder him. Already Sicily is in his possession, in fact. His foes tremble at his future operations. The Jesuits are withdrawing, and great disorder prevails. The King of Naples must fall, and the Pope must flee to his spiritual kingdom, leaving his temporal to others. Garibaldi is evidently the rough executor of this work. He has been called the Washington of Italy.

The above sketch has been compiled from various sources, but probably is correct. That he is to act a prominent part in the affairs of Europe, is generally believed. Meanwhile, let us watch events as they occur, and govern ourselves accordingly.

CONTROLLING THE INCLINATION.—It is hard work to control the workings of inclination, and turn the bent of nature; but that it may be done, I know from experience. God has given us, in a measure, the power to make her own fate; and when our energies seem to demand a sustenance they cannot get—when our will strains after a path we may not follow—we need neither starve from inanition, nor stand still in despair; we have but to seek another nourishment for the mind, as strong as the forbidden food it longed to taste, and perhaps purer; and to hew out for the adventurous foot a road as direct and broad as the one Fortune has blocked up against us, if rougher than it.—Charlotte Bronte.

Unity.

"That they may be one."

O, love divine, whose deep abyss
 Nor man's nor angel's heart hath known,
What wondrous scheme of thine is this,
 That mortals should with thee be one?

O, love divine, whose mighty flood
 Rolls on throughout eternal time,
Shall we be made the sons of God,
 In name and nature both divine?

Yes, one in thee, and with thee one,
 Partakers of thy life and love,
We who thy saving grace have known,
 Shall thine eternal goodness prove.

O, Lord of love, we seek thy side,
 To thee our hearts and souls we give;
Ever may we in thee abide,
 And by thy life forever live.

Then we with all the saints shall know
 The love that none can comprehend,
Its heights above, its depths below,
 Its breadth, its length that ne'er shall end.

Drinking from that unfailing fount,
 Our souls shall grace on grace receive,
Upward on eagles' wings shall mount,
 And in undying glory live. N. L. N.

Did Christ Create all Things?

This question, as connected with the doctrine of the Trinity, or the pre-existence of Christ, is an important one, and is susceptible, I think, of a scriptural answer. If Christ did really exist as a living being before he was born of the virgin Mary; and if by him all things were created, as is alleged, does it not clearly follow that he is God? For Moses says, "God created the heavens and the earth." But here is the difficulty: if God the Father created all things, Christ the Son did not; for the Son is not the Father, and all the logic or sophistry in the world cannot make it so, it being unscriptural, and absurd in itself.

If Christ is the creator, then how can he be "the HEIR of all things?" How can a creator inherit that which he creates? But "the Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands." "All things are delivered unto me of my Father," says Jesus. Then is it not clear that Christ is the HEIR and not the creator of the world?

But again: CHRIST suffered and died according to the Scriptures: query, did God suffer and DIE? If not, then Christ is not God. And if Christ is not God, then Christ did not create all things.

But is not Christ called God? Yes. Isaiah says of him, "And his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Mark the language: the prophet does not say he is the mighty God, but only his NAME shall be CALLED thus. And when he is thus called, it must be in a qualified sense, or the Scriptures cannot be harmonized.

But what shall be done with Col. 1: 16? Simply give it a correct translation, so as to be in harmony with other parts of the Bible. Thus: "For (en) in him [i. e. with respect to, or in reference to him] were all things created that are in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible . . . . . all things were created (dia) through [or on account of] him and FOR him." I only change en by, and dia by, to in and through. Dia is rendered through one hundred times in the N. T.; because and because of more than fifty times; and for forty times. It is also rendered by reason of, etc. Thus showing that from the common usage of the translators, the change is admissible. So that with one simple change of the preposition is swept away what is considered the most positive and most reliable proof in the Bible that Christ, the Son of God, created all things.

But suppose that Christ is spoken of in the Bible as though he were in being before he was "MADE of a WOMAN," or "before Abraham was." Does it therefore follow that he really existed as a distinct being from the Father? When it is remembered that God "calleth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4: 17), is it not more than probable that he only existed in the infinite mind or bosom of the Father as, "a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," and as being inseparably connected with the plan of salvation, and not as a distinct living person? It is true that Christ "came down from heaven"—came forth from the Father, being conceived by the Holy Ghost; but this does not prove his pre-existence; it only proves his ORIGIN. Thus I am forced to believe, from all the knowledge I can obtain, that Christ is not only the Son of God, but that he was not a Son till he was begotten of the Father and born into the world. This being true, CHRIST did not create all things.

A Desideratum.—No. 3.

BY P. B. M.

In saying all need a better knowledge of ecclesiastical matters, it may not be out of place to point out, if possible, more definitely the character of some of these wants. In doing this we may mention, first, some most obvious and commonplace wants of our churches. To say that Christ died, the just for the unjust, is saying a great truth; but not all the truth a church needs to know and practice. There are, besides, what is usually demanded in our spiritual apprehensions, a great want of practical, common-sense, business-like tact. There are many healthy churches, vitalized with a sufficient spiritual energy, but, for want of this element, make a poor effort in getting on in the world; frequently becoming as though they had not been, so far as their organized identity is concerned. All of which might not only have been avoided, but they have lived to their own comfort and spiritual growth, and to the community to which God had appointed them as light-bearers.

Every christian needs these spiritual aids, which he cannot well enjoy severed from all christian association. But a popular error has so pervaded and permeated the church, that unless a certain measure of popularity can be instantly enjoyed, all effort for a nominal and visible standing is discouraged. It should be remembered that it is not mere quantum of human flesh we need for Christ. Nor should we be discouraged with small beginnings; we must not despise the day of small things. Nor should we fail to know that however much of prejudice may be excited in a community by a fair and candid, though earnest proclamation of the truth, it can, and, by a persevering effort, will be lived down. It is inherent in the genius of Christianity to demand respect of all thoughtful persons with whom it comes in contact. But to make its practical influence bear on community, it must maintain, independent of all without, a united, healthy, and compact, living economy. But, as the little foxes spoil the vine, so a little permanent want of business tact will insure the final nominal death of the church.

Now, then, to illustrate this matter briefly: Let a church neglect to come into order; how long before it is evident "what is every-body's business, is nobody's?"—How long before the acts of the church are without record? How long before it is apparent there is no moral responsibility to be attached to the congregation at large? How long before it will be seen that just a few bear all the burdens? Who cares for the meeting-house, (if they have one?) Who builds fires, finds fuel, lights, and cares for the orphans and the needy? Who is it that not only knows the laborer is worthy of his hire, but is forward to return into the hands of the laborer that which is due? But this thing can never be properly done by anything less than all the church intelligently doing what they can.

For want of this we lack houses of worship that we might have. We lack a good understanding of the order of God's house, the ordinances of God's house, and a becoming missionary enterprise.

War.

This seems to be the leading idea of the nations of earth. Look where we please, the war-clouds are lowering. Wish for peace as men may, WAR will show its grim visage. Dream of converting the world, as some deluded people do; it never will be done. Nothing can be done contrary to the plans of Jehovah; so mortals may as well acknowledge Him their king: but they wont do so. It seems as if nothing transpiring tends to make men look at the prophecy of these things. No matter what happens, they say it is all natural; such things have occurred, and will continue to. When such preparations as the following—among many—fail to make men reflect on what is coming, it is hard to tell what will.

THE FRENCH STEEL PLATED FRIGATE.—The completion of the steel-plated frigate Normandie, is being carried on with all possible dispatch. The plating is twelve centimetres thick, and is impervious to cannon shot unless the ball should strike the same place thirteen times; and on the thirteenth shot it will be perforated. The Normandie is about to receive her masts, which are colossal. Fore and aft appear grim-looking implements of wholesale death, in the shape of curved scythes, which, rendered movable in every direction by steam, can cut the toughest vessel in two before time has been given for a round of shot to be fired.

AUSTRIAN PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.—Letters from Venice announce that the Austrian Government is making vast preparations for war. The quantity of ammunition which arrives daily is enormous. There are 70,000 men established in an entrenched camp at Peschiera, and 40,000 are in position on the frontier of the Romagnas.

Then add to these preparations, that of other nations, and imagine the improvements in various methods of putting warlike plans into execution; and how long will it be before something will occur that will astonish the world? What will sleepy mortals think when all these warlike machines are in operation? [illegible] by the same method. What will men think when they see a stone as large as a barrel flying towards them, crushing everything before it? What will they think, when they fire cannon-balls against a vessel, to have those same balls recoil back again to them with nearly the same velocity, instead of doing any injury to the enemy? What will they think, when, in their ships, they are preparing to bombard our cities, to have a sub-marine explosion beneath, hurling them high in mid air, dashing everything to atoms? What will they think, when encamped on the field of battle in fancied security, to behold a monster balloon above them showering down destructive missiles? These things will astonish some, and others will say "it is all natural."

When all the battles of earth are finished—when the echoes of the last cannon die away among the distant hills, and the glare of flashing musketry disappears in midnight gloom—when the last groan of the dying warrior passes away forever, and the shriek of the bereaved ones are hushed to eternal silence—when the prowling hyena and loathsome vulture have finished their last work on the field of death—when every scene of woe has vanished perpetually,—

I am glad there will be a never-ending day of PEACE—a never-ending day, when the nations shall learn war no more. May we be citizens of that land whose King will rule in righteousness.

Bible vs. Poetry.

The object of this article is simply to notice briefly a few stanzas contained in some of the popular hymns of Orthodoxy; and the writer trusts the reader will be able to see the wide difference when said stanzas are compared with the Bible.

"A charge to keep I have,
 A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
 And fit it for the sky."

Please note the contrast between this and the closing stanza:

"Help me to watch and pray,
 And on thyself rely,
Assured, if I my trust betray,
 I shall forever die."

How a never dying soul can forever die, I confess, is more than I am able to tell; but the Bible says, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ezek. 18: 4.

"I'll praise my Maker while I've breath,
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers."

Now I cannot imagine how "praise shall employ" the "nobler powers," when a person's "voice is lost in death," and I find myself under the necessity of appealing again to the Bible, which says, "The dead praise not the Lord."—Ps. 115: 17.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space,
Look forward to that heavenly place,
The saints' secure abode."

Conscientiously, I cannot look "beyond the bounds of "space" for "the saints' secure abode," because (1) it is too romantic; and (2) my Savior said, "The meek shall inherit the earth."—Matt. 5: 5.

"Why do we mourn for dying friends,
 Or shake at death's alarms?
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends
 To call them to his arms."

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."—1. Cor. 15: 26. Will Jesus destroy his own voice?

"Contend for nothing but the fruit
That feeds th' immortal mind."

Is there an "immortal mind" in man? "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Ps. 146: 4. Can he have an immortal mind" without thoughts?

"Then, in a nobler, sweeter song,
 I'll sing thy power to save,
When this poor lisping, stammering tongue
 Lies silent in the grave."

What! sing without a tongue? If a person be dead, and his tongue be silent in the grave, will he there think about praising God? The Bible says, "The dead know NOT ANYTHING."—Eccl. 9: 5.

Is it right to sing a hymn that contradicts the Bible? GEO. W. GREEN.

The Holy Spirit.

We need more of it. The head of the church is willing. His promise of the Spirit is just as good for us as for the primitive church. Evidently the churches need the Spirit as much as in the beginning; christian fellowship is just as necessary—just as precious—just as profitable—just as influential,—and as indispensable as after Pentecost.

But how shall we get it? By asking, by seeking, by knocking. In the use of such simple means? Yes. If that is so, where have the churches been? I can't stop to answer that question, but feel more like praying in faith, and pleading the blood of the covenant for an immediate baptism of the Spirit.

Sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, help! How shall we have the Spirit's cry, "Come, Lord Jesus?"—Rev. 22.—How shall we join in the saying, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him."—Isa. 25: 9. How shall we be quickened at the resurrection (Rom. 8: 11) without it? [illegible] How?

Second Thoughts.

1. If we believed in infant damnation, we would never more exhort others to become like them, that they might inherit the kingdom of God. We would forever teach that the evangelist was mistaken when he referred us to Jeremiah, who declared, "They shall come again from the land of the enemy, and possess their own border."

2. We would never more occupy the throne of grace with humble petitions, if we did not believe that our heavenly Father would hear and answer prayer.

3. We do not believe it is degrees in faith, but the right kind, that constitutes us fit subjects for the one baptism; after which, we are to grow in the knowledge of the truth.

4. We would never ask for the Holy Spirit, if we did not believe that God was more willing to give it to them that ask him, than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children.

5. We would never obey the commandment of the Apostle to resist the devil, that he might flee from us, if we did not believe there was one.

Preach Christ.

A young man had been preaching in the presence of a venerable divine, and after he had done, he went to the old minister, and said, "What do you think of my sermon?" "A very poor sermon indeed," said he. "A poor sermon!" said the young man: "it took me a long time to study it." "Aye, no doubt of it." "Why, did you not think my explanation of the text a very good one?" "O yes," said the old preacher, "very good indeed." "Well then, why do you say it is a poor sermon? Didn't you think the metaphors were appropriate, and the arguments conclusive?" "Yes, they were very good, as far as that goes; but still it was a very poor sermon." "Will you tell me why you think it a poor sermon?" "Because," said he, "there was no Christ in it." "Well," said the young man, "Christ was not in the text: we are not to be preaching Christ always; we must preach what is in the text." So the old man said, "Don't you know, young man, that, from every town, and every village, and every little hamlet in England, wherever it may be, there is a road to London?" "Yes," said the young man. "Ah!" said the old divine, "and so from every text in Scripture, there is a road to the metropolis of the Scriptures,—that is, Christ. And, my dear brother, your business is, when you get a text, to say, 'Now, what is the road to Christ?' and then preach a sermon, running along the road towards the great metropolis—Christ. And," said he, "I have never yet found a text that has not a road to Christ in it; and if I ever do find one that has not a road to Christ in it, I will make one; I will go over hedge and ditch but I would get at my Master; for the sermon cannot do any good unless there is a savor of Christ it it."

Warm up the Prayer Meetings.

A writer in Zion's Advocate says:—I have seen many cold places in my day. More than once I have traveled in the northern portions of our country and the Canadas, amidst wintry storms which almost took my breath away. I have suffered from the piercing winds upon the summit of Mount Washington, and been chilled by the cold night air upon the heights of the Alleghanies. I have lain down to rest wrapped only in my shawl upon the glaciers of Switzerland, and been fanned by the breezes from the eternal snows of Mont Blanc. I have visited other regions where life in a short time would be endangered by exposure. But I have been in one place where I suffered more from the cold than in all these. That place was a formal, lifeless meeting, for prayer. There I have been chilled—yea, frozen through and through, until my vitality seemed almost gone, and all my heart as icy as a Greenland winter—Oh, it was terrible; and it took me a long time to recover my wonted warmth and vigor. And I wrote in my note book, "Let me die anywhere and anyhow, rather than be frozen to death in a prayer meeting."

Uncertain what to Do.

Some one touched the writer as he was leaving a prayer-meeting. He turned as he saw the face of a well-known christian brother; and close at hand stood a young lady, dressed in deep mourning, with whom he had been conversing—standing there, a child of sorrow. The big tears were slowly rolling down her cheek, and then she would wipe them away, as if she had been half-unconscious of their falling.

Here is a lady, said the gentleman, to whom I wish you to say a few words. She says she is "uncertain what to do." I soon saw that she was in spiritual trouble.

"Why are you uncertain what to do?" we inquired.

"I do not understand the next step to be taken," said she.

"Where are you now?" we asked.

"I have been coming daily to these meetings for four weeks, and all that time I have felt anxious about my soul, but all I do does not seem to make my case any better."

"And, what do you try to do?"

"I have striven to convince myself that I am a sinner—as I know I am. But though I know it, as a truth, I do not feel about it as I should."

"How would you feel about it, if you could?"

"I would have deep conviction."

"What is your present impression about yourself?"

"That I am a great sinner—that is all."

[illegible]

"Your mistake is a very common one. Your next step, and only step, is to go to Christ just as you are. Go to him at once. You can do nothing. Hitherto you have been relying upon yourself. Renounce all this as a dishonor done to Christ, as a Savior, and go to him for all the help you need hope for, or desire."

"Is that all?"

"That is all. You must repent now and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Go to Him, who says to you, 'Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.' All you have to do is, with true penitence, to believe in his mercy."

"O," said she, as if a new light had dawned upon her mind, "is that my next step?"

"Not your next step, as if you had already taken one or more right steps in religion. Going to Christ is your first step and only step. He does not say, come to conviction—come to a deeper sense of sin. But he says, 'Come unto me.'"

"O! what a self-righteous creature I am. I see it all now. I have been refusing Christ, while all this time I thought I was preparing to come to Him." She said this, evidently disappointed in herself.

"Will you go to Jesus now?" was hastily asked.

She looked up with a smile, and great resolution depicted in her intelligent face, as she answered, "I WILL.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

The Eternal God.

[We print by request the following translated poem, which some of our readers may have seen before. The original is the production of Derzhavin, a Russian poet of some note. It is said to have been translated into Japanese, by order of the Emperor, and hung up, embroidered in gold, in the temple of Jeddo. It has been translated also into the Chinese and Tartar languages, written on a piece of rich silk, and suspended in the imperial palace of Pekin.—Ed. Independent.]

O thou Eternal One, whose presence bright
 All space doth occupy—all motion guide;
Unchanged through Time's all-devastating flight,
 Thou only God! there is no God beside.
Being above all beings! Mighty One!
 Whom none can comprehend, and none explore!
Who fill'st existence with Thyself alone;
 Embracing all—supporting—ruling o'er—
Being whom we call God—and know no more!

In its sublime research, philosophy
 May measure out the ocean deep—may count
The sands, or the sun's rays—but, God! for thee
 There is no weight nor measure, none can mount
Up to thy mysteries; reason's brightest spark,
 Though kindled by thy light, in vain would try
To trace thy counsels, infinite and dark;
 And thought is lost, ere thought can soar so high,
Even like past moments in eternity.

Thou from primeval nothingness didst call
 First chaos, then existence—Lord, on thee
Eternity had its foundation; all
 Sprung forth from thee; of light, joy, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty, thine.
 Thy word created all and doth create,
Thy splendor fills all space with rays divine;
 Thou art, and wert, and shalt be glorious! great,
Life-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!

Thy chains the unmeasured universe surround,
 Upheld by thee, by thee inspired with breath.
Thou the beginning with the end hath bound,
 And beautifully mingled life and death.
As sparks mount upward from the fiery blaze,
 So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from thee,
And as the spangles in the sunny rays
 Shine round the silver snow, the pageantry
Of heaven's bright army glitters in thy praise.

A million torches, lighted by thy hand,
 Wander unwearied through the abyss,
They own thy power, accomplish thy command,
 All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss.
What shall we call them? Piles of crystal light?
 Lamps of celestial ether, burning bright?
Suns, lighting systems with their joyous beams?
 A glorious company of golden streams?
But thou to these art as the noon to night.

Yes, as a drop of water in the sea,
 All this magnificence in thee is lost—
What are ten thousand worlds compared to thee?
 And what am I then? Heaven's unnumbered host,
Though multiplied by myriads, and array'd
 In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the balance weighed
 Against thy greatness—is a cipher brought
Against infinity! What am I then?—Nought.

Nought—but the effluence of thy light divine,
 Pervading worlds, hath reached my bosom too—
Yes! in my spirit doth thy spirit shine
 As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew:
Nought! but I live, and on hope's pinion fly
 Eager toward thy presence; for in thee
I live, and breathe, and dwell; aspiring high,
 Even to the throne of thy divinity.

Doing Good.

Dr. Johnson was rather a rough and unpolished diamond, but, nevertheless, he uttered many sententious and wise maxims, and among others the following: "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do anything." A keen observer of human nature, and capable of comprehensive views of the motives of human actions, although too often blinded in his judgments of men by his predilections or prejudices, he threw out many suggestive sayings, calculated to incite us to activity for good. How many verify the truth of the remark above quoted, waiting for an opportunity of doing a great deal of good at once, and thereby losing the privilege of doing a little good every day.

How much better it is to improve our daily opportunities for usefulness, and thus, in the aggregate, accomplish a large amount of beneficial labor, than to wait with the delusive hope of doing some great thing at once, and thus, before we realize it, find that life has slipped away, and nothing done at all for good.

Let, then, the dreamers of doing something wonderful at once wake up, and go to work to-day. Go and visit the poor, the sick and the dying. Dry up some widow's tears; cause some lone orphan to bless you for your kindness; lead the feet of some outcast into the path of rectitude; let a gleam of sunshine into some darkened heart; pick up a ragged boy in the street, and carry him to the Sabbath School; persuade the poor inebriate to take the pledge; distribute choice tracts; do something to-day. There are ways enough to be useful, if you have the disposition to do good, and to make the world better for your having lived in it. But if you are waiting to do some great thing, you are cherishing an illusion, and you will die without accomplishing [illegible]

Fate of the Apostles.

Matthew is supposed to have suffered martyrdom or was slain with the sword in a city of Ethiopia.

Mark was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, in Egypt, until he expired.

Luke was hanged on an olive tree in Greece.

John was put into a chaldron of boiling oil at Rome and escaped death. He afterwards died a natural death at Ephesus in Asia.

James the Great was beheaded at Jerusalem.

James the Less was thrown from a pinnacle or wing of the temple, and then beaten to death with a fullers club.

Philip was hanged up against a pillar, at Hieropolis, a city of Phrygia.

Bartholemew was flayed alive by the commands of a barbarous king.

Andrew was bound to a cross whence he preached to the people till he expired.

Thomas was run through the body with a lance at Coromandel, in the East Indies.

Jude was shot to death with arrows.

Simon Zelotes was crucified in Persia.

Matthias was first stoned and then beheaded.

Hygiene.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Throat and Lungs.

In a practice of seventeen years, devoted exclusively to the treatment of throat and lung affections, we have arrived at the following conclusions, that:

First: Throat-ail, or Clergymen's sore throat, called chronic laryngitis, is, in four cases out of five, originated in the stomach, and that to attempt to remove it by any other means than such as are adapted to improving the digestion and waking up the activities of the liver, is the sorriest absurdity of the age.

Second: When consumption of the lungs is threatened, or is actually present, the first great and efficient remedial agent worth incomparably more than all the drugs on earth, is the spending of every hour of daylight possible, in the open air, in some moderate, unfatiguing employment, and the eating of as much plain, nourishing, and relished food as the stomach will digest. Next to that, as being more universally accessible, is an India-rubber Life Preserver, and for reasons which no physiologist of even ordinary acquirements would for a moment dispute.

The health of a man's lungs in reference to consumption, depends upon their capacity to receive the air he breathes. Hence that capability is called "vital capacity," and is measured by the amount of air the lungs can throw out at a full expiration. This capacity varies according to age, sex, weight, and stature; all of these can be safely left out of view in ordinary cases, except the height. One man can blow up a bladder, can fill it at a breath; another in equal health of lungs would require two breaths, showing that the lungs of the former had twice as much air as those of the latter. The cubic method is that adopted for the measurement of the air in the lungs, or by the pint; and it can be as accurately done as if it were water, to the fraction of a gill or inch.

Forty cubic inches make a pint: a man of ordinary size, in good health of lungs, will expire at a single effort, six pints of air, or two hundred and forty cubic inches.

If a man five feet ten inches high could distend fully at a single breath, an India-rubber bag, bladder, or other receptacle, which held two hundred and forty cubic inches of air, it would be a physical demonstration, that all his lungs were within him, that they were in full operation, and as a matter of course, there could not possibly be, under the circumstances, any actual consumption, which would be corroborated beyond all cavil, if the pulse was uniformly under seventy beats in a minute.

A person never becomes consumptive until for many weeks, and for months, the lungs have worked imperfectly; thus working imperfectly, the system receives at each breath, less air than it requires; the blood is that much less purified; the body is that much less nourished; hence, as a man falls more and more decidedly into consumption, he has less breath, less blood, less flesh, less strength; this, all know.

But suppose a patient becomes acquainted with the fact that his lungs are declining in their capability of receiving air, losing their vital capacity, the evident indication would be to arrest that decline, and not rest satisfied until it was fully removed. And what more rational course than to practice on the lungs; to exercise them artificially; to accustom himself several times a day to blow upon his India-rubber; to try more and more on each occasion to fill it more fully at a single breath?

Some months ago a man came to us who could expire, with the utmost effort, only ninety-four inches; we put him down [illegible] He promised he would. Ten days ago, March 17th, he presented himself again, having practiced these artificial breathings, and gave a measurement of a hundred and forty-four. Perseverance and an equal rate of increase for a few months longer, will certainly restore him. But this is only one of a multitude of similar cases.

The lesson of the article is:

If coming consumption is always attended with a diminution of vital capacity, of lung activity, of capability of full, free breathing, it must be averted by such practices as will arrest that decline first, and then reestablish the activities. But nobody will heed these momentous lessons, because their practice would cost no money, and they have not the charm of mystery, nor the prestige of brazen trumpets and shameless falsehoods; hence we are not afraid of our practice declining by communicating the information, for we have done it for years, yet our report is as practically unbelieved as that of the prophet of the olden times.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Take Time to Sleep.

Those who think the most, who do the brain-work, require most sleep. The time saved from sleep is always destructive to mind, body and estate. Give yourself, your children, your servants—give all that are under you the fullest amount of sleep they will take, by compelling them to go to bed at some regular hour, and to arise in the morning the moment they awake; and within a fortnight, nature, with almost the regularity of the rising sun, will unloose the bonds of sleep the moment enough repose has been secured for the wants of the system. When this habit has become established, persons will go to sleep almost instantly upon going to bed, and that nervous restlessness, which is so annoying to some people, will be entirely avoided.

Memory as affected by Disease.

A gentleman of Brooklyn, who was once waylaid by robbers, and almost killed, afterwards recovered his physical health, but his mind was much shattered. He seemed to have forgotten every thing he learned during his life, and began to learn his letters again, as if he were a child. The sounds of his voice, it is said, constituted his chief source of amusement.

Dr. Beattie relates the case of a gentleman, who, in consequence of a blow on the head, lost his knowledge of Greek, but did not appear to have lost any thing else.

Dr. Abercrombie also relates a case of a lady who, in consequence of protracted illness, lost the recollection of a period of about ten or twelve years, but spoke with perfect consistency of things as they stood before that time.

Some ten years ago, a young man residing in Northern New York, after having made considerable progress in Latin as well as in the English branches, received a kick from a horse, over the left eye, which rendered him senseless for some days. On recovering the use of his faculties, his memory was found so much impaired that he had forgotten all his knowledge of Latin.

In other cases, disease, particularly fever, causes a quickened mental action.

Flint, in his "Recollections of the Valley of the Mississippi," says that, during the derangement occasioned by a violent fever, his memory was more than ordinarily exact and retentive, and that he repeated whole passages in the different languages which he knew, with entire accuracy; this he was unable to do on recovering his health.

Sunlight in Houses.

The following fact has been established by careful observation. That where sunlight penetrates all the rooms of a dwelling, the inmates are less liable to sickness, than in a house where the apartments lose its health-invigorating influences. Basement rooms are the nurseries of indisposition. It is a gross mistake to compel human beings to reside partially under ground. There is a defective condition of the air in such rooms, connected with dampness, besides the decomposing paint on the walls, and the escape of noxious gases from pipes and drains. It is strange that builders persist in doing violence to humanity, by still erecting houses with basements.

To prevent Sun-strokes.

A few green leaves worn inside the crown of the hat, will secure a person against danger from sun-stroke. A friend who tried the experiment, found that his head became far less heated than usual.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$1.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	1.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	3.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	22.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Bro., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters, write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to Eld. Miles Grant, Boston, Mass.

The postage on the Crisis, if prepaid, quarterly or yearly, at the office where it is received, will be 13 cents a year to any part of Massachusetts, and 26 cents to any other part of the United States. [illegible]

Evening Devotion.

Now evening comes down with it's mantle of glory,
And spreads to our gaze the blue, star-spangled skies,
And our souls bending low, Mighty Father, before thee,
Are hushed by the beauty that breaks on our eyes.

The tumult of day with its care hath departed,
The sun in its chariot of gold hath gone down,
And peaceful and thankful we gather warm-hearted,
To taste of the quiet and gladness of home.

O! God of the evening, we seek thy protection,
Thy mercy to keep us while night gathers o'er,
Thy strength to uphold us and give us direction,
When day shall illumine our pathway once more.

And when in the mansions of glory unclouded,
Our sun shall no more into shadows descend,
O! grant that in beauty supernal enshrouded,
We ever may dwell with our Savior and Friend.

Resurrection.

Unless I am greatly mistaken, thousands of professing christians who pretend to believe in a resurrection from the dead, have but vague ideas with reference to the subject, and treat the matter as scarcely deserving their attention. The resurrection in the days of Christ and his apostles was the foundation of the christian's hope; all future life was based upon it. But in later days the people have taken council against the Lord and his Anointed; they have imagined a vain thing; they fancy that they are immortal, and at what they are pleased to call the death of the body, the divine or immortal part takes its flight to unknown regions, and then and there commences the life that is to come, either in happiness or misery. In the name of Jesus Christ, I wish to raise my voice against such plain contradictions of God's word.

And here I will make the assertion that all the principal errors in theology, during the last eighteen hundred years, can be directly or indirectly traced to the false assumption that man has in him an immortal soul that is destined to live while eternity endures. Dr. Adam Clarke says, why it is that the resurrection, the foundation of the teachings of Christ and his apostles, has come to be the most neglected of any doctrine in the Bible, he does not know; but so it is. His exact words may be found in his Notes on 15th chap. of 1 Cor. Now while I would not claim to know as much as Adam Clarke, perhaps I might be allowed to suggest that the change of opinion in relation to the nature of the resurrection, has caused the change of opinion in regard to the importance of that event. Christ and his apostles taught the resurrection of the man; modern theologians teach the resurrection of man's house. In a figurative and important sense the mind is the man; strictly speaking, the body is the man; the man can exist without the mind; the mind cannot exist without the body. To illustrate. Open your watch that is keeping time. You say there is motion. You hear the tick. Now separate those wheels—disorganize the thing. Where is the motion and the tick? Let us restore again those parts to their proper place. Are the motion and the tick re-united to the organization, or is there a complete restoration of the watch, material and immaterial?

But we will examine the Bible a little. Perhaps that will tell us what is raised up, and what it is to be raised up. I understand from the record, to be raised up, to have a resurrection, is, to live again; and to live again I understand implies life, followed by the death of the person or thing, and then a restoration of that person or thing to life. But to the record. John 6: 54; "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, to him is eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Now mark; whatever eats is raised up or lives again. Question. How do we eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ; literally, or by faith? By faith. Is faith the act of the body or the mind? Again. John 11: 25;—"He that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live." Then, again, that which believes is spoken of as being dead and living again. John 6: 44;—"No man can come unto me except the Father draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." Now what is drawn? The Savior says it is the man. There is no escaping the conclusion that what is drawn is raised up at the last day. How is he drawn; by physical force, or by motives? Do we place motives before that which cannot think? Once more. Rev. 1: 18; "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore." Question. What talks, the body or soul? If man is a compound being, will not some one tell us? It will not do to say the soul dictates, and the body gives utterance; that which dictates must be the I in the text.

And so I might continue to cite passages, almost without number, to show that man entire wakes into life at the resurrection. But I forbear, and will close this article by saying to those who base the resurrection upon the immortality of the soul, and contend that the soul must live to preserve the identity, that they cannot prove there will be any resurrection; for it can never be said of a soul that lives forever after it is created, that it lives again; and every argument that is good against the resurrection of the man, must be good against the resurrection of his body. I submit, then, that the Bible proves the resurrection of the entire man through Jesus Christ at the last day, or there is no future life.

"Let us Reason Together."

The power of thought is the noblest faculty with which our Creator has endowed us. It is the diary of the past, the treasury of the present, the telescope of the future. It is the forerunner of every action, the budding of every invention, the birthplace of every sentiment that was ever uttered. It is the superiority, the cultivation and application of this power, which chiefly gives to man his ascendency over the brute creation. It is undoubtedly the fact that animals possess reasoning powers, capable of some degree of culture; and all who are happy enough to own a pet in the shape of a dog or kitten, will agree in saying that the main-spring of many of their actions cannot be instinct. Yet, while we should not be so selfish as to arrogate to ourselves all the reason in the world because, as the highest order of animals, we have the largest share, it is well to preserve our dignity by the remembrance that man was created "a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor." It is well, too, to preserve our humility, by reflecting that while it is our privilege to rise above the common level of humanity, we may, by neglect or dissipation, smother the light of reason, and sink below the level of the beasts. Too many, alas, are so degraded from the dignity of manhood that they might very appropriately be styled twin brothers of a dog; and even then the truth would be startlingly apparent that the dog "was the flower of the family!" Intellectual power is the great birthright of humanity, bringing with it a corresponding responsibility. Yet in many, this great gift lies dormant instead of being used to the glory of the Giver. Forgetful that of those to whom much is given shall much be required; forgetful that the sands of time have nearly run out; forgetful of the "moth and rust" that corrupt our treasures here; forgetful of the higher joys of immortality; their thoughts and aspirations rise no higher than the next presidential election, or the next new fashion. Of such the Master is even now saying, "Take from him the one talent, and give it to him that hath ten."

The generality of people do little or no business in the thinking line. If this were true of Americans alone, we should incline to the opinion that they did not find it lucrative enough to satisfy their love of money; but as the post of a thinker is an almost unoccupied one in all nations, we are forced to conclude that people are too lazy to think. It is a serious fact that they are almost too indolent even to read the thoughts of others.

Some are constantly walking back and forth in the same old beaten track, with no more variety in their ideas than in the tunes of an organ-grinder; like miners, who, having gained a few lumps of gold, sit down and gaze at them forever, without exerting themselves to obtain any more. Then there are some who have never earned for themselves a single idea; whose thoughts are purely hereditary, being handed down from their fathers and grandfathers, for many generations back, as heir-looms in the family. They pride themselves on a long line of ancestry, instead of being self-made men. From the armorial bearings of their predecessors, they derive honor; and the family arms are always borne in ostentatious triumph before every sentiment that dares to enter their minds.

Ministers are hired to think for those whose own tools are rusting for want of use. Commentators are employed to clear up mysteries, and to make them. Theological Seminaries are resorted to by many for the purpose of learning creeds instead of "searching the Scriptures;" and it is to be feared that many of their creeds first saw the light under the protecting arches of the Romish Vatican, and were tenderly nourished by the fostering care of the Romish Pontiff. It is not at all wonderful that those who have been educated under the modern force-pump system of indoctrinating children, should suppose that for their faith in many unsustained positions they have "internal evidence;" for "as the twig is bent so is the tree inclined;" and as our reason is capable of being either perverted or enlightened, it may be so educated as to make even monstrous errors appear plausible.

The uneducated reason of twenty different persons will point them twenty different ways. This being the case, it is very necessary to have a standard to which we may conform our "internal evidences." We are not to blame for following the dictates of our reason; but, as the responsibility of its education rests on our shoulders, we are to blame if it teaches us to do wrong, for we should have given it a correct education from the infallible instruction book, with which God has furnished us. We are culpable if we neglect to measure our reason by this standard, otherwise, it is a safe guide for no one. We are responsible not only for all the light that we have, but for all the light that we might have. Thought is the fountain-head of action, if that is pure, so will the stream of our life be pure. And it rests with us, whether we make reason the bane or blessing of life.

A Few More Thoughts Considered.

BRO. GRANT.—I take the liberty of enlarging to some extent upon what has already been written on the subject of FEMALE Preaching. Hope none will think me presumptuous. A sense of the unpopularity of the affair, is what makes me so anxious for the right of the matter to be made apparent. It is looked upon as indecent, unscriptural, and unnatural, for a woman to preach. How the "little horn" pushes against it; how those who partake of the garments that characterize and particularize the Scarlet Beast, will open their mouths and stretch their eyes if a woman stands up for Jesus. Females may stand up on an elevated platform; crowd into our galleries; step up to "the head" of our well-trained choirs, and call "sinners to the gospel feast," sing forth "the matchless worth," and "sound the glories forth, which in our Savior shine." They may take the lead in all our public tea-meetings, sewing circles, etc., etc.; and it is thought an honor to them. They may sing Jesus, but as for talking out anything about him, it is an absurdity unpardonable. Queens may come forth heading multitudes, and enter the castles of grandeur, and lead a nation to the laws of man; but their sisters may not go in the solitary places of sin and turn perishing mortals heavenward to walk in the statutes of our Creator! Mock consistency!

Some affirm that the apostle's language, "Help those that labored in the gospel," etc., meant simply those women that performed the ordinary work that devolves on woman; such as making and mending Paul's garments. But it should be suggested that the apostles dressed so differently from ministers at the present day, that very little stitching and starching kept them fit for the public eye. It is vain to say Paul called those who fried pork, boiled potatoes, besides pouring and sweetening poison, his fellow laborers in the gospel. This work is common to all females; then why should it particularize two or three? If such work is laboring in the gospel, then as soon as a woman takes the responsibility of housewifery she becomes initiated in the sublime mysteries of the spiritual vineyard of the Lord! Tell us that woman has no right to meddle with the gospel; then turn right round and say it is gospel labor to wash a preacher's clothes. We must see clearly that this will not do. Paul meant something else.

Some say he meant those females that went to their neighbors, privately, and told them of Jesus. But it is something more. Every christian, male or female, is commanded to have a godly conversation; and what christian is there that has never said "Come to Jesus" to her acquaintances? This could not particularize Paul's assistants.

Hear me a moment. When a man feels it duty and can preach, you bid him "God speed." Let a woman have like ability and promptings, and you crowd her back, causing her to live far from peacefully with God, and to grieve the Holy Spirit. The command to preach is given to the church as a whole. You say it means for the men to preach; but the rest must hold their peace. When we read of Timothy helping Paul, you are proud to admit he preached Jesus. But when the same words are spoken of females, you start back and say it means very differently. Now this is only pride lurking in your heart. When Jesus comes, and when that last great prayer meeting is in session, it will be a last thought, the propriety of a woman calling upon the rocks and mountains. Then let them be on the same level now, and unitedly call upon God for salvation. All are one in Christ Jesus. In the world to come, there will be equality among the sexes; the female voice will sound as loud and sweet as man's. She will wear as bright a crown, and stand quite as near the throne. Cheering thought!

In an old Crisis I read a touching appeal from Sr. S. P. G., of Plymouth, Vt., for preachers to visit that place. She mourns sadly and pitifully because the land is covered with darkness, and that the inhabitants are perishing for want of a voice to say, "Come up hither." There are many such voices, echoing to each other, which I hear in the Crisis. One Sister is "alone," in a region where the news of the Kingdom has never been told. Now to such let me say, instead of folding up your hands and murmuring these complaints, go to work yourselves. You're alone, and cannot pay a preacher's fare,—go at it yourself. Tell them of Jesus, at least. Tell them your hopes, and thus awaken an interest and open a way for others. Mostly all of you that mourn your loneliness are capable of giving a reason for your good hope. Remember, the Lord will soon come; if you mourn much longer, your neighbors will never hear of the kingdom. Certainly you might gain one if you persevere.

Sisters, if you can, it is your right to call on sinners to prepare to meet God. It is your duty, if your lot is cast to make a calling. You may smile at this; but whenever you see a sister in the capacity of preacher, I know in your secret thoughts you envy her; i. e., if she is "able." I do not care so much for the preaching; but I do want folks to know that it is perfectly right, and that God would bless me if I felt it duty to preach, just as readily as if my name was James.

M. MATHEWS.

For the Crisis.
The Political Christian.

The idea of a converted world has been heretofore supposed as having its realization in the successful preaching of the gospel. But it seems now, if we may judge from their actions, and words as well, that many of the more zealous advocates for the conversion of the world are hoping for its realization, at least to a considerable degree, through voting—virtually, through State legislation.

They would not be guilty of seeking a union of Church and State. Oh, no! they would become "a pillar of salt" first! But they do make voting a christian duty, and a test of our zeal for the spread of christianity. Yea, more. It is often said to me, and it but fairly embodies their arguments generally, that "he who will not vote cannot be a christian," on the ground that "Christian measures are involved," which will, in the event of success, become established and generally regarded as a law of society, on the principle recognized in all legislation, that "the majority should rule;" but, if they fail of success, it will be only for want of votes—and, so far as I am concerned, for want of mine. [Amen. Ed.]

Who can separate the church from the State in this scheme? The success of these measures, as they claim, would be a success of christianity; but a disobedience to them, when thus successful, would be a rebellion against the State, and punished as such. This success would encourage the introduction of other "orthodox measures;" and, thus cementing the union of church and state, this voting would give to them the realization of their ideal of the success of christianity,—"a nation of christians"—rather a nation of bigoted persecutors.

Who does not know that "christian politicians," nearly all of them, aspire to this very thing, and seek for its realization in the scheme here presented? Does not our "voting," then, tend directly to a union of church and state; and, in the event of the church party becoming strongest, to the inauguration of a system of persecution, under color of rebellion, against the state? The instigators of persecution, of every age, have availed themselves of this trick, to make it appear that the victims of their hatred are guilty of some misdemeanor against the state; as, "a breaker of the peace,"—"an exciter of the people,"—"a mover of sedition,"—a nuisance to society,"—"a vagabond," etc., etc. Thus it was with Christ, Paul, Peter, with the early New England persecutions, with the Methodists in England, and it has been so in my native town against Adventists, where I have seen them arraigned and tried as "disturbers of the peace," finding no more plausible pretext for exciting the people against them. Others in other places have shared the same fate; and I have no doubt that were the legislative power in the hands of the church party, according to their aspirations, they would not be long in issuing their "bull" against this "Sadduceeism," as they term this Bible doctrine of "life only through Christ." May we not, then, by voting, be digging a pit for ourselves? Should we not inquire with Charles Beecher, "Are we not acting over again the days of Rome?"

But some will say, "We do not vote with the hope of any such success as a conversion of the world, nor do we fear a union of church and state, again; for we expect the coming of Christ soon. But we ought, while we stay here, to use our influence for good, wholesome laws for the regulation of society." Though you may not fear anything like a union of church and state, still you co-operate with others in a course which tends in that direction; and, if the Lord should suffer such a state of things to exist for a time, before he comes, in order that the now barren, worldly church may be "purified, made white, and tried," you are, by "voting," helping to inaugurate this system of persecution. The "perilous times" are to be marked by a resistance to "the truth" by "men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith," yet "having a form of godliness," in a manner similar to the fierce struggle between Moses and those Egyptian magicians; which is not the case thus far.

And as to your anxiety for good, wholesome laws for the regulation of society, God's law is a sufficient code for all christians; it is designed to thoroughly furnish the man of God unto all good works. 2 Tim. 3: 17. Having this one law to ourselves, we have no right to dictate another to our neighbor, for his government.

You will say, "the powers that be are ordered or ordained of God." True. "Since then God works by means of the ballot, if we would work together with God, we must use our influence in the inauguration and support of these powers, by voting." If there is any weight in such an argument, it would prove that, in order to be right, we must be on the side of the majority always; since God expresses his choice through the majority: otherwise, we should claim to be wiser than God. If he does order the powers that be, then the Presidents were his choice for that office. Were they yours, too? If not, what did your vote avail? How many such votes as that of yours would it take to defeat God's choice? Would you not do as well to vote for the wind to blow from the South, and give us rain during to-morrow afternoon? If your vote could avail anything, it would be to inaugurate a power ordered of man instead of God. But if the powers that be are ordered of God, it would not probably give him much uneasiness about the government of the world to-morrow, to learn to-night that you had died suddenly, without being able to communicate your plans for its future government.

But let us labor as we will to have our own way in these things, we shall have to learn, sooner or later, the lesson which God taught Nebuchadnezzar:—"That the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."—Dan. 4: 17.

Why should we alter God's choice, if we could? Does God need our assistance in making his choice, that we should vote for the basest of men? Or shall we vote for some other man, for the satisfaction of having God prove our wisdom foolishness?

But our vote, besides being practically unavailable, will place us in the position of being aiders and abettors of that wholesale murder—war—so far as we exert an influence by our vote; all governments being maintained by war.

Again, if the church were to join in and vote with the world, would she not be of the world really? How could she do it, and not love the world? Were we not voters before we believed? and why is it that we are so opposed to voting now? When did we lose our love for voting? Was it not, in every case, when we found a love for Christ and his coming? As for myself, I recollect that I was surprised at the change I had found wrought in my heart in this matter. I had held politics as the "apple of my eye," and was surprised, after two weeks' experience, to find that God had removed all this filth, without consulting me in the matter. I had not even thought of politics, in the time, but my love for it was entirely gone. I then consulted other brethren, to see what it meant, and found that God had wrought the same change in them, at conversion, and they regarded it still. I praised God for his mercy; and hope, through his grace, that I may not, like the sow that was washed, return to wallowing in the mire again.

And, lastly, I would urge that the symbols selected by divine wisdom as the most fitting to represent the governments of this world, are "beasts," or "wild beasts," and a "dragon." Shall we, then, join and help make up that throng which God has branded with the character of wild beasts and dragons?

"Stray Thoughts Arrested."—No. 1.

BY T. W. S.

Why is it that some ministers, who profess to preach the truth, do not do so? Is it the truth, for a learned divine to publish, or have published, that he will preach on the "Destruction of the wicked," and instead, preach on the destruction of their future enjoyments? Is it honest, for him to take the text, 2 Thess. 1: 9, and say it means the destruction of the happiness of the wicked? It seems to me that it would be wise, that it would be proper and just and honest for every one, to believe what the Bible says, and not to spend much of the little time left for mortals this side of the kingdom of Christ, in trying to make it mean something. Men are getting so wise, orthodox theologians especially, that the plain teaching of Scripture is not sufficient for man's salvation: they must paint it up a little, adding an ornament here, covering an apparent blemish there, until the seeker after truth can scarcely recognize God's word amidst their speculation.

Again. We would ask this seemingly foolish question—has a man three souls? We heard, a few days ago, a minister of an evangelical denomination speak thus:—"And the rich fool in the gospel, (suppose he meant the rich fool 'spoken' of in the gospel,) who had been accumulating riches,—who said to his soul, 'soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years,' etc; but God said to his inmost soul, thou fool! this night shall thy soul be required of thee." Thus we see a trinity of souls in one man—yet we suppose all one soul; a kind of three in one, and one in three, like another trinity we hear of. We confess our inability to understand these things. We have taken the Bible as an expositor of the facts concerning man's nature, and present and future relations. We do not feel desirous of being "wise above what is written."

When we see such perversion of scripture as some are guilty of, and so many absurd doctrines taught, and such a general forsaking of the plain teachings of God's word; and when we observe the eagerness with which the mysterious and intricate theories of men are sought after, and the hesitation and oft-times suspicion in which Bible truth is received, we are compelled to think that we are in the last days. Truly, iniquity doth abound.

To a Number.

My friend, you stand off there on the other side of the fence, grumbling because others do not do every thing just up to your idea of perfection. This one talks too much, that one dresses too well, while the other one out yonder walks too straight. Bro. A. does not do exactly to suit you; and our minister acts contrary to your expectations. He is not always on the guard, not quite perfect, sometimes steps aside and sins. Well, do you not think he is sorry for it all? And if God overlooks it, can't you?

But now, my fault-finding friend, do you really think man, mortal as he is, can be perfect in this life? "Well, but if a person join the church, let him live up to his profession." So he does aim at it; if he did not, perhaps he might be twice as wicked as he is. "But why don't he do as he tells us to? If he can't, let him give up." Now, my friend, you just walk out and give us an example. Won't you be a specimen christian? Show us how much better you can do. Come, try it. What better are you, to stand and do nothing, than those who are trying, but sometimes fail a little? Who is doing the [illegible]

Garibaldi.

Who is he? And what is there about him that creates such excitement? He is a wonderful man; all are obliged to admit the fact. He was born July 4th, 1807, and performed his first service in the Sardinian Marine. When twenty-seven years old, he conspired against tyrants, but failed, and fled to France, and afterwards served the Bey of Tunis, when he became Captain of a Frigate. Then he enlisted under the flag of Uruguay, South America, fitting out a vessel at his own expense. In 1842, at the age of thirty-five, he was captured by the Brazilians, and subjected to cruelty, till his escape the following year, and then took command of the Uruguayan navy, giving battle to a superior force; was defeated; but, rather than surrender, burnt his ships, retreating with officers and men. Then on land at the head of a few hundred he still fought the enemy. His wife also was captured by the Brazilians, but she escaped.

In 1844 he fought for Montevideo against Rosas; and for three days, in three vessels, gave battle to ten ships of war, and again was defeated, and burned his vessels rather than surrender. He landed with his men, fought his way into Montevideo, took command of the troops, and performed valorously. In 1848 he was at Genoa. He was placed by the government of Milan at the head of three thousand men, and went to assist Bergamo and Brescia, but was obliged to abandon the undertaking, and finally fled to Switzerland.

In 1850 he was elected to the Piedmontese Parliament, but it was soon dissolved. The Pope fled from Rome, and he was again called to the field, where he opposed the French bravely. He attacked the Neapolitans at Palestrina, beat five thousand of them with only three thousand. Soon after he put King Ferdinand II.'s troops to flight, and was severely wounded; he fell back to Rome, which was invaded by the French; he fled to the mountains, was hunted like a wild beast by the Austrians, but succeeded in reaching Genoa, and then embarked for America. While flying for his life among the mountains, his wife died in his arms from exhaustion, and he buried her in a grave dug by his own hands, in the mountain pass. He arrived at New York, July 30, 1850, found a temporary home with an old Roman soldier engaged in making candles, at Staten Island. He commanded a vessel bound for South America with adamantine candles, and next sailed to California on a commercial venture; and in 1852 went to China, in service of the Peruvian government.

In 1854 he returned to Genoa, commanded a small merchant craft; when the Italian war broke out, finding [illegible] bread humbly, when he sprang to arms for the cause of Italian liberty. It seems that an overruling power has preserved him for the present crisis in his country's affairs. He took the field with ten hundred and seventy men including himself, and aided by an undisciplined force of Sicilians speedily captured Palermo, where, at last accounts, he was preparing to start an expedition against Messina, which was to leave June 28th. It is stated that the King of Naples has hired a band of brigands to murder him. Already Sicily is in his possession, in fact. His foes tremble at his future operations. The Jesuits are withdrawing, and great disorder prevails. The King of Naples must fall, and the Pope must flee to his spiritual kingdom, leaving his temporal to others. Garibaldi is evidently the rough executor of this work. He has been called the Washington of Italy.

The above sketch has been compiled from various sources, but probably is correct. That he is to act a prominent part in the affairs of Europe, is generally believed. Meanwhile, let us watch events as they occur, and govern ourselves accordingly.

Prayer.

A word on prayer. What is it? Answer: An earnest, ardent desire of the heart going forth to the Father who is the fountain of all knowledge and goodness, in the name of Jesus, for the blessings which we need, and blessings which he has promised to give unto us, if we ask in faith. And it may be expressed vocally, in our closet, in our families, or in the public assembly of the saints. Thanks be unto God, our Father, that we can in the hour of trial turn aside from the world, its cares and perplexities, and enter into our closet; and there in humble reverence bow before him, in the name of his Anointed, and ask him for just such things as we need.

Oh, the value of a throne of grace! Who can estimate it? None but those who have been brought into the deep waters of affliction. Glory be to God! these waters are calculated to bring the christian into a position where he will become more closely allied to a throne of grace; consequently better qualified for usefulness, and the coming and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

P. S. Bro. G:—I am sorry that the campmeeting at W. is at so early a date: from the fact that farmers may not get through with their haying and harvesting. However, I hope that all the dear saints who can, will attend this appointed feast. Brethren and sisters, make the meeting a subject of prayer. The Lord willing, I design to attend the meeting, and labor with God for the salvation of souls. R. V. L.

Notice of Elder J. V. Himes.

In reply to many inquiries of friends, I would say, that having received cordial invitations from the committees of the campmeetings of Wilbraham and Westford, I shall attend those meetings, and do what I can for the salvation of souls.

I believe the coming of Christ is nigh, and can work with any, and all, who hold that it may come to-day, or this year, or any time between this and 1868, which is to my mind the year of the great crisis! Let us all unite, and work, and be ready. I do not see sufficient ground of difference for contention or disunion in the positions held by different parties.

1. Some say it may come any time, today. Very well, I do not object, and will try to live with them consistent with this faith, and be ready to-day. I cannot say but what they are right.

2. Others say this year. Very well. It may be. I will walk softly, and with them listen to every sound that may indicate the nearness of the Master's footsteps, and be ready. It may be that he will come this year.

3. I hold with the evidence before me, with my construction of the prophecies, that a few years may elapse in which the Papal power will be wholly broken down, and the Romish power be wholly worsted, and we "see the king in his beauty." And that, I think, will be about 1868, when Daniel will stand in his lot at the end of the 1335 days; which began in 533, and end in 1868.

Let us live, and hope, and work, and on either of the above positions, with a practical faith, we may work with success, and be prepared for the kingdom.

I shall in future, as always, work anywhere, where the door of utterance is open, to speak the whole truth to this generation on the Advent of the King of kings.

I will add that No. 3 of the "Voice of the Prophets," will be out in season for the campmeetings. All orders for Nos. 1, 2, or 3, will be promptly answered. No. 3 will contain the "Celestial Railroad," an article suited to these times.

Maine State Conference.

The Maine Conference of Adventists will commence its next annual session in Augusta, Thursday, A. M., Sept. 6th, at 10 o'clock. One of the large halls will be procured, and due notice given. It is very desirable, and we shall expect that all our ministers who are in union with the object of the Conference, be present to take part in the work, and as many other brethren and sisters as consistently can. We also invite any of the other classes of christians, or sinners, who may wish to attend and take part with us, in a christian manner. Our object is to use all our means for a united, untiring perseverance in proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom of God at hand; with the accompanying truths to awaken, unite, and "build up the church in her most holy faith," and to lead sinners to Christ for pardon and eternal life. Come, brethren who can, in the spirit and power of the gospel. Let those at home pray that God will direct us, and make us useful in the work. The few brethren in Augusta will do all they can to provide for brethren who come. Call on Bro. Benj. Pray, on the east side of the river; or on Bro. D. Mosier, and W. A. Lovejoy; [illegible] give you direction in the city.

"The Light Ship."

By the time some of our friends have read this notice, the "Light Ship" will be afloat and ready for duty. My last notice contained my last appeal; in this, I would return my sincere thanks to those who have nobly assisted me in launching the boat. I know there are some who are waiting to see what the book is like before they throw their offering into the fund. It is a sure way, and I have nothing to say against it; only, that if every one were as cautious, the "light ship" had not touched the water for a year to come, if ever. One man said, when I asked him to help, "What's the use? if a sailor had five hundred dollars he'd spend every cent of it in rum." The gentleman should have reflected that we wished to cure the sailor of his evil habits.

To the sailor, this tract must, in every case, go free. And that this may be observed, I shall choose whom I consider suitable to aid in its free distribution. To all others but seamen, the tract, containing sixty pages, shall be 10 cts. each, postage 1 ct., 1-4 off per doz. The proceeds arising from the sale thereof, together with whatever donations may be given, shall be for the publication of repeated editions, till, if time should last, every ship and sailor's boarding house in the Union shall receive two or three copies at least of the book.

I hope landsmen also may read it with interest, and help to scatter it in their neighborhood.

Orders addressed to me, at the "Crisis" office, shall be thankfully received and promptly filled. I expect to bring a supply to the Wilbraham campmeeting. Hoping that God will bless the work, I am, dear friends, yours faithfully,

Jno. F. Cotton.

Campmeeting in Maine.

Bro. York starts an idea almost forgotten, and asks for a response. I well recollect of being engaged in getting up and sustaining several general camp, tent, and grove meetings in Maine, in past years. My pocket has not got over the draft yet. But that is all well. I thank the Lord we had them. I cannot do now what I then could; yet, I can do something. All is the Lord's that I have; it goes well when it tells for God. I have wanted a campmeeting for a long time, but do not like to say "Come," and then go behind.

Well, I will say, we could have a campmeeting in Maine as well as not, if there was a general heart to act in that way. Perhaps there will be just after the Conference—we will see. But it must be under way before that, or not be ready. I will do all I can to aid such a meeting. Say on, brethren. Yours, still sounding the alarm.

I. C. Wellcome.

Notice to the Brethren in Levant, Me., and Vicinity.

I shall not be able to attend the campmeeting to be held at Levant, as you request, on account of my health. My lungs are somewhat affected, and, as much exhaustion from speaking is against the recovery of my strength and health, I do not wish to preach much in the open air. I hope that you will have a good, profitable meeting, that truth may triumph, and that God will abundantly bless you in your effort to promote his cause.

To those in your section with whom I have spent so many pleasant hours serving the Lord, I wish to say, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take your crown." In a "little while" we will be at home. Yours affectionately, hoping for eternal life,

John Howell.

Go to the Campmeeting.

Who is going to the Wilbraham campmeeting? How many there are that desire to go, but cannot afford it. Sister A. and Sister B. would like to go, but cannot afford it. Now there are those new black silks for which you gave $20, cameo pins $3 each, flowers in bonnets 37 cts., roses on the outside 62 cts., etc., etc. It is not to be wondered at that you cannot afford to go to the campmeeting.

Come, sisters, never mind now, if you have got all those costly things—go to the campmeeting. It will do you good to see some there dressed so plain. Why, they look as though they believed what the Bible said; in Peter's first epistle, 3: 3–5, and first Tim. 2: 9. But, sisters, do not understand me to say that they all dress there after the rule of the Bible. No, no. I am sorry to say there are some, who are well versed in scripture, and who should be examples for others, as Paul was for his brethren and sisters, that dress too much like the world, with their gold chains, breast pins, and finger rings, that they did not buy but somebody gave to them. They will tell you it is no sin, for they did not buy them! Come, sisters, let us lay aside all these costly things, which are like the whirlwind that passeth and is no more, and keep the commandments of Christ; and we may have that gold that never will [illegible] that robe which no moth can [illegible] flowers that shall never fade. [illegible] a closer walk with God!"

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, AUGUST 8, 1860.

A Fast.

On account of the great importance of our annual gathering at Wilbraham, we would propose to those interested in this meeting, that Friday, Aug. 17th, be observed as a day of fasting and special prayer, that our campmeeting this year may be noted for good order, christian harmony, the awakening and conversion of sinners, and the reclaiming of backsliders; in short, that it may be the most profitable meeting we have ever held.

Campmeeting Items.

Do not forget to take your umbrella, overshoes, shawl, overcoat, and a bed-quilt to cover you at night. It will be well also to bring a pillow-case, which can be filled with straw, and make a good pillow, much better than the stone which Jacob used. Let every church bring a tent if they can. It can be made of common cotton cloth, supplied by different families, and used for family purposes after campmeeting, if they do not choose to keep it in the tent for another season. By all means have a part, or all of your tent, double, so that in case we have a rain, you can keep your sleeping room and bedding dry. Every tent's company needs an axe, auger, hammer, nails, pail, wash basin, towels, soap, and perhaps a looking-glass; but it will be wise to spend the most time looking in the gospel glass. Wear plain clothing that will not be harmed when you sit upon the straw or hemlock slabs. If the jewelry is all left at home, it will not be lost in the leaves. Do not forget the Bible direction to christians for their adorning. Here it is: "Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of GREAT PRICE." Do not neglect this valuable ornament. It is all that will be needed. It may be necessary to lay aside the vain ornaments of the world, before the one of "great price" can be obtained, as there is no harmony between the two. They have no fellowship for each other. Come fully adorned like a true follower of Christ, so "that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." Let us think more of recommending Christ to our friends and neighbors, than of ourselves.

Railroads to Campmeeting.

Those who purpose going to the Wilbraham campmeeting by Railroad, should remember that the express train does not stop there. Those going from Boston should take the 6 o'clock, A. M., or 1.30 P. M. train. Those coming from Springfield, should take 7.15 or 10.25 A. M. train, or the 5 P. M. express freight train, with passenger car attached. Those from Worcester will take the 8 o'clock, A. M., or 3.30 P. M. train.

Wilbraham is nine miles east of Springfield, and ninety-one west from Boston.

Efforts are being made to get fare reduced to Rutland and Bellows' Falls, as it has been to Albany.

Way-side Notes.

July 25th, we went to the Providence convention, where we met our dear Bro. Hastings, who has just returned from "Our Home," at Dansville, N. Y. His countenance is improved, and he feels some better, but he needs a longer rest than he has yet enjoyed. In his zeal for the welfare of his fellow beings, he has overworked his mental and physical energies, and it may take some time to repair his exhausted constitution. Pray for him.

One object of this conference was to devise efficient means, if possible, to carry forward the tract enterprise and afford relief to Bro. H., who has labored so successfully in this department. The people have never been more willing to read tracts on the great truths of the gospel than at the present time; especially on the doctrine of the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked. Nearly every church has some devoted members, who are either believing, or looking favorably upon those great truths which are continually spreading in all directions. Instead of lessening our efforts, they should be greatly increased. The harvest is ready for the laborers. Let none delay to enter the field.

Our conference continued two days, and we hope to see good results from the gathering. As a report of the meeting may be expected from the secretary, we will not say more at this time, excepting that we had religious exercises Wednesday evening, which closed up with lively interest. One poor backslider, quite intelligent, entreated us to pray for him. The arrows of the Lord had pierced his heart, and he felt an earnest desire to return to the narrow way that leadeth unto life. Several requested prayers that they might be able to live nearer to the Lord, and be filled with perfect love.

Thursday evening, (26th) we returned home, and enjoyed a good prayer meeting at the Crisis office.

Saturday, 28th, we again took the cars for our next appointment. Those who think the preacher's life is all sunshine, with no trials, might change their minds after a little experience. Yet, we would say as did Paul, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

"Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal."

After a day's ride through many romantic and picturesque scenes, made delightful by deep glens, purling brooks, broad streams and water falls, mountain peaks, beautiful farms with their reapers and mowers, we arrived safely at Castleton, Vt., and met an affectionate greeting from the dear saints in this place. It seemed like going home to the embrace of loved ones long separated. The very sight of their happy faces was enough to rest a weary pilgrim. They love the blessed hope as well as ever, and have had five or six evening meetings a week, which are lively and well attended in the midst of haying and harvest. It is heart cheering to hear their joyous testimonies, and behold the wonderful changes in their lives. It is the Lord's marvelous work. Others are almost persuaded to be christians.

Notwithstanding the rain fell in torrents on the Sabbath, (July 29th) we had a large audience of attentive hearers, some of whom came eleven miles.

Monday, the 30th, they raised their new meeting house, which they hope to have done in six or eight weeks.

Monday, July 30th, we made a flying visit to Sandy Hill, and enjoyed another heavenly season with our dear christian friends in that place. It seemed like a foretaste of the joys of paradise. We do not expect to come any nearer to the reality in this world. "Pine Avenue" is memorable for happy scenes, but this was one of the best. Some loved ones were absent that we met when there before, but the good Lord filled the vacuum by his own glorious presence, and actually caused us to cry for joy. As said the holy man upon the mount of transfiguration, we could truly exclaim, "Lord, it is good for us to be here."

After we had conversed awhile upon the signs of the times, and the bright evidences of soon getting to our happy Eden home, we bowed in prayer to thank the Lord for the privilege we were enjoying, and our blessed hope, so cheering. Then followed some interesting testimonies for Jesus, from Bro. Parry and family, Bro. and Sr. Mathewson Bro. Wait and his amiable daughters, who are decided christians.

Among other scenes of interest during this evening visit, two daughters of Bro. Parry decided to give their hearts wholly to the Lord. This made the tears of joy flow afresh; especially when Emma, the youngest, unexpectedly arose, and with streaming eyes said, "I want to see Him who died to save me." While angels rejoiced, we were not indifferent. The whole family, Bro. and Sr. Parry and five daughters, are now trying to please the Lord, and are seeking for immortality "by patient continuance in well doing." This adds new joys to their happy home circle.

There is nothing that makes home so pleasant as the christian religion; but how desolate is every thing where it is wanting. The most accomplished, intelligent, beautiful, and naturally amiable, if they do not love Jesus, are but poor companions for the christian, and can have no part in the coming kingdom. He who is not a christian is but half a man, and scarce deserving the name. Only the good—the pure in heart—will have eternal life, and partake of the joys of the coming paradise. Dear reader, let us try to meet there.

"Change Times and Laws." Dan. 7; 25.

When Daniel was moved to describe the "Little Horn" power that should arise and "speak great words against the Most High," he says it shall "think to change times and laws." Not knowing that they are attaching the foregoing prophecy to themselves, the Catholics confirm its application in their own writings. There appeared in The Catholic, a short time since, under the head of "Rome Vindicated," a Pastoral from Cardinal Wiseman, who says, when speaking of the Romish Church:—

"It prepared that great code justly called 'the Pontifical right,' the jus pontificum, which in spite of defection and dislike still keeps its hold on the institutions of every country professing Christianity, permeating our civil and our ecclesiastical law, giving them terms and phrases never to be extirpated, regulating marriages, wills, benefices, and clerical prerogatives.

Its influence enters into our every day life; feasts instituted by it, and names canonized by it fill our almanacs, and give titles to periods of legal import, to civilly recognised times, long without any religious meaning. Our very calendar which gives uniformity to the fixing of dates through western Europe, emanates from the Pontifical Chair."

In Oct., A. D. 1582, Pope Gregory XIII. changed the calendar, by throwing away, or retrenching, ten days. In 1751, the British parliament adopted the act of the Pope, at which time eleven days were omitted, so that the 3d of Sept. was called the 14th, and thus we have the change, by the authority of the Pope, from "old" to "new style." No point is more plainly fulfilled in prophecy than that the "Little Horn" power has changed "times and laws." The prophets of the Lord make no mistakes.

Preachers' Aid Society.

It will be recollected that an effort was made last year at the Wilbraham campmeeting in behalf of the poor preachers, especially those laboring in the west, which is now the great field for missionary labor. For some two years it has been very difficult for those in the west to obtain enough to be comfortable; on account of the great financial depression. On this account, some felt it to be a duty to do something towards staying up their hands in their self-denying labors. They have left their pleasant homes and friends at the east, to spread the glad tidings of the coming kingdom among those who have not heard the joyful sound.

Brethren, shall we stand by them? or let them faint on the battle field for want of help that we might well afford? Some two hundred dollars, or more, were pledged at the last Wilbraham campmeeting; but a considerable portion of it is yet unpaid. We hope that all who have not paid will forward it soon as they can to Bro. Geo. T. Adams, Boston, who was appointed treasurer. If it is not paid before, try to hand it to him at the coming campmeeting, which will be the time for the annual meeting of the society, and to hear the reports of the Treasurer, and financial committee.

The War in Syria.

The war in Syria between the Druses and Turks on one side, and the Roman Catholic and Greek churches on the other, has become a very serious affair. Thus far the Druses and Turks have been victorious, and very cruel and bloody in their proceedings. We have news from Beyrout to July 1st, when the correspondent of the London News writes, "Our prospects get darker every day, for each hour brings either news of fresh atrocities committed by the Druses, or more decided proof that the acts of the latter are connived at by the Turkish government." He says:

"It is now ascertained, and a nominal list of them has been made, that up to last night the Druses have burnt and pillaged no less than one hundred and fifty-one Christian villages since the 29th of May last, while no less than from seventy-five, to eighty thousand Christian inhabitants of Lebanon—many of whom were a month ago wealthy men, others in quite easy circumstances, and all strangers to anything like poverty or want—are homeless beggars, depending on actual charity for their daily bread. Over and above the number of Christians shot in actual warfare, between seven and eight thousand have been butchered—hacked to death would be the fitter term—as no butcher ever used in his calling half the cruelty of these bloodthirsty miscreants—in cold blood by the Druses. And, besides this, more than five-thousand widows, who, until this Druse campaign, were happy wives and mothers, have lost their husbands, brothers, fathers, and all male relatives, even to the male infants at the breast; and sixteen hundred children are now orphans.

All these figures have been very carefully compared with others, and weighed in the balance of English (local) opinion, before being given as facts. And, after conversing, comparing and digesting all I hear, after bringing my own four years' experience in Syria to bear upon the subject, I am bound to say that I have considerably underrated the case. Moreover, fifty millions sterling would not pay for the towns, villages, hamlets and silk factories destroyed throughout the mountain—all the property of the Christians. There is, besides, a fearfully long list of convents, churches and nunneries belonging to the same people, all of which have been plundered and then destroyed by the Druses. In short, what commenced as a civil war between the two sects can no longer be called by that name.

For the last twenty days it has been nothing less than a wholesale massacre of Christians by the Druses, and a wanton destruction of all property belonging to the former by the latter."

This looks like another evidence that the work of desolation has commenced upon the harlot power. Garibaldi is at work about the heart, and others on the extremities. The following will give the reader some idea of the terrible work of the Druses against the Catholics. Says the correspondent:—

"One poor woman—I know both her husband and herself well at Deir-el-Kamar, where they were wealthy people—told me that when the Druses attacked the town the second time (I should mention that it had surrendered, and all the inhabitants had given up their arms some twenty-four days previously to the Druses, and had been promised protection by their sheiks) her husband was hacked to pieces before her eyes by the large knives of the Druses, who then declared that they must kill all male children in the house. The mother tried to hide her two sons, one fifteen, the other nine years old. The Druses however, found them out, and as she begged and prayed for their lives, and endeavored to cover them in a corner with her person, the Druses hacked at the lads over her shoulder, and gashed them until they both dropped down apparently lifeless. The Druses then made off, and the woman, thinking her two sons dead, remained in a sort of a stupor for two hours—so far as she can calculate. At last she was roused by hearing the eldest lad call her in a faint voice, trying to assure her that he was not yet dead. On this she felt the body of the youngest boy, and found his heart beating. She got some water, and after giving it to both her children—so far as she could get them to drink it—started into the town to see whether she could procure assistance to get her and her boys away. She got as far as the Seralia, or government house, but there she found that some five hundred Christians, who had taken refuge, were being cut to pieces by the Druses, who had been invited to enter the precincts of the building by the Turkish soldiers of the garrison, these latter helping in the butchery, and being so far worse than the Druses, that they abused in the most infamous manner all the women. Seeing no help could be obtained here, the poor woman returned to her house. She had not been absent more than an hour, but she found her two children cut into pieces, joint by joint, "limb and trunk severed" (to use her words) "as butchers cut up sheep"—heads, legs, arms, and bodies being hacked up into a shapeless mass of bloody flesh and reeking bones. Some other poor women then joined her, and together they made their way to a mulberry plantation outside the town, where they passed the night. At daybreak they were discovered by a party of Druses, who, after stripping them to find whether they had any money on their persons, and taking away what little they possessed, told them they might go where they liked. Four of the poor creatures had babies, all under a year old. Of these infants two were girls and two boys; the former they did not touch, but the latter, they said, might grow up to be men and bear arms against the Druses; they therefore took the poor little creatures, and before their mothers' eyes, tore them up the middle and limb by limb—"exactly," to use the poor woman's own expression, "as you tear up a fowl that is to be cooked with pillau." Remember, all this was done, not in the heat of fighting, but deliberately, in cold blood.

This awful work is not yet ended. It may be suppressed for a time, but the harlot power must drink from "the cup which she hath filled" for the saints of God. Her days of retribution are at hand. Earth's closing scenes are upon us. We are living in a solemn hour!

The Pope's Troubles.

He who claims to be Christ's vicegerent on earth, the representative of "the mother of harlots," finds it very difficult to control the people as he could in former times. The eyes of his subjects are so far opened as never to be closed again to the oppression and misrule of the Vatican Pontiff. His position is now a most critical one. A large share of Italy has already broken away from his domineering power, and are resolved on "liberty or death." His days are numbered, and his end will be terrible. He has a bitter cup to drink yet. Already, he begins to sip a little, but the last draught will send him to perdition.

"The most Rev. Archbishop of New York" delivered a sermon on the first Sabbath in July, urging all the Catholics of his diocese to send pecuniary aid to Pope Pius IX., to assist him "at this critical moment of his trials and afflictions." The Archbishop goes on to say:—

"An American Prelate lately returned from Rome intimates that this aid cannot reach the Holy Father too soon. He has to sustain, as yet, the expenses of the Papal Government, whilst the resources, to a great extent, have been cut off. It has even been intimated that if things go on as they are now, for any prolonged period, the Pope will not have the means to supply the wants of his household. In the meantime let us not cease to pray to Almighty God, invoking His interposition in favor of the Church which, to human view, is threatened with unspeakable disasters."

Circus Ministers.

We clip the following from one of our exchanges:

"The clergy of this city appear to be getting a little liberal. Sands' Circus recently exhibited here, and among the visitors were a number of the Orthodox clergy. I observed in the afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Dimmick, D. D., the oldest Orthodox clergyman now settled in this city. He showed his pleasure at the performance by clapping his hands, and other demonstrations, equal to any one in the audience. As an offset, in the evening, Rev. Mr. Campbell preached a sermon, in which he said that all who went to the circus were on the road to hell.

Dr. Dimmick also recently attended an exhibition of a magician at the City Hall. He even went on the stage and shook the bag wherein eggs were produced in such profusion, and seemed surprised at the tricks of the operator."

Correspondence.

From Benj. Spaulding.

Bro. Grant:—Since my last writing, three have been baptized, and several others are ready. The good work at Salmon Brook Plantation goes on. We have visited No. 12 a second time, and found the seed had taken root, and begun to increase. Things looked very encouraging for Bible doctrine to flourish there. We found good friends, homes, brethren, sisters, fathers and mothers in that newly settled township. Praised be the Lord. The promise still proves true; and godliness has the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come.

We have now been on a visit to Fort Fairfield, where the Lord stood by us, and gave us access to the minds of the people. We commenced under discouraging circumstances, but the way was opened. After giving them four lectures, we left, feeling that good was done, that seed was sown, which would produce a harvest. In Fort Fairfield we had none to sympathize with us in our Bible views. We went one day into the province of New Brunswick, had one lecture, but found that Sectarianism had reared her head even in the Queen's dominions. As we left, we overheard one man say, "That is just what I believe." Thank God for that. That is the way we have to do; going every where, meeting all kinds of folks, and all kinds of views.

The Lord is showing himself strong in behalf of his truth in Aroostook; the enemy is full of wrath, and stimulates his agents; and some of the professed ministers act as his agents in stirring up the people, crying out, "Men of Israel, help! This is the man who teaches all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place."

Like Demetrius, they have called together workmen of like occupation, and said, "Sirs, you know that by this craft we have our wealth; moreover, you see and hear that not alone in Ephesus, but that also throughout almost the whole country, this Spaulding and Corliss have turned away much people from our churches, saying, 'Man has no immortality until he gets it through Jesus, at the resurrection of the dead'; and that 'the wicked will be burned up root and branch.' So our doctrine of the Church is set at naught, and our Craft is in danger." We have many proofs of this. Yesterday I visited Letter C. I had been there before and given them one lecture, and made an appointment for another. On arriving to fill the appointment, I found only about ten, and they were all wild, care-for-nothing young men, who came for sport, as it appears. Probably their plans were laid to have a real high time. I saw the character of my hearers. I cast myself upon the Lord, leaned upon his arm, and went forward in my duty. The Restitution was the subject. When through, one of these young men inquired, what was meant by the angel's standing, one foot on the sea, and the other on the land, and swearing, etc., etc.; and before I could answer, another asked a question equally foreign to the subject. While trying to answer that, another question out of time and place was asked, and then another, until about all had asked questions, evidently to puzzle me. But I kept composed, and continued to answer their questions, until they all left me alone. I went on my way rejoicing that I was counted worthy to suffer shame for the love I bear the name of Jesus.

Found a good home at Bro. Parsons. Thank the Lord for pilgrim homes! Bro. P. and wife received us, and supplied our wants with christian hospitality. The Lord bless them, and make them living epistles in Letter C. They are alone in the midst of a crooked and sectarian people. Pray for them and us; we need the prayers of all the church.

Fort Fairfield, Me.

From Elder R. E. Ladd.

Dear Crisis:—I admire the tone of Bro. Burnham's article in a late number of the Crisis relative to the Wilbraham Campmeeting, and hope it will find a response in many a heart. I look forward to that assembling of the servants of God with more than usual interest and hope.

The great and glorious truths pertaining to the "kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" never were so precious and full of comfort to the weary pilgrims on their way to the kingdom, as they are now. We are nearing harbor, brethren; the battle is almost over, the victory well nigh won. Let us come up together once more to greet each other with words of comfort and acts of love. If any have "hobbies," or "vain janglings," it would be better to stay at home and nurse them in quiet seclusion. But let him that hath the word of the Lord, present it in meekness of wisdom and humility of mind. What we need at the present time more than anything, or all things else, is a real baptism from above, that shall make us feel our impotence, and cause us to hide under the shadow of the Almighty, and take shelter in the "Rock of ages." Great and marvelous events are pending, and may burst forth upon the earth at any time. No student of prophecy can fail to see that the grand scenes indicated therein, as immediately preceding Messiah's return and triumphant reign, are upon us. Verily, "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh," should thrill every christian heart with joy, and alarm every sinner with fear and trembling, now, as never before.

Come! ye servants of the living God; scour up your armor which has rusted and corroded for lack of use; buckle it on anew, and enter the battle-field against thy common foe. Come, prepared to "feed the flock of God" with the "milk of the word," or with the "strong meat," as they may require. Come and give the "reason of your hope," that those without may be convinced. Come! preach "Christ the coming conqueror," as well as the "crucified of Calvary"—the only source of life for the world; the only hope of rest and peace for the world; the only effectual bruiser of Satan in the world.

Let us resolve, in the strength of "Christ our Life," that we will go to the campmeeting to do more for God; to rescue perishing sinners from impending destruction, than we have ever before done. If we cannot all preach there, we can all pray for those that do preach, that the word may take effect. Get ready to work before you get to the ground. So much time is spent in preparing to labor at campmeeting, that much is lost. What we need, to strike effectual blows for the cause of God, is to "have on the whole armor" at the beginning of the meeting.

And now, my brethren, "if thy heart is right, as my heart is with thy heart, then give me thy hand," and by the grace of God we will form a cordon of strength that no earthly power can resist.

I hope to see a host at that meeting, which, as suggested by Bro. B., may be the last one on earth for us; and trust that the great, practical questions of "Life only in Christ," the "Resurrection," the "restitution of the earth," the "inheritance of the saints," and the destiny of the finally impenitent, with the experimental themes of the work and witness of the Holy Spirit holiness of heart and life, and a present preparation to meet the Lord, will be faithfully and fearlessly pressed upon the minds of the people; and may the blessing of God attend the meeting as we have never before seen it. Oh, for faith and power in prayer!

Springfield, Mass.

From Eld. W. Sheldon.

Bro. Grant:—Our grove meetings are now numbered with the things that were. I had thought of writing you a full account of each meeting, but can only stop at present to give some items.

1. The meeting held at Springville, commencing on the 1st of June. The following ministering brethren were in attendance, viz: G. W. Turner, S. K. Gibson, P. S. W. Deyo, and the writer. On Sunday one was baptized by Bro. Turner.

2. On the 7th of June we commenced our meeting at Trenton. The following preachers were in attendance: G. W. Turner, P. S. W. Deyo, G. W. Barnes, and the writer. Preaching produced an impression. Saints were comforted. On Sunday I led six happy souls down into the water. In a week from that day Bro. Turner led two more to their baptismal graves, and five more intend to follow the same example, near by, in a few days. Bro. Turner is doing good.

3. The Fairfield meeting commenced on the 15th. It was attended by the following preachers besides the writer: C. W. Smith, P. S. W. Deyo, G. W Barnes, and W. B. Putnam. Several loads of friends came about two hundred miles to attend this meeting. Bro. W. B. Putnam was ordained at this meeting.

4. On the 22d of June we commenced our meeting at West Point. The same ministers that were at Fairfield attended this meeting. Here I baptised three on Sunday, and organized a church. Also Bro. C. W. Smith was here ordained to the work of the ministry. After the close of the meeting, I had the pleasure of holding a three days' discussion with a Methodist minister, upon the same ground, on the following question: "Do the scriptures teach the immortality of the human soul?" This advanced the cause of truth.

5. On the 29th of June we commenced our meeting in Kingston. Brn. Deyo and Smith were present. At the close of this meeting about one hundred gave us the parting hand. The above meetings were well attended, and the word of truth was preached with success by the ministering brethren who attended. Our prayer meetings were very good. At each meeting a love feast preceded the preaching on Sunday morning; and the Lord's supper was eaten around the table, in apostolic style, at the close of the evening's sermon. Truly, these were solemn seasons, both to saint and sinner.

This brief sketch comes far short of doing justice to these interesting meetings. The cause has been advanced by them. Many isolated ones were in attendance who are anxious to have the word preached in their vicinity. A door is opening all around.

Springville, Wis.

From L. N. C.

It is but a short time since I resolved to leave those things that I once had pleasure in, whose end is death, and that I would fight my way through, and by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality, and receive the free gift of God—eternal life. This life is in his Son. I have found it far better to seek pleasure in serving Jesus than the world, and I can now look forward to that day, and hail with joy the soon coming King. Brethren, let us prove faithful; keep ourselves pure and unspotted from the world, and abound in the work of the Lord, insomuch as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. Let us prove by our daily walk and conversation that we look for and love the appearing of our Lord.

Little children, abide in him; that when he shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.

From Jas. B. Fitch.

Bro. Grant:—I should like to say to the brethren scattered abroad, that I am preaching the word as I have opportunity, which is mostly confined to the Sabbath, in consequence of having a family to support and debts to be paid. I have read of the Wilbraham meeting and intend to be there; as I have to go to Boston once a year on business, I manage to go at the time of the meeting. It is a feast to meet with so many who love the gospel of the kingdom.

In some places I have visited lately, prejudice to truth is giving way. I have calls from every quarter to go and preach the word; but we must provide for our house, and, if possible, owe no man anything.

Is there not some good brother, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, who is not burdened with the cares of this life, who can return with me from the meeting, and tarry a few months and preach, publicly and from house to house? The truth is much opposed here by the different denominations. In some cases the Lord has caused the wrath of man to praise him.

Brethren and sisters, suffer the word of exhortation. Our Wilbraham meeting is attended with labor and expense. Let us remember that time and money both are precious, and we shall all soon give an account how we have improved them. Let us remember that our influence is good or bad as we move along. Let us take a new start, and cultivate the fruits of the Spirit more than we ever have done.

Wolfville, N. S.

From P. Axe.

Dear Brethren in the Lord.—The soon coming of the Messiah to set up his everlasting kingdom, with life only through Christ, with its kindred doctrines, lies as near my heart as ever. There are three more in this place who are interested, but we hear no sermons, only read what comes in the Crisis, with some other works. We are perishing for the word of life. Give us a call. I am heartily tired of hearing about going to heaven at death, and eternal misery. We want the pure word of truth.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

The Paris (July 10th) correspondent of the Liverpool Times says "The latest report circulated here respecting Garibaldi is, that he quitted Palermo at the head of 10,000 volunteers for the purpose, in all likelihood, of making a descent upon the Neapolitan provinces on the continent. Some of the journals say that he has gone to attack Messina, but this report is supposed to be merely a blind to disguise his real intentions.

AUSTRIA.

It is stated that the agitation in Hungary is increasing, and that the Austrian Government has been obliged to send troops into the comitat of Gomor to put down disturbances.

FRANCE.

M. Outrey, the French Consul at Damascus, who left Paris on Saturday to return to his post, received precise instructions previous to his departure to concert measures with the naval officer commanding the ships of war on the coast of Syria to repress by force, it necessary, the attacks made by the Turks on the Christians The Emperor is determined to put an end to the half measures which have hitherto been adopted, and to act with vigor.

THE SYRIAN TROUBLES.

Beyrout, June 11th. The attack of the Druses on the Christians at Damascus commenced on the evening of the 9th, when several men were killed, and many women carried off for harems. The French, Russian and Greek Consuls took refuge in the house of Abdel Kader.

The attitude of the Turkish authorities was indecisive, and rather injurious than useful to the Christians. Three thousand Turkish soldiers arrived to-day, and the fears of the Christians are redoubled.

A dispatch of the 1st of July says it had been ascertained that the Druses had burnt and pillaged 151 villages since the 29th of May, and that from 7500 to 8000 Christian inhabitants of Lebanon, many of whom were wealthy men, are homeless beggars, depending on charity for their daily bread It is believed seven or eight thousand Christians have been butchered in cold blood.

Great agitation prevailed at Aleppo and at Killis city.

Since the 11th no other incident has taken place. The state of things continue to be very grave. The Christians were leaving the interior of the country and emigrating toward the coasts, in order to be under the protection of the European vessels Thirty-two thousand persons had already arrived at Beyrout and Sidon

ITEMS.

Garibaldi and the Continental Press.—It is amusing to compare the various epithets applied to Garibaldi by the foreign journals We take the following as specimens.

Naples Gazette, (official) The monster in human shape, Garibaldi by name, has had the audacity to attack, at the head of a band of murderers, the dominions of His Majesty the King of Naples. It is needless to add that measures are taken by the Government to capture him, when he will be justly punished for his rash and lawless undertaking.

Roman Gazette, (official) The Antichrist, for it is impossible to give a person possessed of the devil any other appellation, has dared to approach the coast of Sicily, and effected a landing, with the assistance of the godless and heretic English

Munich Volksblatt. The bandit Garibaldi is about to continue his wicked and bloody trade of human murderer in the happy and peaceful island of Sicily, but the Divine vengeance will not fail to overtake him speedily.

Vienna Gazette, (official.) The professional rebel hopes to continue his former calling in Sicily, but he will be grievously disappointed, and his disgraceful attempt frustrated by the courage and loyalty of the brave troops of the King of the Two Sicilies.

Leipzig Times. The pirate Garibaldi is of course acting by the orders of the King of Sardinia.

Berlin Kreutz Zeitung, (Reactionary.) The adventurer Garibaldi will soon find that his lawless career has come to an untimely end.

Cassel Zeitung. The parvenu Garibaldi, not content with having kindled the flames of revolution in his own country, is now about to raise the standard of revolt in the hitherto happy kingdom of Naples.

Hamburg Papers. Gen. Garibaldi is steadily advancing in his bold and dangerous career.

Gazette of Bologna. The heroic son of Italy, whose name no true Italian can pronounce without the most profound admiration and enthusiasm, is now engaged in the most important campaign of his eventful life.

Florence Gazette. The redeemer of Italy is about to attack the stronghold of tyranny. Every true Italian heart beats with hope for the success of his sublime undertaking.

Journal of Milan. The Genius of Italy has at length drawn his sword, and thrown away the scabbard to rescue his country from the last remnant of tyranny.

Turin Gazette, (official.) The Archangel Gabriel has appeared in human shape on earth in the person of Garibaldi, to scatter the last enemies of Indian liberty, and bring them to the condign punishment they deserve.

Naples Gazette, (latest number.) The Commander-in-Chief of the King's troops in Sicily has signed a capitulation with His Excellency Gen. Garibaldi at Palermo.

Return of the Jews to Palestine.—To the student of the Bible and church history there are few current subjects of more absorbing interest or of deeper significance than the events now almost daily transpiring which point to the repossession by the Jews of their own land. The tide of progress, after a lapse of centuries, may be said to have fairly turned in that direction, and the prayer long offered by that chosen but now scattered people, that "Judah may be saved and Israel dwell 'securely, and that the Redeemer may come to Zion," is undoubtedly hastening to fulfillment. The Sultan of Turkey is encouraging Jewish emigration to Palestine, and is offering to sell them as much land as they choose to buy, and it is said has even expressed his willingness to dispose of the Mosque of Omar to them, which, it will be recollected, stands upon the very site of the Jewish Temple on Mount Moriah. This mosque is one of the Mohammedans' most celebrated shrines, being scarcely inferior in national importance to those of Mecca and Medina. Politicians and statesmen look upon these indications as a legitimate consequence of the liberalising influence of Mohammedan intercourse with Christians, and so they may be; but to the reader of the yet unfulfilled pages of Revelation they also point to what, as it respects the Jewish nation, "prophets and kings" have long waited for, "but died without the sight." That the mosque of Omar should be in a fair way of passing into the hands of the people to whose fathers the site on which it stands was once given in an everlasting covenant, is what no reader of secular history, fifty years ago, could even have dreamed would ever come to pass Some of the hills around Jerusalem have already become Jewish property, and it is by no means improbable that some of the present generation will see the entire city of Jerusalem again in the hands of its ancient owners That mighty revolution will follow in the wake of such an event, is probably as certain as that the Jews will return at all; at all events, affairs in that immediate region of the East must ere long become an engrossing theme among the nations of the earth.—Philad Press

The Law of Periodicals.

1st. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered as wishing to continue their subscriptions

2d. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their periodicals, the publishers may continue to send them until all arrearages are paid.

3d If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their periodicals from the office to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled the bill and ordered them discontinued.

4th. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the papers are sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

GENERAL CAMPMEETING at Wilbraham, Mass.

Providence permitting, a general campmeeting will commence at Wilbraham, on the old ground upon the hill, Monday, Aug. 20th, and continue one week.

This meeting is pleasantly located in a neighborhood noted for sustaining good order, and for acts of kindness towards those who assemble there from year to year to worship the God of our fathers We anticipate a large gathering of the Lord's dear children, and that much good will be accomplished Those who were present last year will remember that the great object of the meeting was for the salvation of sinners, and the comfort of saints, and that the effort was greatly blessed We hope that our brethren and sisters will come again this year, strong in the Lord, and bring their unconverted children and neighbors for the purpose of persuading them to be christians.

All who believe in Christ as our Savior, and are willing to labor for the salvation of sinners, are invited to take part in the meetings. We would earnestly request all to make this meeting a subject of special prayer, that many wanderers may be reclaimed, the saints greatly strengthened, and the name of the Lord magnified among the people.

Ample accommodations will be provided for board and horse keeping. Board at 50 cents per day; or one shilling per meal for breakfast and supper, and 25 cents for dinner. The fare is reduced to half price on the Western R. R, which will be $2.50 from Boston, for both ways.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R R Co. by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have free return passes by application to Geo T. Adams, 167 Hanover street, Boston, Mass., when they purchase their Western tickets for the camp ground Those coming from Albany will pay full fare to the camp ground, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee Those coming from North Adams, Pittsfield, and intermediate places, also from Worcester and intermediate stations, will call for campmeeting tickets at the ticket offices.

Those coming on the Connecticut River R R. from South Vernon, Vt., and intermediate stations, will pay full fare, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee.

N. B. All who wish to take the cars from Boston for the campmeeting, should remember that they can obtain their tickets only at Geo. T. Adams', 167 Hanover Street, where they may be obtained any day during the meeting. Cars leave the depot in Beach street at 6 o'clock, A. M. and 1 1-2 P. M.

Full particulars of arrangements with other R. R. Companies will be given in due season.

R. E. Ladd, Hiram Munger, Geo. T. Adams, } Committee of Arrangements.

Quarterly Meeting.

The first Quarterly meeting of the General Association of the Church of God, in Western N. Y., will be held at East Springwater, commencing Friday evening, August 24th, and continue over the following Sunday. We have a beautiful grove which will be fitted for the meeting on Sunday.

A general invitation to ministers and laymen is hereby given. We hope to have a general gathering of the lovers of Bible truth from the surrounding country at this meeting.

B. M. Morris, A. L. Hovey, Elias Westcott, } Committee of Arrangements.
T. G. Newman, Secretary.

Boarding Notice.

After consultation with many of our preaching and lay brethren, we have thought it advisable not to issue free board tickets at the boarding tent this year. 1. Because it is not right that the whole amount of this burden should fall on us. 2. Because it opens a door for imposition to be practised by a plea of poverty from some who are able and ought to pay for their board. The preachers who are accredited among the brethren where they are known, and those that are really poor that are with us, will be boarded, and a special collection will be taken up for the purpose of giving all an opportunity of sharing in this expense. This seems to us to be just and right; and as we propose to place the price of board at 50 cts. per day, or at one shilling for breakfast and supper and 25 cts. for dinner, it will give a margin for this collection to those that board at the public table as well as others. It is our intention to make our friends, who rely on us to supply their wants, as comfortable as possible, and shall make an additional outlay to secure this end. But shall, after all we can do, have to ask the forbearance and charitable feelings of brethren towards us even with our best endeavors. By God's blessing and aid we will do as near right as we can, and leave it all with Him whom we love and serve, and to the judgment of the brethren.

Hiram Munger
Randl E. Ladd.

English Bibles.

We would call the attention of our friends to the fine assortment of English Bibles which we have imported, ranging in price from $1 00 to $2 50, exclusive of postage. It is a rare chance for those in want of the precious book, to send for them now to this office, where they can have them in Morocco, Roan or colored calf binding, with marginal or reference between the verses. We shall have a goodly assortment at the Wilbraham campmeeting, if the Lord will.

Notice.

The fourth session of the Shell Rock Christian Quarterly Conference will be held at New Hartford, Butler Co., Iowa, commencing Aug 24th, to continue over the Lord's day. Call on Eld Castle Churchill. We look for a general attendance.

P. S. W. Deyo.

Campmeeting.

The Westford campmeeting is to commence on Tuesday, Aug 28th, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a very pleasant location, near the depot, about eight miles from Lowell, on the Stony Brook Railroad. We think that tickets from Boston and back will be half price, as last year,—one dollar. This meeting will not interfere with the meeting at Wilbraham, being one week after. Those who can, and choose so to do, may attend both. We hope that all who can will make it duty as well as a privilege to be at this meeting We doubt not the arrangement and management of the meeting on the part of the committee will be perfectly satisfactory, as they were last year The meeting will be conducted on free christian principles. Come then, one and all, with the heart full of the love of Jesus and his word, with a mind to be good, do good, and get good, and so enjoy that liberality with which those are blessed who enjoy the freedom of the gospel.

J S White.

Quarterly Conference.

The next session of the Western Central Quarterly Conference in Maine will commence Thursday, Aug. 23d, at 1 o'clock, P M, in Rome Town House, and continue over the Sabbath. Will all the ministers, and as many others as can, come to the work, and come in the work, praying for God's blessing upon the people We want to see sinners converted, and God's word to run among the christians. Call on Brn. David Watson, Fletcher, Blaisdell, Martin, etc

H B Savey, Chairman.

Richmond, Me, July 25th, 1860.

Campmeeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a campmeeting in Levant, Me., commencing Sept 17th and continue one week.

The cause of truth demands that the church should make an effort to give new impetus to the cause, by a general gathering of the brethren and sisters to comfort and strengthen one another with the words of truth. We expect this meeting will result in good to the church and exert a salutary influence upon community The people want to hear the reasons of our hope. Let all come that can. Begin now to plan your business so that you can come Begin to pray about it, talk about it, and get your tents ready for the camp. Above all, do not forget that you will need on the armor, so that you may be ready for the work as soon as you get on the field of battle Brethren, make your business bend to this meeting. Get your Lamb, and come up to sacrifice to the Lord If you have not a lamb, take a kid, or a pair of doves, only let your heart be in the work and God will bless you

J Hemenway, for the brethren.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping We shall expect those preachers present that feel sent Further particulars hereafter.

D. Cogswell, M. Gosson, L. Mills, } Committee

Notice.

A grove meeting will be held in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Edenboro, Erie Co, Pa, August 25th, at 1 1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Oncley, Evangelist.

☞ Providence permitting, there will be a grove meeting at Plymouth Hollow, Ct., Sunday, Aug. 12th.

Evenings of 13th, 14th and 15th, where Bro. Canfield may appoint.

H. Pratt.

Grove Meeting.

If the Lord permit, there will be a grove meeting in Morris, Ct, commencing Thursday, Aug 16th, and continuing over the following Sunday. Eld. H. Pratt is expected to attend, with such preachers and laborers as the Lord may send. We shall have one or more tents, and accommodations, as far as practicable, for brethren from abroad. Come brethren, come one, come all, and let us have a heavenly sitting together, whilst the burden of our prayers may be for the edification and upbuilding of the church in the most holy faith, and for the enlightening of the people and the salvation of sinners.

We hope for a general gathering from the surrounding vicinity, and for a profitable meeting. Let such as can, bring blankets and provisions, prepared for a safe dwelling and sleeping in the woods.

The meeting will be in the vicinity of the Lake, near Footville, ten miles west of Plymouth Hollow depot, and six miles from Litchfield Centre. T. S. Canfield,

In behalf of the brethren.

Savoy Campmeeting.

This meeting will commence Aug. 27th, and continue one week. The object of this meeting is to persuade men to accept of the gospel, and be saved in the kingdom of God. Then come, brethren and sisters, one and all, in the spirit of labor and love, and let us have a feast of fat things on the mountain top. Efficient laborers in the gospel will be present to preach the word of life. The committee wish to say, that no pains will be spared in trying to supply the wants of the brethren and public generally; and are confident from last year's experience that we can meet them more acceptably. Board and horse keeping will be furnished on reasonable terms.

E. M'Cullock, Rufus Starks, J. E. Healy, } Committee.

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Corliss, Lowell; E. Heath, Lynn; S. Ayers, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work

For the Crisis.

Look to Jesus.

Dream not life's sunny hours
Will always stay;
Hope not for bliss so bright
'T will ne'er decay;
Clouds may obscure the sun
Ere half his race is run,
And sorrows may be thine
At life's noonday.

Earth's brightest honors fail,
Like Autumn flowers;
The loved and beautiful
Stay their brief hours;
Our fondest dreams of bliss,
Love, joy, and happiness,
Depart with eager haste
Beyond our powers.

Such are all earthly joys,
Transient, tho' bright;
Health, wealth, and friends may fail
Ere morrow's night.
Turn then from earth away,—
Turn from the meteor's ray
To yon pure orb of day,—
Jesus, our light.

With such a sun and shield,
With such a guide,
O'er life's tempestuous sea
Thy bark shall ride.
Secure from every blast,
Triumphant with the blest,
On Zion's hill at last
Thou shalt abide!

M. J. Mason.

For the Crisis.

A Brief Dialogue with a Friend on the Immortality of the Wicked.

Mercy.—Friend, you know the Bible teaches that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, but do you know that it as clearly teaches the immortality of the wicked? If not, why do you not duly discriminate in your creed between such questions?

Friend.—I did not think of that. Yet I think the immortality of the wicked is quite clearly taught in the Scriptures.

M.—Do you know of one text that positively says the ungodly will eternally exist in torment?

F.—(After a long pause.) In Rev. 20, it is positively said that the devil "shall be tormented day and night forever and ever."

M.—Is that your only passage?

F.—I must in all humility acknowledge that it is. I knew not the weakness of my cause till I considered your question.

M.—Do you know of one text, even, that plainly declares that the devil's future state is the only Bible rule for determining the future condition of the ungodly among men?

F.—I do not.

M.—Then you have no positive texts to prove the endless torment of the wicked?

F.—None. I must acknowledge that if it is proved at all, it must be proved by inference.

M.—You will also admit that if the proof of the devil's eternal torment is clearly shown to also rest on inference, then the inferential proof regarding the wicked must be below the first class of such kind of proof; inasmuch as it is already less positive than the first.

F.—Certainly.

M.—"That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil." Heb. 2: 14. You will admit that this is as strong a passage as yours in Rev. 20. Or, at least, that one [illegible] like it will make it equal. "It (or [illegible] the margin reads, he) shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Gen. 3: 15. If the bruising of Christ's heel was death to him for a time, what less than eternal death must be the bruise to Satan's head?

F.—I will admit the equality of the case.

M.—Well, now we have no proof, or if any, none except inferential, that the devil will be tormented eternally. If, therefore, I can adduce another of my plain or positive texts, the inference is in my favor till you can offset it by producing another positive text on your side.

F.—Your conclusion is logical and consistent.

M.—"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." 1 John 3: 8. The devil is a work of himself, therefore he is to be destroyed. Thus I have the balance of positive proof on my side, and of course such must be the case concerning the inferential. And it must be much more so in regard to the wicked among men, for laying aside our proposition, the Scriptures abound in positive declarations that the wicked will be destroyed, while there is not one positive text that they shall forever exist.

F.—To be honest, I must also admit that the first text (Gen.) is enough to balance the text in Rev. 20, therefore your position is abundantly sustained.

M.—Thank you. I was fearful of claiming all my right, lest it might be too strong meat for you. The new translation makes the [illegible] in Rev. 20 to be, "Unto the age of ages;" and our present translation positively speaks of a new state of things to follow that under consideration. See ch. 20: 11–15 and 21: 1–5. P.

☞ There have been times when trouble came upon you like mist upon the sea; when to be still was peril, and to go back [illegible] peril; and has not Christ come to you [illegible] such times, if not in vision, yet with ex[illegible] grace, and said to your troubled [illegible] be still? A Desideratum.—No. 4.

BY F. R. M.

The want we speak of is seen in the workings of the church; but evidently there is something to be looked to further than what is seen by a superficial looking at the church as a body. The old adage, "Like priest like people," is essentially true today. And, doubtless, the defects of which we speak may be traced to those upon whom has devolved the forming and putting in motion of our ecclesiastical machinery. No religious body, of modern origin, fails to give the most unmistakable indications of the type of mind of its originators or constituent members, e. g: if those first and foremost are evangelical, the body will probably be evangelical. If those taking lead are defective in doctrine, discipline, or policy; those joining themselves to them will be, for the most part, defective in the same manner.

Hence upon those who are teachers devolves the work of correcting errors—if that be possible—and of leading on the body to perfection. To undertake this, it at once becomes evident that a tolerable knowledge of the things with which he has to do, is exceedingly desirable on the part of such as are teachers. The possession of a tolerable understanding of the fall of man—the fact of a plan of redemption through Jesus Christ—the doctrine of a resurrection and day of judgment—and of future rewards and punishments, constitute the basis of all the knowledge needful to the exercise of his office. But who will say this is all? Other and all doctrines growing out of or interlinked with these, must be understood and taught. Nor will it answer the ends demanded to assert these doctrines dogmatically, though found in revelation: the practical character of the doctrine taught must be enforced. Nor will this suffice; it must be shown that the basis of this practical character exists in a positive want—a want intrinsically good of itself. Thus much in general.

Did the minister of the New Testament have only to instruct a collection of waiting, willing minds, thirsting for the truth, the task would be far less than under present circumstances. But, as things now exist, to know how most effectually to teach the truth is only second to knowing the truth itself. However quiet he may naturally be, if he will stand in defence of the truth he must assume to a degree the character of a controversialist. And to meet and cope with the prevailing errors, he must inform himself upon the character of the prevailing theology,—whether called systematic theology, dogmatic, pastoral, or polemic. He must understand and form to himself an opinion, which he can defend, relative to the doctrines of human depravity, the nature of moral evil, the nature and extent of the Atonement, the sovereignty of God, and the moral agency of man—with the nature and intent of revelation; the character and agency of the Holy Spirit, as seen in the doctrines of justification, sanctification and redemption. And to this may be added, a knowledge of the laws of language, the rules of Biblical exegesis, Homiletics, Rhetoric, Logic, etc., etc., none of which can be neglected without a palpable want appearing to the eye of an intelligent and discerning public.

The time has gone past for any teacher of religious doctrines to rest any where short of the best accomplishments he can possibly avail himself of. "He must study to show himself a workman." He must be clothed with the whole armor of God—cap-a-pie.

Twilight Musings.

How sweet this heavenly twilight hour! What a benign feeling of repose pervades the soul as we view the sun setting in all its beauteous splendor behind the western hills; leaving the sky tinged with its golden, scarlet, and white fleecy clouds of mist; casting the same blushing, golden tints on the face of nature, then retiring in all the loveliness of modest beauty,—not that dazzling, glaring splendor which surrounds the orb at noonday; but with that modest grace which time blends with age. The sun's rising may be clear and brilliant, as it courses its pathway in the sky, until it reaches the meridian; then, as it declines, and we feel the cool, genial influence of its sinking rays, our thoughts assume a milder form, and we feel at rest in unison with nature.

The birds, having trilled their evening vesper song, have retired to their downy beds, their heads nestled cozily beneath their feathery wings; dreaming, perhaps, of flowery fields and airy flights. The tiny flowers fold their fairy vestments more closely around their drooping forms, and seemingly go to sleep as night's dewy offering is being showered upon them. The herds come lowing in with all the self-satisfaction of gratified ambition: how happy! —with all their limited wants supplied, having no cares for the morrow, they enjoy a perfect repose so unlike man.

The distant fields and forests, clad in the beautiful livery of spring, are fading from my sight in the gathering gloom of night. The stars—heaven's brilliant gems—one by one, twinkle through the dark [illegible] above, and hang trembling there. The western flood of golden light has receded from our view; the last sinking rays of sunset are reflected from the eastern sky, as the full-orbed moon arises, shedding a halo of subdued light over sleeping nature.

How memories' bells tinkle in this calm, heavenly twilight hour, recalling again those stray sunbeams from away down in the deep glen of our hearts, which we have ever cherished since life's spring-time as an evergreen oasis in life's dreary desert, where we can ever cull the rose-tinted flowers which memory has planted there! Time fails to obliterate the indelible impress of those sunny nooks. Now, as I muse in the gathering gloom, I recall my childhood's happy home and scenes, where my days of innocence were passed so free from care—those gleesome, happy days, when, like the bird of spring, I caroled the day away only to commence my rejoicings anew with the morrow. Where are the playmates of my childhood? Are they yet climbing life's rugged pathway? Do they find more thistles and thorns, as they journey on, than breath of rose-tinted flowers, which are wafted by the gentle breeze of contentment from high hopes of a better hereafter? Some have fallen asleep in the vigor of youth, and are laid away in death to await the resurrection morn. Some are seeking fame and distinction, while others are grovelling in the lowest depths of degradation. Such is life since the world was, and ever will be.

There flits a shadow around them which was not there when, long years ago, we played together. Pain, sorrow, disappointment, and hopes deferred, have left a shadow on each brow. Twilight has grown into dreary night; its dark mantle enshrouds us in gloom. When the twilight shades of death gather around, may the bright star of hope and peace shed their genial rays on our pathway to a better world, where twilight and night never come. Annie.

Amboy, Ill.

The Condition of Affairs in Utah, described by a Bostonian.

Camp Floyd, June 12th, 1860.

"All of the army have left here except about two hundred, all told—not enough to protect the arms, ammunition, stores, etc., large quantities of which and a large sum of money remain here. I fear that the temptation is too great to be resisted by the baser portion of Mormons to incite some two or three thousand Indians to join them, and, all disguised as Indians, some dark night surprise this little army, and attempt to kill every one belonging to it, and every other person in this vicinity, for the money and plunder they would hope to obtain.

I would like to give you a chapter on Mormonism. But if I begin with particulars I fear that I should never find an end, and the most of which, I presume, have already been published—and if repeated, so very improbable do they seem to be, that they will scarcely be believed—so I judge from the course pursued by our government at Washington, in relation to affairs here. The army sent here served to check open rebellion; further than this, it has done very little good. It has served to feed the Mormons, and to strengthen them in their stronghold. But it has never had any power — not enough even to protect itself; for when one of its own officers is shot down and killed by a Mormon, while walking quietly and peaceably with others in the street, in open day, and in presence of twenty witnesses, as was the case with Sergeant Pike, the army have no power to punish or try the assassin. This can only be done by the civil authorities, who are all Mormons; and the culprit being a Mormon also, cannot be tried, or if he is, 'tis only a mock trial. No Mormon jury can find him guilty. The numerous murders continued and do still continue to be perpetrated almost daily, and numerous persons have disappeared in an unaccountable manner. Every apostate Mormon—one who attempts to leave the country, and 'tis feared that he will expose their secret doings, or one carrying away property—all such persons are promptly so well 'cared for'—'that their souls may be saved' —that they are seldom seen afterward by the public, except their dead bodies happen to be discovered in the bottom of a river, lake, or some deep hole in the ground. Some persons, to be so 'cared for,' are too suspicious to be induced by any stratagem to leave their houses. To such persons a company of the 'Danites' is sent, who break into their houses in dead of night and dispatch them, 'that their souls may be saved,' leaving their dead bodies in the house; themselves suddenly disappearing for a time. If, by chance, one of their number, who feels that he has been deceived and cheated in joining them, is shrewd enough to get started, with his remaining effects, on the road leading out of the country before there is any suspicion of his leaving, he and his family are generally found murdered on the road, 'done by the Indians,' of course. These nefarious transactions have become so frequent and common, that some of the principal Mormons will talk about them somewhat freely, as matter of course, and finish by saying, very emphatically, 'they all fully deserved just what they got.' [illegible] their system to be, that they feel sure they can get rid of all persons in this way who are suspected of any intention to expose their secret doings, or who are in any manner obnoxious to them, or for the sake of their plunder only, without the least fear of any person whatever becoming legally liable for any crime. Witness the Mountain Meadows massacre, for instance, where one hundred and twenty innocent men, women and children were killed at one time, mostly in broad daylight, by the Mormons, aided by a few Indians, for the money, goods and chattels they were taking with them through to California. And many others like unto this, though on a smaller scale, that have been perpetrated before and since that at the Mountain Meadows, and never yet has one person been found guilty of any of these crimes and legally punished.

On my way here I stopped at Mountain Meadows, in company with Lewis L. Newell, who was carrying the United States mail at the time, and who stopped here the fourth day after the massacre, while all the bodies of those murdered were lying in the positions they were left by their murderers, except now and then one that was partly devoured by the wolves. The women and children all had their throats cut, and so had most of the men, after having been shot and stabbed, as it appeared, and all stripped entirely naked. This last was done by the Indians, who assisted in the murder. Several of these Indians we saw on our way here. They were very free to talk about this massacre, and to give the names of the Mormons concerned in it; said they promised them a share of the plunder. But all they ever received was the clothing that they stripped from the dead bodies—and said that the Mormons did not do right by them; they ought to have given them also blankets, 'shetcup,' (eatables,) etc. I examined the monument erected to their memory, and in memory of this nefarious transaction, by a company of our army, sent out three years after the massacre, and who gathered up all the human bones that could then be found, and deposited them in two graves—one being where the massacre commenced, and where the monument stands; the other where it ended, half a mile distant. The monument is built of small stones, conical shape, ten or twelve feet high, and out from the top of which projects a pillar of wood, supporting a cross, on which is painted — 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.' And this appears to be the 'platform' on which our government have ever acted in relation to the Mormons of Utah—leaving all the crimes committed by them to 'the Lord,' for him to punish or 'repay' with his 'vengeance.' But not so in regard to the Indians.

The commandant at 'Fort Tejon' being informed of the murders of Williams and Jackman, etc., sent and stationed a part of his command near the foot of the Mohave Valley (100 miles from S. B.,) from which scouting parties were constantly out until they caught the five Indians that killed Williams and Jackman, together with one squaw. Two of them had on Williams' clothing. They were taken to the 'Bitter Springs,' thirty-five miles from camp, a gallows erected, and all five hung thereon—three by the neck, and two, the principals, with the rope under their arms, and on the same spot where they committed the murder, were there kept, thus hanging, till they were dead. The squaw was dressed up and sent to the chief, to tell him what had been done, and to tell him to come at once into camp and make peace, or the 'Chief of the Merricats' would serve every 'Pah Ute,' as fast as he could catch them, in the same manner." J. H. D.

For the Crisis.

Brief Sayings.

The rich man who thinks the poor is too great a burden to him, giveth the murderer help to take their life. He excuseth himself till he hath not the gift to bear the infirmities of his own father. In many ways was he slain before he utterly gave up the ghost.

When the rich findeth it profitable to endure the poor, he maketh the effort to do it. But he cannot be trusted, for he is as wavering as proud society. His gift is no higher than this, therefore depend not upon him.

Hast thou time to habituate to regularity him whom thou hast killed by your complaining? or canst thou hope to learn him after he has learned the opposite? Thou mayest hope for some change, but hope not for too much, lest thou make thy own nakedness appear. Thy overmuch complaining of him has caused thee to be overmuch careful in the opposite way. How, then, canst thou expect much satisfaction from the little thou mayest expect of him. Let him alone, for it is better for him and thee, unless thou help what gift remaineth in thee by seeking the company that will help it rather than destroy it. If thou doeth this without wavering, then thou shalt rule with the good; but if not, thou shalt serve to thy dishonor; for verily God will not leave the oppressed to thy wavering dependence.

Flee from a flattering tongue, for it is death to thee: consider him thy friend who reproveth thee for thy faults, for, as precious ointment, so are the reproofs of a friend.

Think not that the poor are thy greatest enemies, lest thy folly destroy thee: for if thou destroyeth what gift thou hast remaining, thou destroyeth thyself. When thou praiseth the good, thou doest well; but do what thou so admirest, and thy mind shall become stronger and thy light brighter.

Borrow not the money of the poor, because he is poor. If he knoweth not how to use it, why shouldst thou also destroy thyself?

Thou sayest thy neighbor is unworthy to live in a quiet and comfortable way; wherefore? because thou would have some one except thyself bear the burden or be a scapegoat? Verily, thou thoughtest he was worthy of nothing better, but God shall make him the head of the corner.

Think not, oh wicked man, to escape the judgments of the Almighty, for thy sins will surely find you out.

For the multitude of thy followers thou shalt be taken; for what careth they for thee, when their appetite is settled?

Art thou a king? remember that kings shall give account as well as the serf.

Selections.

Man and his Savior.

A very old German author discourses thus tenderly of Christ:

"My soul is like a thirsty child, and I need his love and consolation for my refreshment; I am a wandering and lost sheep, and I need him as a good and faithful shepherd; my soul is like a frightened dove, pursued by a hawk, and I need his wounds for a refuge; I am a feeble vine, and I need his cross to lay hold of and wind myself about it; I am a sinner, and I need his righteousness; I am naked and bare, and need his holiness and innocence for a covering; I am in trouble and alarm, and I need his solace; I am ignorant, and I need his teaching; simple and foolish, and I need the guidance of his Holy Spirit.

In no situation, and at no time, can I do without him. Do I pray? he must prompt and intercede for me. Am I arraigned by Satan at the divine tribunal? he must be my advocate. Am I in affliction? he must be my helper. Am I persecuted by the world? he must defend me. When I am forsaken, he must be my support; when dying, my life; when mouldering in the grave, my resurrection. Well, then, I will rather part with all the world, and all that it contains, than with thee, my Savior, and, God be thanked, I know that thou too art not willing to do without me. Thou art rich, and I am poor; thou hast righteousness, and I sin; thou hast oil and wine, and I wounds; thou hast cordials and refreshments, and I hunger and thirst. Use me then, my Savior, for whatever purpose, and in whatever way, thou mayst require. Here is my poor heart, an empty vessel; fill it with thy grace. Here is my sinful and troubled soul: quicken and refresh it with thy love. Take my heart for thine abode; my mouth to spread the glory of thy name; my love, and all my powers, for the advancement of thy honor and the service of thy believing people. And never suffer the steadfastness and confidence of my faith to abate, that so at all times I may be enabled from the heart to say, 'Jesus needs me, and I him, and so we suit each other.'"

The Tenth Commandment.

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's."—Ex. 20: 17.

"Lust not in thought for aught thy neighbor hath,
Envy him not because his honors shine:
Rejoice in every joy that crowns his days,
And be content in heart with what is thine.
The lot of each the same wise God has given,
As for each best—for each, the way to heaven."

Two Blessings. "It's a great blessing to possess what one wishes," said some one to an ancient philosopher, who replied, "It's a greater blessing still, not to desire what one does not possess."

Contentment. A contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in this world; and if, in the present life his happiness arises from the subduing of his desires, it will arise in the next from the gratification of them.

Christian happiness for this world, is to want little and enjoy much: worldly happiness, to want much and enjoy little.

A laundress who was employed in the family of a gentleman of wealth, said to him with a sigh, "Only think, sir, how little money would make me happy!" "How little, madam?" "O, dear sir, one hundred dollars would make me perfectly happy." "If that is all you shall have it," and he immediately gave it to her. She looked at it with joy and thankfulness, but before the giver was out of hearing, exclaimed, "I wish I had said two hundred!"

When Fenelon's library was once on fire, "God be praised," he exclaimed, "that it is not the dwelling of some poor man."

God in all. That we may always be kept from a complaining spirit about what is, let us endeavor to see God's hand in all events; and that we may not be anxious as to what shall be, let us endeavor to see all events in God's hands. Then if we are rich, we shall have all in God.

If two angels, says John Newton, were sent down from heaven, the one to govern an empire, and the other to sweep the streets in it, they would be alike contented in their respective spheres and duties, and feel no inclination to change employments.

"When I was young, an old gentleman asked me, 'When is a person rich enough?' I replied, 'When he has a thousand pounds.' 'No.' 'When he has ten thousand pounds?' 'No.' 'A hundred thousand?' 'No.' I asked 'When then?' 'When he has a little more than he has got, and that is never.'" So it too often is. If we once allow the beginnings of a covetous spirit, our desires will always keep in advance of our possessions. He only is truly rich who is only contented.

Most sins begin at the eyes; by them, commonly, Satan creeps into the heart: that man can never be in safety [illegible] not covenant with his eyes.

An Italian bishop who had struggled through many difficulties [illegible] and been much opposed without ever manifesting impatience, being asked by a friend to communicate the secret of his being always so happy, replied, "It consists in a single thing, and that is, in making a right use of my eyes." His friend, in surprise, begged him to explain his meaning. "Most willingly," replied the bishop. "In whatsoever state I am, I first of all look up to heaven, and remember that my great business on earth is to get there. I then look down upon the earth and call to mind how small a space I shall soon fill in it. I then look abroad upon the world, and see what multitudes are, in all respects, less happy than myself. And thus I learn where true happiness is placed, where all my cares must end, and how little reason I ever have to murmur, or to be otherwise than thankful. And to live in this spirit, is to be always happy."—Ex.

Christian Forgiveness.

"For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you."—Matt. 6: 14.

"Jesus instructed men to pray—
"Forgive as we forgive;"
Thus those around shall learn the way
That they on earth should live.

Should we repeat this simple prayer
While there's one foe we hate,
And God shall answer then and there,
Most sad will be our fate.

In vain for mercy they shall cry,
Who have no mercy shown;
All their "professions" are a lie,
The Lord will them disown.

Like Christ we should the "enemy" love,
And seek to do him good;
'Tis thus we best to men should prove
That we're the "sons of God."

Thus light from heaven will round us shine,
And we to Jesus come;
No more, as erst, shall they incline
In paths of sin to roam

Thus men our christian life shall see,
And "God shall glorify,"
And we a holy people be,
Prepared to live and die.

Justitia.—From the Arcana.

Walk with Jesus.

To walk with Jesus in the minutiæ of life, is the only way to really walk with him. Oh! bring every thing to this test! Obediently ask Jesus, 'Wilt thou walk with me through this labor?' 'This visit? this social gathering?' 'Thou wast a most agreeable guest at the wedding in Cana. How far shall I go in these things? and in providing for my friends, as thou didst for thine?' 'Thou wilt show me just the limit. I would not fail of a social duty. I trust thee! thou wilt direct me by thy Spirit and Word. I would make religion lovely, and would win all to thee; I will, and do, trust thee to keep me.

But could you ask Jesus to walk with you through a novel? You are shocked at the very question. Then if you will walk through it, you must part with him. No man delights in the word of God and novels at the same time. No habitual novel-reader is even truly amiable. We defy the world to point out one, either male or female. No regular theatre-goer is amiable! not one! We defy contradiction and proof. Then will you tamper with these things, or with the low fiction of periodicals? No, no, beloved, you will not.—Beauty of Holiness.

The Trial of Our Faith.

Till tried, we know not how little faith we have. Faith must be put in the scales with something very near our hearts—yes, with what is nearest, for it must still be "more than these." The furnace must be heated in proportion to the increase of our faith. Is it because God willingly afflicts? No, but the trial of faith is to strengthen; faith consumes its dross. The trial is precious to God, more precious than gold, because it shall endure. It is his riches, his treasure—precious to him is it to have proof from his child. "Lord, thou knowest all things—thou knowest that I love thee." Is not every painful providence a messenger direct from the throne to our hearts—a ministering spirit sent forth to the heirs of salvation? It brings this message—Now I will put home the question in a way that shall be felt. Are we ready to say, I could have borne anything but this? Then let us remember that the greatest kindness God can do us is to heat the furnace to the utmost. He is in fact then saying, "Great is thy faith." Little furnaces are for little faith. And, therefore, is not this trial valuable even to earthly affection?

Do we not seize every opportunity to give proof to expressions of love? Oh! let us count the cost when we say, we believe. It a word of deep meaning in the dictionary of God.

Love Conquers.

We are glad to give a pleasant and forcible illustration of the potency of Divine love in its influences upon the wayward heart. Indeed, love has a power which can be wielded by no other agency, and oftentimes the moral miracle which it effects excites our wonder, our admiration, and our gratitude to its divine Author. The following incident was related, not long since, by one of the speakers in a convention of Sabbath School teachers:

There was, in a certain Mission School, (Rail-road School, as they call it,) near a railroad depot in Chicago, a certain old lady, as teacher, whose heart never grew cold toward children—whose love for them was always fresh and green. She had a class of unruly boys placed in her charge. They could not be restrained. Sabbath after Sabbath they had let out their wicked natures in the presence of their teachers, and it was thought nothing could be done with them. Teacher after teacher had given them over in despair, and resigned the class. At last they asked this old lady to take charge of these boys. She consented. She went to them from her closet,—went to them with love to God and with love the [illegible] she picked out one whom she thought to be the ring-leader among them, and began to talk with him.

"Do you love God?" she asked.
"No!"
"Do you love your mother?"
"No!"
"Do you love your friends?"
"No! I don't love God, nor my mother, nor nobody, and I'm not coming any more to the Sabbath School."

The old lady's heart was touched, and she said:

"Why, if any of my sons should say he did not love his mother, it would break my heart!" and the thought of the condition of the boy so overcame her that she burst into tears and wept over him. He, too, was affected. He, too, burst into tears and from that moment that boy and that old lady were united in heart. At the close of the school, he said to the superintendent:

"I love that old lady, and I'm always coming to this school, and she shall be my teacher!"

That class was pointed out to me as a model class, in a very large school. It was love that bound that boy's heart so closely to that of his teacher, and he was only the representative of the whole class.

Yes, love has a power which can touch and move the heart, when every other agency and influence utterly fails. Let those who labor for souls, whether preacher, teacher, parent, or other christian, take courage. "In meekness instructing them that oppose themselves," let them continue to wield the mild but potent weapon of love, and cease not to pray for the erring ones, however obdurate. Their prayers and tears shall not fall fruitless to the earth, nor shall their labor prove in vain.

It is Only a Cent.

"Now, my little lad, don't spend that cent for candy."

"Why, didn't father give it to me?"

"Certainly, but that is no reason why you should spend it. If you run over to the candy store, and buy a roll, in five minutes you will be no better off for having the money; now save your money and put it in a box."

"But it's only a cent!"

A hundred of them will make a dollar, and if you do not save the cents you will never have a dollar."

"But papa gave me this to enjoy it. I do not want to lay it up."

"Well, I will tell you how to enjoy it: not by throwing it away for sweetmeats; but keep it until you have six, and then go to the baker's and buy a nice loaf of bread."

"Why, what do I want to buy bread for?"

"Stop a moment, and I will tell you. A poor old lady lives down the alley below your house, and all that she has to live upon is what kind neighbors bring in. Now, do you take your loaf of nice bread, and get your mother to put a white napkin round it, and then carry it down to her house, and say,—"Here, Mrs. B., is a loaf of bread, will you please accept of it?"

"Well, I'll do it. I know just what she'll say. She will cry, and then put her hand upon my head, and say, 'God bless my little boy!' And I shall feel so happy. I wish I had the money now. But I won't spend a cent until I get it."

"Then you will enjoy your money. 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

I Did as the Rest Did.

This tame, yielding spirit—this doing "as the rest did"—has ruined thousands.

A young man is invited by vicious companions to visit the theatre, or the gambling room, or other haunts of licentiousness. He becomes dissipated, spends his time, loses his credit, squanders his property, and at last sinks into an untimely grave. What ruined him? Simply "doing as the rest did."

A father has a family of sons. He is wealthy. Other children in the same situation in life do so and so, are indulged in this thing and that. He indulged his own in the same way. They grew up idlers, and fops. The father wonders why his children do not succeed better. He has spent so much money on their education, has given them great advantages; but alas! they are only a source of vexation and trouble. Poor man, he is just paying the penalty of "doing as the rest did."

This poor mother strives hard to bring up her daughters genteelly. They learn what others do, to paint, to sing, to play, to dance, and several useful matters. In time they marry; their husbands are unable to support their extravagance, and they are soon reduced to poverty and wretchedness. The good woman is astonished. "Truly," says she, "I did as the rest did."

The sinner following the example of others, puts off repentance, and neglects christianity. He passes along through life, till, unawares, death strikes the fatal blow. He has no time left now to prepare. And he goes down to destruction, because he was so foolish as to "do as the rest did."—Golden Rule.

THE CRISIS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year..............$2.00
For a single copy 6 months..............1.00
For a single copy 3 months..............50
Five copies to one address for 6 months...4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months...8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months...15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months...[illegible]

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the paper within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brs., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition to their subscriptions as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters, write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to Eld. Miles Grant, Boston, Mass.

The postage on the Crisis, if prepaid, quarterly or yearly, at the office where it is received, will be 13 cents a year to any part of Massachusetts, and 26 cents to any other part of the United States.

☞ Canada Subscribers have to pre-pay the postage on their papers, 26 cents a year, in addition to [illegible] will pay [illegible] twenty-three numbers, or [illegible] a year. The same to all the Provinces.

For the Crisis.

Hymn.

Savior of men, we come to thee,
  With countless burdens, bonds and tears,
O! lift us up and set us free,
  And bid thy love disperse our fears.

Thy soul can feel our sharpest woe,
  Thou canst our deepest sickness heal;
Thou dost our sin and weakness know,
  O! to us now thy love reveal.

Savior, we trust thy tender love,
  Thy matchless grace, thy mercy sure;
They brought thee from the realms above,
  And shall to endless years endure.

So keep us, Savior, by thy power,
  Through faith unto salvation's day;
Then in redemption's glorious hour,
  To us thy words of welcome say.

For the Crisis.

Procrastination.

Procrastination is a word of fearful import; none have fully realized its results, (in connection with duty) or can, until they exclaim, "The harvest is past." Its results even in this life have often been most bitter and heartrending. For instance; the inebriate postpones his reform until he sees death advancing with rapid strides, to mow him down and consign his once cherished form to the darkness of the grave. The gambler, until he sees strangers pass over the threshold of his own consecrated home. Still, the results may be felt only in this life; the wife may die, the children be made beggars; but it is possible that the drunkard may repent, the gambler reform. Even this is but a shadow of the anguish of the one who finds himself unredeemed when the Master has risen up from the mediatorial seat and shut to the door.

For the hour will arrive when probation will end; though it long has lingered, it hasteth greatly. Still, men may vacillate a little longer—sin to-day, repent to-morrow; they can lay aside some of the weights, to ease a troubled conscience, and cover up darling sins, waiting for a convenient time to repent; but the fountain is still open. After retrograding and grieving the righteous, perhaps causing many to stumble and be lost, still repentance may be found; but the fearful hour is coming when no more pleading is heard; then no prayers or tears will avail, and the almost christian, as well as the blackest hypocrite, is lost, and lost forever. The filthy remain so still; those who designed to repent to-morrow, who were just waiting a moment, have procrastinated one moment too long. Here ends their dream of beauty, their hope of glory. Here perhaps the rocks and hills will echo the note of despair, the wail of the lost, over the last grave of the hopes of a procrastinating world. Here are those who have sacrificed some for Christ, but have not sacrificed all,—who have struggled against evil, but have not overcome; who have consecrated a part, but not all. The good husband would not accept of a partial consecration in the one who has pledged herself to be his, (as far as it respects the marriage relation); and will God require less? No! he is a jealous God, and will not accept a divided heart, or a bride spotted with the world.

For a moment let us look at the relation we sustain to him, and see how deeply we are obligated to be his. In the first place, we have been purchased by his blood, we live on his bounty, are guided by his Spirit, attended by his angels. He is our brother and intercessor, has given us exceeding great and precious promises. O! shall we not be entirely consecrated to him now, and keep thus until our work is done? then with the tried ones we shall surely enter into the rest that remains for the people of God.

VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

☞ In the course of my experience in society, I have never met with an instance where a man took up the arguments as an unbeliever in the truth of christianity, but it might be traced to an irregularity in his moral conduct; thus confirming a frequent remark of mind, "When a man is opposed to christianity, it is because christianity is opposed to him."—Rev. Robert Hall.

First Things.

BY D. T. TAYLOR.

I have said that John Thomas, M. D., was the first who advocated pre-millennial views in a Journal in this country. Subsequent research proves this statement to be erroneous. Rev. Elias Smith, a Christian Baptist minister and founder of the denomination of Christians, had this honor, as well as the honor of first advocating in a paper the doctrine of eternal life through Christ alone; indeed, he published the first religious newspaper in the world. In Sept. 1st, 1808, Smith issued the first number of "The Herald of Gospel Liberty," a 4to of 4 pp. semi-monthly, at Portsmouth, N. H. It was afterward published in Portland, Me., and then in Philadelphia, Pa., but is now still continued with its original name at Newburyport, Ma., though its first enterprising editor has passed away. In the first number the editor observes: "A religious newspaper is almost a new thing under the sun; I know not but this is the first ever published in the world." He afterwards repeats this statement in his Memoirs, or Life, written by himself. This pioneer pre-millennial Adventist was the author of several prophetical works now very scarce.

In the "Herald," Smith taught the following views now so earnestly advocated by the most of our own people, by which it will be seen that fifty-two years ago, leading ministers in America were deeply imbued with our prevailing heresies—if heresies they be.

1. That all the celestial signs of our Lord's second coming, as foretold in Luke 21: 25–26, had been already witnessed save the falling stars. Of this he wrote, "no doubt it will soon occur." It did occur in 1833.

2. That the four great earthly ruling monarchies prophesied of in Daniel were in the past, and the fifth divine abiding kingdom was at hand, when the whole world would be governed by a Jew—Jesus Christ.

3. That the Redeemer would come visibly and personally at the beginning of the millennium, to reign with his saints during that happy period on the earth.

4. That there would be two resurrections one thousand years apart; the millennial era of Rev. 20th being located between these two epochs,—the "first resurrection" to occur at the advent when all the good will arise.

5. That immortality was God's free gift, to be inherited through Christ, and bestowed upon the just alone in their resurrection—all the wicked will finally utterly perish in the second death.

And all this in the first religious newspaper ever published in this country and in the world! Verily truth is not without some pre-eminence—some honor. And there is progress, for there are at the present time some eight or nine pre-millennial journals in the country, whose aggregate circulation amounts to over twenty thousand.

I regard these facts as significant and worthy of note, no matter who Elias Smith was or what he came to be afterwards. William Miller or John Thomas did not begin to write on the subject of the near second advent till a quarter of a century afterwards. And when they did, they were pronounced innovators and their doctrines novelties! Success to these first things.

For the Crisis.

Christians, are you led by the Spirit of Christ?

This is a question that every professed follower of Christ should ask. It has been upon my mind for some time, and therefore I felt an inclination to write a few lines upon the subject. We must be led entirely by this Spirit if we live for God. The question comes before us, why should we be led by the Spirit of Christ? I will name a few reasons.

1. It will lead us into all truth.
2. It will make us happy.
3. It will lead us to do the will of God.
4. He shall be of them who finally are gathered into his kingdom, to go no more out forever.

It will lead into all truth. If we wish to serve God, to know and do his will, we must read his word, and be led by the Spirit of Christ; that is, to keep it within us, and it will lead us into truth. If you do not believe it, try it. Be sure you are not led by learned and great men. Not think, I am a Baptist, or a Methodist, and I know God teaches that this is true, for some great man told me so, without first studying "to see if these things are so," for if you do, you will be led by man instead of the Spirit. "God says he has kept it from the wise and prudent, and revealed it unto babes." He will teach poor ignorant people who are willing to be led by the Spirit, sooner than he will those great men who care not for the will of God, perhaps "having the form of godliness, but denying the power."

There is more to be learned in one week's careful study of the Bible, and all the while being led by the Spirit, than, I was about to say, a lifetime at the greatest "institutions of learning" in the world. Did you ever think of this?

It will make us happy. If we are led by the Spirit, we shall certainly be led into truth; it will make us free, make us bold, ready to give a reason for the hope that is within us. Yes, if you have the truth, you are willing and ready to give a reason of the hope to every one that asketh you. We shall be happy because we shall be blest of God. No one was ever blest of him in doing wrong, nor in teaching doctrines contrary to the Bible.

It will lead us to do the will of God, to obey him in all things; not to leave out a part, because you will be hated by the world if you do it; nor because it is a little easier to do some other way: but do the whole will of God. It is a work that must be thoroughly done if we ever enter the gates of the "New Jerusalem."

We shall finally be among those who will be gathered into his kingdom, to go no more out forever. Is not this worth being led by the Spirit? Now let us all be under perfect subjection to his will, willing to do whatever the Spirit directs us to do, without regard to what the world may say or think of us. For I had rather suffer affliction with the people of God, than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

I have been a professor of religion for four years, but have been too much like the world. I have been very cold; have not been willing to be led by the Spirit; but if I know my own heart, I am now willing to take the Bible for my guide, to know and do God's will, although it

"Disturbs cold professors when we praise King Jesus."

I want to be numbered with God's people at the end of time. Christian, be led entirely by the Spirit of Christ.

An Appeal to Brethren East.

I wish to offer some thoughts worthy of notice and action. The season for campmeetings has come, and soon the lovers of truth will meet again at Wilbraham. O, how I wish it was my lot to meet with them! I would then present to those who are engaged in sowing the precious seed, and are surveying the great harvest field, to find some grains of wheat that are scattered among the many tares, what I am now about to write. It seems to me that in many places in the eastern states they are better supplied with laborers than here in Western N. Y.; and indeed I see that the same ground is traveled over frequently by different ones. Now here is a large field without any to travel.

I will commence at Syracuse. Here there used to be a good company of believers; now it would be as hard to find them as young partridges, and about as shy when found. A few miles out of Syracuse, (Liverpool,) there still live a few real sheep, but they need feeding. Then there is Oswego, where there once flourished a good company; but wolves, and isms, and perhaps a little love of the world, have about devoured them all, so that there could be found very few Lots in all the city. About four years ago I had occasion to stop over First day there, and after some searching found Bro. Oliphant and family, who still loved the blessed word. Then there is Auburn, a beautiful place, where once there was a large company of loved ones; and such of them as had means built a very nice little brick house, for worship, which now stands unoccupied. And what has been the cause of their scattering would be hard to detail; and though there are some scattered sheep there, they do not obey the Apostles' injunction of exhorting one another, and so much the more as they see the day approaching.

South Butler, not twenty miles from here, has some hungry sheep; and when Bro. Grant was here last summer and fall, they came and fed upon the word as though they had not been in very good pasture for some time. Then there is Waterloo, three miles west of this place, (Seneca Falls,) where there are a few believers. And Geneva, a few miles further west—there might be found a few. And, a little further west is Canandagua; here there used to be a good company; and now, scarcely any could be found, who love the return of our absent Lord more than they do the present corrupt state of things.

I would not forget Victor, ten miles westward. Here are men who possess enough of this world's goods to keep one or two laborers in the field without impoverishing them very much; and I have no doubt they would have a heart to do so, if they have as much truth burning in the heart as they have theory in the head. We think one great cause of such declension and lukewarmness is, there is more head religion than heart; more theory than a holy, living practice; more laying up treasure on earth than in heaven; more going like the world than coming out from the world; more conversation about the world than about the coming of Jesus; more conforming to the world than being transformed into the image of Christ.

Now I have sketched a large territory—enough for two or three faithful laborers; and it is a rich, productive country, abounding with all kinds of produce and fruit. Who will volunteer to come, richly laden with the gospel, and filled with the Holy Spirit? If you have faith in God you need not fear; for he has said, "No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." You have God's promise for your salary; and if you need a little whipping, it may be for your good, and your Father will see that you get it. One thing is certain: all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall receive, as a portion of their salary, PERSECUTION. If this comes out in the Crisis before the campmeeting, we wish you to remember it, and see if some one or more will not be willing to separate from friendly ties that may bind them in the East, and go and sound forth the word of the Lord in regions beyond. If any will come, be sure and have on the ARMOR, for Satan has his officers and crew, well skilled in throwing his arrows, even bitter words. I pray God to hedge up the way of some bold soldier in the East, that he may see it as plain as Bro. Frank Burr did. Yours in hope of endless life, when Jesus comes.

G. DILLABAUGH.

Seneca Falls, N. Y.

P. S. If any will volunteer to come, Seneca Falls or Auburn would be a good central place to pitch your tent as headquarters. The harvest field is very large, and in many places there never has been any one to see if there is any wheat growing. What is done for this doomed world must be done with railroad speed. G. D.

Travels and Labors.

Spent one Sunday in Augusta since our late conference there; found a few in the faith, "striving to enter in at the strait gate." Some of the spectators there have got where the people were in John's day. They cannot tell whether this gospel of the kingdom is "from heaven or of men." They believe—but oh, our reputation!! Well, the truth is worth more than an empty name. I have been at Livermore, and preached one Sunday on Bro. Hagget's appointment; found the brethren cheerful, and some of them at work. God has blessed some of late, and converted several of them. The devil is hard at it to buy them back, and risks his neck almost under the yoke of Christ to betray the unwary. God will be glorified in that place. His word runs.

I have tried to get to Stoneham and Woodstock, but could not. Went to Yarmouth to attend the funeral of Sister West, and preached one Sunday in Cumberland. The Lord is doing a great work in both these places. Sinners are converted, and saints are brought into the gospel hope, and are now looking for Jesus. The devil roars aloud in these parts; he is in trouble; yet he has many sympathizers. "But why don't you come and preach to us as you used to?" Oh, I would gladly do so. But I cannot get about everywhere; I have to earn my bread; I have a family to take care of. So I have taken up a business that will let me travel and trade, and preach where I can get at it with my work, trade all or half the week, and preach one or two evenings and Sunday.

I visited the brethren in Brunswick and spent one Sunday with them; had a good time; found them in the gospel faith, and looking for eternal life at Jesus' coming. But, then, I could not go and visit the families as I would like. The work calls me off. One Sunday I spent in Wilton, Upper Village; a hard place—very few ears. They have not heard much, and determined not to. Had we the means to be able to spend time, they should have more. But we could not stop to visit.

I was at Bristol one Sunday; glad to see the brethren, and they glad to see me. Some love the truth, and love to help sustain it. But I wish I could have stayed one or two weeks—visited and preached to them about Jesus' coming and the kingdom. "Why not do it?" Business calls. "Oh, I fear you are getting worldly." Perhaps so; but let me ask you who pays my house rent, family expenses, horse and carriage expenses? Who pays for the hundreds of tracts we give to those who will read? "I suppose some of the brethren help you, don't they?" Yes, they do, and God blesses them. But it only a little more than pays the tolls over the rivers, and feeds the horse when among strangers.

"Glad to see you, Bro. W. I have been looking for you to come and preach to us a long while. Why don't you come as you used to? We do not have any preaching." Well, I am always busy; I go to visit a good many old, run-down societies, and into new fields, but most of my time I spend in trade and work, to earn a living. "Don't the Lord sustain you?" Oh! yes; but it is by the use of means. Did I not have the Lord for my banker, I should fail. "Can't you come as you used to?" Not exactly. I used to earn several hundred dollars; then go and preach and visit until it was gone; then brethren told me to trust in God; I did, and he never failed. But when needy I bought on credit, hired money, etc., and so got on until I felt that to live a christian I must pay my debts. Then I go to work and earn it. Let me try you. Perhaps you are worldly, Bro. A. Come over and see us; it is only fifty miles. Come and spend two or three weeks. I want to have you go from my place up to L., with Bro. D., and stop a few Sundays; he is to preach there, and you can help him in meetings. "Me go to visit! How do you suppose I can leave my farm? My planting must be done, fences put up, and I have more than I can do. If I don't put in my seed I shall have nothing to live on." Why, trust in the Lord, brother. "Yes, but the Lord works by means, and I must work to get my bread." Well, Bro. B., you come. We shall all be glad to see you, and you can do us good by laboring awhile in our meetings, and there are several towns around where you could get up prayer meetings, and spend a month among us. "How could I do so? I am obliged to work all the time at my trade; my business would soon run down if I should leave it to go off on visits. It is all my dependence for a living." Oh, we will take good care of you, and keep your horse all the time you are with us. "But I have bills to pay soon. I owe for that wagon; I must soon have a new harness; my rent is due next week; I bought a barrel of flour yesterday, and am to pay for it in thirty days. Men are waiting for the work, and if I don't do it, they will get somebody who will."

Are these worldly men? Then I may be. It is as far to your place as it is to my place. Time is lent us by the Lord, and we are to improve it honestly if we gain eternity. Yours in the gospel hope, still waiting.

I. C. WELLCOME.

A Picture of the Times.

The following is taken from the N. Y. Independent:

MAN'S NATURE, AS INTERPRETED BY THE PREVALENCE OF CRIME.

It was well remarked by one of the speakers at the recent anniversary meetings in this city, that the present times bid fair to be distinguished, in this country at least, not especially as a period of art, of liberty, of humanity, of general comfort or general culture, but pre-eminently as a period of CRIME. The progress and the prevalence of even the grossest forms of wickedness, in different places, and among diverse classes, are facts frightful to observe, and more frightful to ponder. Every newspaper is laden with the records of such. Dishonesty, licentiousness, violence, murder, they do not meet us as exceptional instances; they make the staple of the news of the day; they load and darken the columns of all journals; till one trembles almost to take up the morning paper, is afraid to have it read in the family, and lays it down with a sense of heart-sickness, a saddening impression of the ineffectiveness of our public moral and religious instruction, a keen apprehension of what is to be expected in the future.

It is not the rich and luxurious, alone, among whom such evidences of viciousness abound. It is not those who are avowedly worldly and godless in their life. Mechanics, merchants, farmers, teachers, physicians, lawyers, ministers of the gospel, men high in social rank and political influence, women as well as men, the young not only but the aged, in well-nigh equal measure, the refined and cultivated as well as the coarse, all seem to be smitten with the foul contagion,—and suddenly to break out with the vile and hateful leprosy of sin. Not crimes of dishonesty alone are common; but the murder of wives, of husbands, of children, of the most confiding and affectionate friends, a horrible lustfulness, the most flagrant and fiendish violations of faith,—all seem as common as the blossoming of trees, and are coming to be spoken of as familiarly and frequently, and with nearly as little apparent concern as are the most ordinary and trivial facts.

No one, we think, can feel that in this descriptive outline the case is at all overstated; that any slightest exaggeration of the truth is either intended or allowed. The same impression must be made upon all whose eyes and ears are measurably open to what is publicly passing around them, and who contrast this present state of things, not against some ideal plan of the social state, some fancy of their own as to what might be, but what never has been; or even against the comparative pureness of the manners of our fathers, but against the actual state of society as it was in this country only twenty or thirty years ago. That was not Arcadian, but it looks almost so in comparison of the present. It certainly is true that excesses of crime are vastly more common now than then, and that what would then have shocked a community so deeply and indelibly as to be remembered and recounted for years, is now forgotten beneath the impression of that which follows it, in a few days or weeks. A sense of unsafeness begins to prevail throughout many circles. A sudden death can hardly anywhere occur without exciting the suspicion of foul means. Elopements and domestic infidelities are so common as hardly to excite any remark, unless perhaps a ribald jest. And no sense of strangeness is awakened in the public mind by the story of even a parricide or a wife-murder.

There are many thoughts suggested by this state of things, as also many duties that are palpably impressed by it, to some of which we may very likely refer. But there is one truth so plainly preached by it, and in itself so important and imperative, that we cannot but advert to it a moment here. It would seem impossible that all thoughtful persons should not be at once and equally reached by it, and should not equally recognize the proof of it. It is, that HUMAN NATURE, as unchanged by grace, is NOW JUST AS DEPRAVED AS IT EVER HAS BEEN; is, in fact, precisely the same in its character, and the same in its tendencies, that it was in the age of the Roman amphitheatre; that it was in the days of the Ptolemies or the Pharaohs.

An intense and passionate selfishness is at the heart of it. It does not seek the interests of others, but primarily its own. It does not seek to honor God, but to gratify its own ambition and passion. It does not acknowledge allegiance to virtue, but aims at indulgence, mastery, pleasure, at whatever cost, and at whatever hazard; and so it has in it the quick seeds of all crime, and only shows these more fearfully and boldly, in more terrific forms of exhibition, as its means and instruments for such revelation become more complete. We have not always been as ready as we should have been to perceive and to feel this; but it is true, nevertheless, and the papers now proclaim it with million tongues, and a most appalling and unanswerable emphasis.

It is one of the wide-spread errors of our day,—most disastrous and most dangerous,—the notion that our institutions of freedom, with an outrunning commerce, a copious prosperity, a generally diffused intellectual cultivation, the discipline and invigoration of the popular mind, the accomplishment of great outward and material works, the wide circulation of religious instruction,—that these have essentially elevated man's nature, and made it less sensual and gross than it was. The gilding on the drug has been believed to have eliminated from it the radical poison; the ornamentation on the outside of the sarcophagus to have arrested the process of decay underneath; the placing of the tiger in zoological gardens to have made him less ferocious than he was in the woods; the housing of mankind in marble or in freestone to have cleansed their inner spirit, and made it less vile and less deadly than it was when the unlettered tribes dwelt in huts or in tents. Perhaps we all have felt something of this. And not a few have really accepted the plausible idea that all these material means and mechanisms were raising a sort of inclined plane, up which men would pass by insensible degrees, till without help of grace it should lift them to the level of millennial attainment!

Away with such dainty and delicate theories! The times denounce them, and unanswerably demonstrate them short-sighted and pernicious! Man is, to-day, unchanged by God's Spirit, precisely what he has always been. He is in Massachusetts, in New Jersey, in New York, what he was in old Rome or older Babylon. This city is Nineveh on another continent, wanting only its readiness to repent. The mechanic at Weymouth, if guilty as alleged, is Caligula or Tiberius, with only, thank God, a less opportunity. The Methodist preacher poisoning his wife, wants only a different occasion and arena to repeat the worst horrors of what we are wont to call, by way of [illegible], "the Dark Ages." The [illegible] graces and [illegible] of society have not availed to regenerate man, to reform or essentially to restrain his nature. His manners may be modified, but his temper is still, at the root, identical. His wealth is greater, but his heart is no more Godlike than before. He now, as of old, carries in him the furious volcanic fires of idolatry and of lust, that may break at any time into lurid and devastating manifestation. He is hardly afraid of the law man has made; not at all of the law which is higher than this, the ground of its authority, the measure of its justness, and which has the Eternal and Omnipresent for its executive. He may shrink from human courts, but not from the great assize of the future. He is at heart just as godless as ever, and just as rebellious; making gods for himself of his pride and his lusts, and of his greed for worldly good, and wishing that the Almighty were out of the way; ready to hurl him from his throne each moment, to gain the liberty of unlimited indulgence; of doing precisely what he wishes! When we get to the centre of the nature of man as shown in the current history of our times, it is precisely this that we find there,—unchanged by years; unremoved by the progress of outward civilization; tastes and tendencies just as vicious as ever; capacities for cruelty, treachery, falsehood, for crimes of every grade and dye, exactly the same in kind and in measure that have been shown along the bloodiest passages of the past;—any other description of this nature misstates it; any other view of it essentially misconceives it. To try to change it by any other means than those which reach the heart itself, and rectify that, is to treat its inward hurt too slightly. And it is not the pulpit that now alone or chiefly preaches this; but it is the common speech of men. A thousand newspapers are every day announcing and repeating it, with an appalling, irresistible energy, to the whole reading world!

Let us think of this, and feel it!—and let the force of its meaning and the lessons of its verity instruct and inspire us as of right they ought.

For the Crisis.

The Trial of Faith.

"Fret not thyself because of evil doers."—Ps. 37: 1.

Reeling under the frowns of the curse, and subject to all of its debasing influences of evil, the child of God sighs for a higher and holier state of purity and perfection. He yearns for that state of holiness and entire consecration to God that culminates in the glad existence of immortal being. The present life only adds its charms while it grasps the hope of a better one; and the storms which the christian endures make him long for that peaceful harbor where sin and all its concomitant miseries

"Are felt and feared no more,"

and the morning of immortality shall dawn in the everlasting spring-time of heavenly repose. But sin rages here. The apple of gold is in a state of mortality; and that heart that pulsates with the highest aspirations to holiness, draws the very blood by which it beats from a nature of moral and physical corruption. God's Spirit reproves. Satan frowns and retorts. This has been the mighty and unextinguished conflict of ages. The germ of sin that sprang forth at the gate of Paradise lost has grown into a gigantic tree. It has spread its branches wide over the earth—and now and then a plant of truth peers through the openings of the poisonous foliage, and the sunlight of heaven's richest blessings pours down to kiss its unfolding petals. The showers of grace water it. Sin, with its blasting influences, tries to kill it. The contest waxes hot. But truth will be unshaken. The kingdom may be Satan's by usurpation, but God will protect and water the heart that trusteth in him.

This mighty conflict has been the trial of the peculiar people. But it is trial that makes them long for peace and rest. It is the weariness of toil that makes rest sweet to the laborer. It is the dashing spray, the bounding billow, the stormy tempest and the shattered vessel, that make the mariner long for a quiet harbor. So the raging tempests of sin and passion make the lonely exile on time's dreary ocean sigh for a peaceful rest in the haven of the blessed.

Peter, speaking to them who are begotten to an inheritance incorruptible, says: "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations: that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."—1 Pet. 1: 6, 7. [illegible] trials will work out for you blessings innumerable. God says so. Trust him. He will plead your cause righteously. Let not disappointments cast you down. Rather glory in tribulation also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed," for it takes hold of a kingdom unending, joys ineffable, glories unfading, holy and pure.

Abraham had his faith tried. The Almighty commanded him to slay his son of promise. Abraham did not stagger at the mandate beneath the chastening rod. He obeyed. But popular professors sometimes tell us that God does not permit his purposes to be revealed unless they are divinely certain. God did not mean for Abraham to slay his son, but he did mean a trial of his faith, and that was worth a great deal more to him than his son. But what effect did this have on Abraham's faith? I apprehend that it clinched the nail of faith on the other side of God's promises. "By faith," says Paul, "Abraham when he was tried offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises offered up his only "begotten son, of whom it is said, That in Jesus shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure." That is it. The trial of his faith made him sensibly understand the resurrection. Trial has the same effect now that it did in Abraham's day. These light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

So God overrules the conflict of sin for the benefit of his people. So it has been. The present trials of God's peculiar people teach the same great lesson. It is the trials of the present life that make the saint desire to change earth with its privations for the kingdom, where all things shall be his; earth with its sadness, for Eden with its glory; earth with its discords, for heaven's celestial harmony; earth with its graveyards, for the deathless clime of Paradise; earth with its toil and weariness, for pastures of plenty and rivers of delight; earth with its lonely pilgrimage, for the peaceful vallies of home,—joyous, everlasting Home.

"Come and See!"

"And I looked, and behold a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was Death, and hell (grave) followed with him. And power was given unto them, (to him—marg.) over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth."

The above is a portion of the revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass. This was signified by John.

John says, "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls (persons) of them that were slain (they were slain under the fourth but seen under the fifth,] .... and they cried (as Abel's blood did) with a loud voice, saying, How long, oh Lord, holy and true, dost thou not avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow servants also and their brethren that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled." "White robes," I understand to be the righteousness of the saints—see Rev. 19: 8,—"bright robes." Marg. They were faithful unto death. They rest in hope. How long? A little season, until their fellow servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

A fellow servant is one that serves the same master. They stand stiffly for the word of God, and die for the truth. They keep it unto life eternal.

I must say, the killing of the christians in Syria, and the terrible scenes which have recently occurred there, look as though the time for vengeance was about to come. The blood of thousands of christian men, women and children, calls up from the ground for vengeance. God will avenge them when they cry day and night unto him. The flood, the drought, the pestilence [illegible], all combine to cause men's hearts to fail them for fear. We are living in eventful times. Heralds of the coming Kingdom! now lift up the warning voice, exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching.

"Reasons."—Two or three weeks ago I sent for a copy of "Reasons for my Hope," and I think among all the works that have been published none surpass this. It is a rich, deep mine of Bible truth and historical facts, and one of the best books to put in the hands of those who are not in possession of this "blessed hope"—also for those who profess this hope, to lead them to examine themselves and see if their hope is "the hope of the gospel." Every lover of truth ought to have one, and everybody else. [illegible]

BOSTON, AUGUST 15, 1860.

A Fast.

On account of the great importance of our annual gathering at Wilbraham, we would propose to those interested in this meeting, that Friday, Aug. 17th, be observed as a day of fasting and special prayer, that our campmeeting this year may be noted for good order, christian harmony, the awakening and conversion of sinners, and the reclaiming of backsliders; in short, that it may be the most profitable meeting we have ever held.

Wilbraham Campmeeting.

Our great annual gathering at Wilbraham is like the feast of tabernacles to the Jews. It has become one of our institutions. Each year adds new interest, and renders the spot more sacred. Scenes of the past are still vivid in our memories, and we long for the time to come when we shall meet again in the peaceful shade on the quiet hill-top, where songs of joy burst from hearts gladdened with the love of Jesus. There we meet the "toil worn and weary" who have been struggling alone, 'mid sorrows, cares and temptations, and have not heard a sermon on the "blessed hope" for months, and perhaps not since the last campmeeting. It is a pleasing sight to witness the delights of such, and hear their cheering testimonies. They know how to prize the privileges which others abuse. Those who have meetings several times a week, seldom know their worth till they are deprived of their hallowed influence. Like good health, the value is unknown till taken away.

We shall expect a large gathering at Wilbraham this year, and an excellent meeting. Let all the saints come praying, with a determination to do the greatest possible amount of good in their power.

As this will be a meeting of great importance to the cause of truth, let us all pray the good Lord to direct it by his wisdom, and make it the best one we have ever held; that many sinners may be converted, backsliders be reclaimed, and the children of the Lord be greatly strengthened for the christian warfare.

As there will be a variety of theological views represented at the meeting, it will be an excellent opportunity to exercise forbearance, kindness, and long-suffering, thus showing that we belong to Christ, and deserve the name of christians. It sometimes happens that one brings a hobby-horse to campmeeting, and feels very much out of tune if he cannot have the privilege of riding him all over the ground and into every tent, thus marring the peace of the encampment. It will be remembered by those who had the privilege of attending the meeting last year, that if any had hobby-horses, they left them at home, and came with a sweet spirit of "brotherly kindness," which produced the most happy results. Let us all try to make the coming meeting still more excellent, in this respect, if possible, than any we have ever enjoyed; recognizing all as our brethren, who do the will of our Father which is in heaven; in other words, making christian character, according to the New Testament standard, the test of fellowship.

If all come to do what is for the best good and comfort of the whole, with a spirit of labor for the conversion of sinners and the reclaiming of backsliders, we think we shall have the most heavenly meeting we ever enjoyed. Come prepared to work at the beginning. Come with your armor on. Come with a heart full of christian love. Come to do good, and you will get good. He who comes as a spectator, will wish he had staid at home. He who does nothing will be in danger of losing the little that he hath. Whoever would enjoy a campmeeting and receive new strength, must take an active part. Some seem to think if they can only go to the meeting, they shall come away filled with perfect love. This depends on their faith, and what they do after they get there. Some thought if they could only go to the California mines they should come home rich; but found when there they must work or return poor. So at the campmeeting, you must work or starve.

"The End is Come."

The end of what? And who says it? Victor Hugo says this of the Papacy and its domineering power. But he does not see that immediately following its end comes the resurrection of the dead, and the beginning of the everlasting kingdom of God.

Victor Hugo has recently made an eloquent speech in favor of Sicilian independence, in which he says:—"At the present hour it is permitted to no one to be indifferent to the great events which are in progress. The efforts of every man, the aid of every man, the hands of every man are demanded on behalf of the noble work of deliverance. Not an ear should be closed—not a heart should be silent. Wherever the cry of the people is heard, there should be found an echo in the inmost heart of every man. He who has but a sou should give it to the liberators; he who has but a stone at hand should hurl it at the [illegible]. While some may act and others speak, let all be doing. Yes, all to the work. The wind is breathing; let public encouragement to the heroes be the joy of every soul. Let the multitude glow, like the furnace, with enthusiasm. Let those who cannot fight with the sword, fight with the mind. Let not a single intelligence remain neutral; let not a single spirit remain inactive. Let those who are struggling in the fight feel that they are gazed on, that they are loved, that they are sustained. Let there be around that valiant man, who is standing erect there in Palermo, a fire on every mountain in Sicily—a light on every height in Europe. I have pronounced the word. The tyrants! Have I exaggerated? Have I calumniated the Neapolitan government? No words; here are the facts. Pay attention! This is living history—bleeding history. The kingdom of Naples—that kingdom which now occupies our thoughts—has but a single institution, the police. Every district has its cudgelling commission. Two sbirri—Ajossa and Maniscalco—reign under the king. Ajossa cudgels Naples; Maniscalco cudgels Sicily. But the cudgel is merely a Turkish weapon. This government has, in addition, the instrument of the inquisition—torture. Yes, torture. Listen. A sbire, Bruno, binds the accused with the head between the legs until he confesses. Another sbire, Pontillo, fixes him upon an iron grating, beneath which he lights a fire. This is called the burning chair. Another sbire, Luigi Maniscalco, a kinsman of the chief, has invented an instrument into which the arm or the leg of the victim is introduced; a screw is turned, and the limb is crushed. This is called the Angelic instrument. Another suspends a man by his hands and feet, between two walls, and then jumps on him and dislocates his body. There are also thumb-screws for crushing the fingers, a tourniquet for pressing the head, an iron ring, with a screw, which almost forces the eyes out of the head. Sometimes a victim escapes. A man named Casimiro Arsimano was one of these; his wife, his sons, and his daughters were placed on the burning chair. The Cape Zafferana touches on an arid beach. To this beach the sbirri bring sacks. Each sack contains a man; it is plunged into the water, and kept there till the man no longer moves. It is then taken out, and he is commaded to confess. If he refuse, he is plunged in again. Giovanni Vienna, of Messina, expired in this manner. At Monreale an old man and his daughter were suspected of patriotism. The father died beneath the whip; the daughter, who was pregnant, was stripped naked and flogged to death! Gentlemen, there is a young man, of twenty-one years of age, who does these things. This young man is called Francis II. This takes place in the country of Tiberius. Is it possible? It is true. The date? 1860—the very year in which we live..... O despots, I defy you! Stop the falling stone, stop the falling torrent, stop the avalanche, stop Italy, stop '89, stop the world, precipitated by God into the light!" (Enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.)

"The mighty men" are waking up and furbishing their armor for the battle of "the great day." Time's last sands are wasting; the last prophetic tints are fading into the light of the living reality; connecting the present with the everlasting and glorious future.

The Pharisees.

Cruden, in defining the Pharisees, says: "They substituted human traditions in the room of God's word ... In matters of religion, the traditions of the ancients were the chief subject of their studies."

In speaking of the law of God, he says: "They had even altered and corrupted it in important articles by their own perverse interpretations of it." When they made a convert, they afterwards made him "a greater sinner" than before, "by teaching him a pernicious doctrine.... The Pharisees believed the soul to be immortal.... They likewise admitted a kind of transmigration of souls of good men, which might pass from one body to another."

If they had not believed in the immortality of the soul, they would not have taught its transmigration from one body to another, as taught by Pythagoras, a heathen philosopher. Nearly all the great theological errors of the past and present, appear to be based on the unscriptural dogma of the immortality of the soul.

We hope that all who see the light on this important subject, will keep it brightly shining, and present it in kindness and love to all their friends and neighbors. There is special need of it at the present time, in order to prevent them from embracing the infidel sentiments of Spiritualists, and others whose doctrines are very similar.

The Second Death.—Rev. 20: 14.

"And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death."

Professor Stuart remarks on this passage:—"By repeating the sentiment, this is the second death, the lake of fire, the writer means to say, that the death to which thanatos (death) and hades (hell or the grave) are now brought, is one from which there is no resurrection. It is final."

☞ The man who is satisfied with himself is beyond the hope of improvement [illegible] of heaven.

Napoleon and the Pope.

If it were not for the French troops at Rome, the Pope's position would be more critical than it is; but even now, his is no enviable situation, when viewed only from a political stand-point; but when seen in prophetical light, it is awful. He and his familiars begin to realise their critical condition, and are becoming satisfied that the pretended friendship of Napoleon is a very uncertain affair, and not worthy of their confidence any longer.

In the late sermon of Archbishop Hughes on the Papal supremacy, and its present dangers and difficulties, when speaking of the promises of Napoleon, he says:—

"The Holy Father has been deceived in these promises—the Catholic world have been disappointed in the character of their author. They, at least, have no reason to confide in either the spoken or the written declarations of the present Emperor of the French, whenever it suits his private purposes to betray their interests and to humiliate their Supreme Head. He did not declare war against the states of the church; neither did his ally of Sardinia. And yet, between them, with their connivance, if not their approval, the fairest portion of the Papal States have been secretly invaded, under the auspices of Piedmont at least."

This shows that the Catholics are getting their eyes somewhat open to the policy of Bonaparte, and that they are satisfied that his promises cannot be trusted. He has now risen so high that, like the Popes when they had most power, he claims the right to change his mind and decrees whenever it is for his interest. He is fast approaching the position of universal dictator, when his will be the NAME for adoration. Truly this is an age of man-worship, while the Lord is almost forgotten.

"The Scripture cannot be broken." John 10: 35.

We are often reminded of the saying of our Savior,—"The Scripture cannot be broken;" especially when we read the prophecies in the Old and New Testament, which have been, and are now fulfilling. The most earnest efforts, within the power of men to make, have been made to overthrow the Scriptures; but they have been as successful as they would have been had they undertaken to stop the earth in its orbit around the sun.

Julian the apostate once undertook to break the Scriptures. The following, from the Ladies Christian Annual, will give the reader some idea of his success:—

Julian became Emperor of Rome, A. D. 361. He appears to have been the most learned, philosophic, brave and successful man of his day, besides being the most religious of all the Emperors of that age of the world. He was converted to the knowledge and belief of the christian religion by Eusebius,—Bishop of Nicomedia. Julian was an Arian, and came into contact with Constantius, his brother,—of the Athanasian party, and carried his opposition so far, that he not only attacked with severity the speculative theology of his brother, but struck at the very foundations of the christian faith, and denied the Lord that bought him.

Succeeding to the empire, he openly renounced christianity and embraced the Pagan superstitions, and advocated by all the force of his mighty will, a return to the old heathen idolatries. This gained for him the name of the Apostate. He granted toleration, however, to all the different religions of the Empire,—and probably from hatred to his former religion, and with a desire to defeat the prediction of the Messiah,

"And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, he embraced the extraordinary design of rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem.

To give an air of piety to his purpose, and to explain his motives in the enterprise, "In a public epistle to the nation, a community of the Jews dispersed through the provinces, he pities their misfortunes, condemns their oppressors, praises their constancy, declares himself their protector, and expresses the pious hope that after his return from the Persian war, he may be permitted to pay his graceful vows to the Almighty in his Holy City Jerusalem."

Jerusalem at the time was in the hands of the christians. The church of the Holy Sepulcher and other magnificent buildings adorned it. The church, composed of numerous christians, enjoyed pre-eminence on account of the city itself. Many pilgrims then as now visited the city. The disciples then as now chiefly were Gentiles. To quote again from Gibbon's Decline and Fall,

"The vain and ambitious mind of Julian might aspire to restore the ancient glory of the Temple of Jerusalem. As the christians were firmly persuaded that a sentence of everlasting destruction had been pronounced against the whole fabric of the Mosaic Law, the imperial sophist would have converted the success of his undertaking into a specious argument against the faith of prophecy, and the truth of revelation."

So anxious was he to put into immediate effect his purpose, that he changed his plans in regard to the Persian war, and set about making preparation to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem. "He resolved to erect, without delay, on the commanding eminence of Moriah, a stately temple, which might eclipse the splendor of the Church of the Resurrection on the adjacent hill of Calvary; to establish an order of priests whose interested zeal would detect the arts, and resist the ambition of their christian rivals; and to invite a numerous colony of Jews, whose stern fanaticism would be always prepared to second and even to anticipate the hostile measures of the Persian government." He commenced his designs by selecting men, and with the utmost despatch prosecuted his work. The officer appointed to take charge of it "received an extraordinary commission to restore, in its pristine beauty, the Temple of Jerusalem." At the call of the Emperor, the Jews assembled from all quarters, [illegible] provinces, on the holy mountains of their fathers. Their zeal and insolence alarmed the christians in Jerusalem and elsewhere. Men forgot their avarice, and women their delicacy. Spades and pick-axes of silver were provided by the vanity of the rich, and rubbish was transported in mantles of silk and purple!—Here we have a systematic attempt to hinder the fulfillment of prophecy, and to undermine the faith of christianity. And what was the result? The skeptical historian, Gibbon, shall answer. "Yet on this occasion the joint efforts of power and enthusiasm were unsuccessful; and the ground of the Jewish Temple, which is now covered by a Mohammedan mosque, still continues to exhibit the same edifying spectacle of ruin and desolation."

Providence interposed by taking away the life of Julian, the profane apostate; he lived but six months after commencing the undertaking. "But," continues the historian, "the christians entertained a natural and pious expectation that in this memorable contest the honor of religion would be vindicated by some signal miracle. An earthquake, a whirlwind, and a fiery eruption, which overturned and scattered the new foundation of the Temple, are attested, with some variations, by contemporary and respectable evidence. The public event is described by Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, in an Epistle to the Emperor Theodosius, which must provoke the severe animadversion of the Jews; by the eloquent Chrysostom, who might appeal to the memory of the elder part of his congregation at Antioch; and by Gregory Nazianzen, who published his account of the miracle before the expiration of the same year. The last of these writers has boldly declared, that this preternatural event was not disputed by the infidels; and his assertion, strange as it may seem is confirmed by the unexceptionable testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus. The philosophic soldier, who loved the virtues without adopting the prejudices of his master, has recorded, in his judicious and candid history of his own times, the extraordinary obstacles which interrupted the restoration of the Temple of Jerusalem. Hear his words:

"Whilst Alypius (the superintendent under Julian,) assisted by the Governor of the province, urged with vigor and diligence the execution of the work,—horrible balls of fire breaking out near the foundation, with frequent and reiterated attacks, rendered the place, from time to time, inaccessible to the scorched and blasted workmen; and the victorious element continuing in this manner, obstinately and resolutely bent, as it were to drive them to a distance, the undertaking was abandoned." "Such authority should satisfy a believing, and must astonish an incredulous mind," adds Gibbon.

The last writer quoted by Gibbon with such a commendation, was the Emperor's private secretary, and finally wrote his biography. Persians, Christians, Mohammedans, Crusaders (all Gentiles,) have trodden under foot the City of Jerusalem; and the crescent of Omar's mosque still glitters upon Mount Moriah, and the Gentile treads proudly upon the summit of Zion, while the poor and insulted Jew still crawls to a remaining fragment of the ancient wall, that he may kiss the stones of his fathers' habitation, and lift up his wailing cry, "How long, oh, Lord! how long?" We simply add, in the language of the Messiah, to the cry of the bewailing Israelite,—"Until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled!" These times are nearly ended.

Tract Fund for the West.

The following "news from the seat of war" may interest the readers of the Crisis.

"Wis., July 22d, 1860.

Bro. Hastings:—Peace be unto you—the Lord bless and prosper you. I received the Crisis with your Peace sermon in it, and was in a condition to realize that peace which passeth all understanding. My heart rejoiced in your clear description, and in the goodness of God in extending that peace unto us in this life of toil.

Bro. H., your writings, sermons and tracts, which have flown from your heart to your pen, and from pen to papers, pamphlets and the various productions of yours, and also those of your brethren, which have been sent out into the Western States, have gladdened many a heart; where their 'lamp' was a confused mass of perplexity, it now has become the light of life to them. This is the testimony of brethren here in Wisconsin.

I have scattered some of your writings on almost every subject that you have written, and I could name many persons who state that your sermons and books have been made a great blessing to them. 'Pauline Theology' has stripped quite a number of their sectarian theology. Bro. Grant's productions are not dead letters; they have done good execution. Bro. Storrs' Six Sermons, original, and also the later edition, have reached some that other productions seem not to interest. Bible vs. Tradition has done up the clinching and riveting of quite a number.

After circulating all the above, I sent and received Bro. Edwin Burnham's 'Anti-eternal Torment,' and to my surprise it took the kinks out of a sister that had read for a whole year, but was stranded on the word 'everlasting.' It hoisted her boat from the sand bar, and she sailed off with perfect ease. She wields the sword of the Spirit, and has gained one of her opponents—a Freewill Baptist. He was so overjoyed to see his Bible so clear and plain on 'life and death' and the resurrection, that he thought his brethren would receive it. As they thought a good deal of him and he of them, they called a meeting with a charge of preaching an erroneous doctrine contrary to the rules of their church. The articles of their faith required them to take the Bible as their rule of faith and practice. The brother took his stand on this. The minister and church labored half a day and could not sustain their charge nor meet his argument. They finally requested him to take a letter of recommendation to join any other church he pleased. Thus Bro. Burnham's tract has done good execution. I had a minister and 'steward' to work at me, or more particular behind my back; yet I kept lending and circulating books; the people were eager to read, to know what I did believe, for I was branded with 'infidel,' 'no soulite,' and other odious names. The result is not all named in the above.

I had the satisfaction, one week ago, of hearing a good able sermon from Bro. E. on the kingdom of God on the earth; he traces from Abraham, Isaac and Jacob down through the Bible, and gave us a discourse that his adversaries cannot meet. This brother has got both sword and spirit with him. He preached formerly for the Wesleyans, and when he preached a whole sermon, from one solitary text, he was of good reputation; but now he handles the word of the Lord skillfully, yet his reputation seems to be more like his Master's.

There was a fine young man who had just passed through college came to me one day. He entered into conversation. Was a man of high toned feeling, yet was disgusted with the endless misery theory. I lent him Bro. C. F. Hudson's work on 'Debt and Grace.' He read it with great care. When he had read it through once, I inquired how he liked it; he liked it so well he wanted to read it through again; and he read it the third time, and said he had read Edward Beecher's work on "The Conflict of Ages," but had never seen any thing before that appeared to harmonize with the character of God. He believed God was all he was represented to be in the Scriptures, and that man was a finite being and incapable of committing infinite acts; therefore he could not believe in endless misery, and had rejected it altogether. This work of Bro. Hudson's had given him much light, and he felt perfectly settled on future punishment, and adopted the view of the destruction of the wicked. He has stored up much of Bro. H.'s theology, and advocates it among theologians. You see the machinery works well. Your names are becoming familiar; your hearts are entering in and feeding hungry souls.

There was such a combined influence against me, it seemed they would crush me into the earth; but I faced the enemy and scattered these books. I kept diligently circulating them, and talking, and the books have proved a bulwark against the enemy, and I rejoice that I have had these helps. I have been through quite a trial. I would like to tell you of my experience, but do not feel quite able; but this much I will say, the Lord has been my helper. There is just as much virtue in Christ now as there ever was; and I believe he is as willing, but oh! where is the faith, in the earth, or on the earth? This is most lost sight of. No wonder, when we come to see that the church is going into almost every nook and corner where the Lord has not bid her go. But truly the Lord is helping me, and glory be to his name.

Bro. E. preaches next Sabbath again. His health is quite poor. He has got what the doctor calls a cancer in the bowels. It is on the inside, and has now eaten through to the outside. He is not able to labor every Sabbath as he used to do, but says he shall try to preach God's truth if he has to sleep under a log nights, and eat boots for a living. This expression was made by him to a deacon of a —— christian church, who had refused to let him have a donation that was raised for him after he had been laboring the most of three weeks, and about twenty conversions had occurred. He was to come at a time appointed and receive it, but the deacon had heard that he was a 'no soulite,' and refused to let him have it. I will send you two dollars for Bro. E., and will finish it up at some future time.

I feel desirous to live to see more of the light and truth spread, and feel I would be willing to suffer all that may come by my humbly taking sides with truth. I am much encouraged, and am joyful in the Lord, believing that our King will soon come and end the controversy. Glory to God in the highest.

Your Bro. in Christ."

Well, Bro., I am glad to hear so good a report from the field of battle. Fight on. I wish you could tell some of your old experience in the ears of some tobacco raisers and workers that I know of, and teach them that it is safe to do right, and trust in God as to the results. By the way, one sister I know has decided to raise no tobacco on her place this year. I wish the Lord would put every raiser, worker and user of tobacco under conviction, and He would if their consciences were not seared by it.

But enough. I could'nt help thinking of old times, when we used to talk together of God's faithfulness to us. About Bro. E.—, I pray God to give him plenty of the best kind of "roots" to eat, and fruit and grains to go with them. As for sleeping under the logs, I hope he will have blankets, boards and shingles for covering. Take good care of him, Bro. O.; you need'nt send me any more pay for books on his account. Give him the dimes, and tell him to trust in God to the end. He will get out of the way of cancers by and by. I mean to take care and not work too hard, but I have been working too hard for a long while. Work still presses. I shall do the best I can. Keep the fire burning out there all you can.

I have tracts on hand for free distribution. Let all who wish them send in their orders. Your Bro. H. L. Hastings.

Providence, R. I., July 30th, 1860.

Savoy Campmeeting.

Once more,

"On the mountain top appearing,
Lo, the sacred heralds stand!"

Brethren, pray that they may bring "welcome news," and come with a realizing sense of the impending advent of Jesus. Brethren, come with the armor of God, come with the spirit of Christ, come to labor for the Lord, as those who are bought with a price.

"Has thy night been long and mournful?
Have thy friends unfaithful proved?
Cease thy mourning;
Zion still is well beloved."

Correspondence.

From L. P. Judson.

Bro. Grant:—After I wrote you last, I visited a considerable portion of Central and Northern Illinois, although there were many places I desired to visit, but did not find it convenient. Central and Northern Illinois is a splendid section of country. The lands are generally prairie, but undulating sufficiently to give action to the waters and prevent stagnation. The soil is very rich. This year yields an abundant harvest. Its healthfulness much exceeded my expectations. Think it will average with Western New York. There has been considerable attention paid to the subject of education. Many places are favored with good Academic and other institutions of learning. Churches exist to a greater or less extent, in nearly all parts. Very few places are found where there is not occasional, not to say frequent preaching of some kind.

But the churches of those who are looking for the coming and kingdom of our blessed Lord, are few and far between when compared to the multitude. They are more as isolated individuals, scattered, with occasionally two or three families in a township or locality. We have a custom in this county where I reside, (Niagara, N. Y.) which I would commend to the favorable consideration of friends thus situated. We meet every alternate Saturday P. M. for conference and prayer. We meet early, so as to have plenty of time, and when the way is open, we hold more public services the next day. Our social gatherings are generally in the house of some brother, so that we feel more like the children of a family, meeting for a season, than a public assembly, convened for religious worship. If those who are living at a distance of a few miles from each other would adopt this or some similar mode, I have no doubt they would be greatly interested and benefitted.

I found but very few preaching brethren, and those I did see were not devoting their entire time to the work. I found Bro. Needham at Bulkley, Iroquois Co., Ill., in good health and spirits. He has a small farm of eighty acres paid for, and has a comfortable house on it, with a small orchard. This year his crops, in common with others, are very promising. These blessings he has secured by industry and through the kindness of friends, since he has been at the West. He has several places where he dispenses the word, forming a kind of circuit. But there are many more calls for labor than he can supply. He has pressing invitations to visit adjoining counties and preach. I feel that the cause needs the benefit of this brother's entire time devoted to study and the proclamation of the good news. Brethren, assist him. In this solicitation, I have simply expressed my own heart. It is alone from the interest I feel in the good cause.

Lockport, N. Y.

From A. E.

Bro. Grant:—Bro. and Sr. Mansfield have been at this place twice, and given us eight lectures in all, and to crowded houses. These are the first who have ever, to my knowledge, held forth here the doctrines of the Bible as we understand them, and the impression has been very good among nearly all classes. The Methodists kindly allowed us the use of their house, and many came out to hear. There is still a desire to hear, and we hope that we can get them back again this fall to preach the word of life. Spiritualism prevails to a great extent, and popular religion also. They talk not of the return of their Lord in all of his glory, that would be too much like heresy, except he were made the gloomy messenger of death. I fear that they are looking for that only for which they are prepared, viz., death, for I verily believe but few are prepared for life.

There have been several efforts of a protracted nature here and all to no purpose, and the effect, if any, has been to confirm men in their evil practices. When will these things cease? When will men cease to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God? Thank God! the time is coming when all these things will be forever wiped out, when righteousness and peace shall fill the earth as the waters now cover the sea. God will have a clean universe, and I rejoice in it. "Let thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is done in Heaven." Bro. Grant, continue to blow the trumpet. Soon the walls of Satan's kingdom will fall, and all God's children triumph.

Jonesville, Mich., June 5th.

From Bro. T. W. Smith.

Bro. Grant:—I feel under great obligations to you and to Bro. Hastings for your kindness toward me, in sending papers and tracts. I loan the papers to friends, and give the tracts away. I told you in a former article that I was determined to preach the truth at all hazards. A few Sundays ago I was called upon to supply the pulpit of a friend down town. I took the text in the morning—"Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." I tried to examine some few theories that I thought could not be proved, particularly the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. I said before I began I [illegible] speak on that point, that I doubted very much if there was one present who agreed with me in this matter, yet, said I, what I say, I feel to be the truth, and therefore must proclaim it. Take my arguments to the Bible; if you prove them true, receive them, if not, reject them.

After meeting, a stranger came forward and grasped me by the hand, saying, "Thank God, brother, there is one can agree with you;" and he said he felt glad that I spoke on that matter. At noon, I found four more who admitted that I was right, and that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and undying spirits, etc., could not be true. In the evening I found another, who said he was convinced of the error of the common theory. He wanted some little works to help him in finding the truth. May the little leaven sown leaven the whole lump.

I think the Crisis the best paper I ever had the pleasure to peruse. It is worth its weight in gold. I wish I could send you the weight of a thousand copies in gold for free circulation. I find a great field here for work, and with the aid of tracts I can spread the Bible doctrines with success.

Bro. E. H. Plummer of the Philadelphia Christian Conference, is now preaching the true faith, and more are gradually coming over.

Philadelphia.

From S. M. James.

Bro. Grant.—I am striving to gain the kingdom which is to be given to the saints. What a blessed promise we have given us if we overcome the world and its temptations! I want to be one of that number that shall be reckoned worthy, when Christ comes with all his saints. What a blessed hope is ours! Have we not reason to rejoice? What are all the jeers and scoffs of this world when compared to the joys that are to come! Hope points us to a land where sin can never come. Faith grasps the promises of God; and grace stands ready to assist. It is our duty to act like men and women who are determined to gain victory. Victory! let it be our motto,—victory over the world, the flesh and the devil. What anthems of praise will be sounded through the new earth when victory is finally accomplished! Shall I be there to join in the universal song that shall fill heaven's high dome? O Lord, assist, is my prayer.

Let me among the saints be found
Whene'er the archangel's trump shall sound,
To see thy smiling face.

Brother, be encouraged; your labors will soon be o'er, and your weary feet will rest on Immanuel's shore. The dark night of time will soon be past; already the morning rays begin to dawn, and soon the Sun of Righteousness will come forth in all his regal splendor, with a retinue of shining ones, to take his throne triumphant. Hail, blessed morn! when earth shall smile in gladness. Let our prayers, brethren and sisters, be united that we may live a life of self-sacrifice, and labor to discharge every duty. Yours in hope of soon gaining rest.

From Elder M. Batchelor.

Bro. Grant:—I feel I ought to give my testimony once more on the great things of the kingdom near. The kingdom to come has been the object of expectation by the church for thousands of years. For this we are taught to pray "Thy kingdom come," etc. To the establishment of it were the church directed to look, when they shall receive their reward. For it they suffered. —2 Thess. 1: 5. It is promised to those that love him.—James 2: 5. Its extent will be under the whole heavens. Its duration will be eternal. Its character righteousness. Then there will be one Lord, and his name one. It has its place in prophetic history. It is the fifth and last of kingdoms. Three have past; the fourth has passed through all its different forms down to the last named in prophecy. Ships, guns, powder, balls, swords, spears, and other combustible materials, are preparing for the last great battle, in which the controversy will be settled. No peace until this kingdom is established.

Truly upon us is the end of the world or age to come. The distress of the nations is beginning. Yes, and all these are but the beginning of sorrows. Brethren, lift up your heads, for your redemption is near. Let us carry out the exhortation of Pet. in his second epistle, first chapter, fifth to seventh verses. So an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Peace be with you all.

Obituary Notices.

Died in Dorchester, N. H., June 23d., of consumption, Henry S., son of Simon and Mary T. Taylor, aged twenty-one years and seven months.

The funeral services were observed on Tuesday, June 26th. Elder S. Hinckley, of Canaan, preached from words found in Job 19; 25, 26, 27, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," etc. Sung at close, "There'll be no sorrow there." [illegible] Henry S. seemed for some years past troubled with consumptive symptoms; again and again have we heard his cough, beheld his countenance grow pale and thin, yet disease did not take [illegible] bloomed around him, when the fatal destroyer appeared to renew its attacks, and the young man began to fail. Many means were resorted to, but all was unavailing as to any permanent good, and he lingered for a year.

At this time he had not made an open profession of religion; but parents' prayers are not in vain; he was not left to go down to the grave without leaving an evidence that he sleeps in Jesus. A series of meetings commenced, which he attended, and there made known his resolution to serve God. Means were still used for the recovery of health. As Summer puts on her foliage of green, exhausted nature sinks, and the spirit goes to God who gave it, there to rest till the morning of the resurrection, when we are expecting it will be re-united with the body, and he stand with all the redeemed of earth, clothed with the bright robes of immortality. When asked, a short time before he died, if his trust was in Jesus, he answered, "yes." He also said, "Tell them all to get religion, and get it in season," referring, as we suppose, to his brothers and sisters. Oh! that all would give heed to this admonition.

Our Henry's gone, we trust, to rest;
But in the morning of the blest
We hope he'll then be caused to rise,
To meet the Savior in the skies.

With all who loved the Savior here
He then in glory will appear;
Then let us choose that better part,
And serve the Lord with fervent heart.

M. T. Taylor.

Died, at South Livonia, Livingston Co., N. Y., Aug. 3d., Sister Powell, wife of Bro. Stephen B. Powell, aged 38.

Sister Powell died in full hope of the soon appearing of our Lord and the resurrection from the dead. A few days before her decease symptoms indicated that she was dying. The neighbors congregated at the house, and while around her bed, she, with earnest words and Scripture language told them of the coming of Christ and the resurrection as being the only hope, and exhorted them to to be prepared for that day.

The funeral sermon was from the words of Christ,—"I am the resurrection and the life." The occasion was one of feeling and interest. God grant it may prove one of profit in the end.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per Europa. Advices to the 28th ult.

Two of Garibaldi's agents are in Liverpool to purchase a small flotilla of steamships, and send them out as soon as possible. Another agent of Palermo was also there, commissioned to purchase a certain quantity of rifles, and likewise a number of large cannon.

Twelve vessels have been raised at Sebastopol, including a sixty-gun frigate, in good condition. The American contractor continues to pay attention to the reparation of the cemeteries.

The dispatches from Syria contain a repetition of all those harrowing details which have already been published. They confirm all that has been said of the vacillation of the Mahommedan authorities, and of the sanguinary cruelty of the Druses. Large numbers of the natives are abandoning their homes, and leaving the country; the mission stations have been broken up, and the country is the scene of general desolation.

SICILY.

Genoa, July 27. It is stated that Garibaldi suffered great losses in the engagement near Melazzo, and that he was wounded in the foot. He ordered several of the inhabitants of Melazzo to be shot for having fought against him. The Neapolitans had 580 men hors de combat, and after a desperate combat withdrew to the citadel.

Naples, July 21. The Monette, French war steamer, arrived yesterday morning from Palermo, as also the Iroquois, United States steamer, and we have an influx of Sicilian intelligence. There had been three engagements near Messina, in the first of which Garibaldi's forces suffered severely. A telegram from the theatre of war, dated Miro, July 17th, 2 A. M., thus speaks:

"Medici to the Dictator.—The enemy renews the attack with great energy and greater force. Three thousand men are fighting on our right against five hundred of ours. The fight lasts for more than two hours, with a well maintained fire. The enemy has bombs and cannon, with positions well chosen; he resists energetically. Two charges with the bayonet on the part of our men decide the day. The enemy retired to Milazzo; has suffered severe losses in killed and wounded. We have few killed, but a great number wounded. We have made some prisoners. The spirit of the volunteers is admirable.

The most devoted chief, Antonio Ludaro."

When Garibaldi left Palermo on the 18th, he embarked on board a Liverpool steamer, the City of Aberdeen, which had on board 1000 troops, and set sail in the direction of Messina. He had previously issued the following short and characteristic proclamation:

"The Italian Continent sends me her sons in great numbers, at the call of the oppressed, I march with them to Messina.

There, I expect the brave Sicilian youth. There we will seal for the third time the compact against tyrants, which is to burst the last rings of our chains, and lay the last stone of the national edifice.

At Catalafimi and Palermo, the sons of this soil were not called upon in vain by Joseph Garibaldi.

New York, Aug. 11. The steamship Adriatic, from Southampton, of Wednesday, Aug. 1st, has arrived.

All British war steamers in the dock yards are to be made ready for the next emergency.

By a Military Convention between Garibaldi and General Clary, the Neapolitans are to keep the forts of Syracuse, Agosta, and Messina. The navigation of the Straits of Messina to be free. The Garibaldi colors will take equal rank with the Neapolitan flag. The citadel of Messina will not fire on the town.

It was rumored that the Royal troops were about to evacuate the citadel of Messina; hostilities were suspended.

Naples was tranquil, but agitation prevailed in the Provinces.

Napoleon's letter to the French Ambassador at London, dated 25th July, is published. He says: Since the peace of Villafranca, I have had but one thought, one object, to inaugurate a new era of peace and to live on the best terms with my neighbors and especially with England. I had renounced Savoy and Nice. The extraordinary additions to Piedmont alone caused me to resume the desire to see reunited to France these provinces essentially French. But it is objected to. "You wish for peace and you increase immoderately the military forces of France." I deny the fact in every sense. My army and fleet have in them nothing of a threatening character. My steam navy is even far from being equal to our requirements, and the number of steamers does not nearly equal that [illegible] amount 60,000 in Algeria, 6000 at Rome, 8000 in China, 20,000 Gendarmes and the sick and new conscripts, and you will see my Regiments are of smaller effective strength than during the preceding reign. The only addition to the army list has been the creation of the Imperial Guard. Moreover, while wishing for peace, I desire also to organize the forces of the country on the best possible footing, for, if foreigners have only seen the bright side of the last war, I, close at hand, have witnessed the defects of the army, and wish to remedy them. Having said this much, I will add, that since Villafranca, I have neither done, nor even thought of any things which would alarm any one. When Lavallette started for Constantinople, the instructions which I gave to him were confined to this:—"Use every effort to maintain the status quo. The interests of France is that Turkey should live as long as possible."

Napoleon then touches on Syrian affairs, saying his first thought in the matter was to come to an understanding with England, and asks what other interest than that of humanity could induce me to send troops to that country?

He also says that the interior organization of France and the increase of her resources are full vast enough for his ambition and sufficient to satisfy it.

He says: "It was difficult for me to come to an understanding with England on the subject of Central Italy, because I was bound by the peace of Villafranca."

As to Southern Italy he says, "I am free from engagements, and ask nothing better than to act in concert with England on this point as on others. But in Heaven's name let the eminent men at the head of the English government lay aside petty jealousies and unjust mistrusts. Let us understand one another in good faith like honest men as we are, and not like thieves who desire to cheat each other. To sum up—this is my inmost thought. I desire Italy should obtain peace, no matter how, but without foreign intervention, and that my troops may be able to quit Rome without compromising the security of the Pope. I could very much wish not to be obliged to undertake this Syrian expedition, and, in any case, not to undertake it alone—firstly, because it will be a very great expense, and secondly, because I feel that this intervention may involve the Eastern question. But on the other hand, I do not see how to resist public opinion in my country, which will never understand that we can leave unpunished not only the massacre of Christians, but the burning of our Consulates, the insult to our flag, and the pillage of the monasteries which were under our protection."

The London Times, while still distrusting the Emperor, is glad of any occasion which has elicited the profession of such friendly sentiments, and trusts they foreshadow a policy under which England may enjoy peace without being compelled longer to support all the burdens of war.

France has assented to the Neapolitan proposal that the French and English fleets should cruise off Calabria to prevent the landing of Garibaldi's troops.

The Pope has decided not to quit Rome.

A Vienna letter says, "Notice has just been given to the clerks employed in the Government offices that they must abstain from all political discussions, and immediately leave any company in which such subjects should be introduced in their presence. Any infraction of that regulation will expose them to dismissal."

Marseilles, July 23d. Letters from Constantinople announce fresh violences at Aleppo, Orfa and other places in Asia.

It has again been confirmed that the Turkish soldiers took part in the massacre.

Editorial Notices.

Bellows Falls to Campmeeting.—The fare is now reduced from Bellows Falls to Wilbraham. See campmeeting notice. Those from the North, between Bellows Falls and Springfield, will get campmeeting tickets when they get to Springfield, which will take them to Wilbraham and return.

Remember full fare must be paid from all places between Albany and Pittsfield, and also from all places between Bellows Falls and Springfield; and free return passes will be given by the campmeeting committee; but those who take the cars at North Adams, Pittsfield, and all stations East, should call for campmeeting tickets, which will return them free.

Celestial Rail Road.—A new and important Tract, just published by J. V. Himes. 36 pages. $2.50 per 100; 4 cts. single. May be had at this office, and of the publisher, 13 Washington street.

Notices, &c.

English Bibles.

We would call the attention of our friends to the fine assortment of English Bibles which we have imported, ranging in price from $1 00 to $2 50, exclusive of postage. It is a rare chance for those in want of the precious book, to send for them now to this office, where they can have them in Morocco, Roan or colored calf binding, with marginal or reference between the verses. We shall have a goodly assortment at the Wilbraham campmeeting, if the Lord will.

Notice.

I shall preach a sermon on the 30th anniversary of my labors, in Boston, Sabbath, Aug. 19th, at 3 o'clock, P. M., in the Advent Chapel in Hudson Street. All my old parishioners and friends are invited to attend.

J. V. Himes.

Eld. Edwin Burnham will preach in the Hudson Street Chapel, Aug. 26th, all day.

J. V. H.

Notice.

The Lord will, there will be a conference in Reading, Hillsdale Co., Mich., to commence the 5th of September, and continue over Lord's day. Bro. F. H. Berick will preach. He will also tarry in that section over two Lord's days, and preach as Bro. A. N. Seymore may arrange. Come, brethren, and sisters, lay aside your farms and merchandise for a few days, and listen to the word. In behalf of the Church.

D. R. Mansfield.

Notice.

The Lord will, there will be a conference in Buchanan, Mich., to commence on the evening of the 19th of Sept. and continue over Lord's day. Bro. F. H. Berick will be present to preach the word. We trust our brethren will take advantage of this opportunity. In behalf of the church,

D. R. Mansfield.

Notice.

The [illegible]th session of the Shell Rock Christian Quarterly Conference will be held at New Hartford, Butler Co., Iowa, commencing Aug. [illegible], to continue over the Lord's day, [illegible]

P. S. W. Dist.

General Campmeeting at Wilbraham, Mass.

Providence permitting, a general campmeeting will commence at Wilbraham, on the old ground upon the hill, Monday, Aug. 20th, and continue one week.

This meeting is pleasantly located in a neighborhood noted for sustaining good order, and for acts of kindness towards those who assemble there from year to year to worship the God of our fathers. We anticipate a large gathering of the Lord's dear children, and that much good will be accomplished. Those who were present last year will remember that the great object of the meeting was for the salvation of sinners, and the comfort of saints, and that the effort was greatly blessed. We hope that our brethren and sisters will come again this year, strong in the Lord, and bring their unconverted children and neighbors for the purpose of persuading them to be christians.

All who believe in Christ as our Savior, and are willing to labor for the salvation of sinners, are invited to take part in the meetings. We would earnestly request all to make this meeting a subject of special prayer, that many wanderers may be reclaimed, the saints greatly strengthened, and the name of the Lord magnified among the people.

Ample accommodations will be provided for board and horse keeping. Board at 50 cents per day; or one shilling per meal for breakfast and supper, and 25 cents for dinner. The fare is reduced to half price on the Western R. R., which will be $2.50 from Boston, for both ways.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co. by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have free return passes by application to Geo. T. Adams, 167 Hanover street, Boston, Mass., when they purchase their Western tickets for the camp ground. Those coming from Albany will pay full fare to the camp ground, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee. Those coming from North Adams, Pittsfield, and intermediate places, also from Worcester and intermediate stations, will call for campmeeting tickets at the ticket offices.

Those coming on the Connecticut River R. R. from Bellows Falls, Vt., and intermediate stations, will pay full fare, and receive free return passes from the Campmeeting Committee.

N. B. All who wish to take the cars from Boston for the campmeeting, should remember that they can obtain their tickets only at Geo. T. Adams', 167 Hanover Street, where they may be obtained any day during the meeting. Cars leave the depot in Beach street at 6 o'clock, A. M. and 1.30 P. M.

R. E. Ladd, Hiram Munger, Geo. T. Adams, } Committee of Arrangements.

Boarding Notice.

After consultation with many of our preaching and lay brethren, we have thought it advisable not to issue free board tickets at the boarding tent this year. 1. Because it is not right that the whole amount of this burden should fall on us. 2. Because it opens a door for imposition to be practised by a plea of poverty from some who are able and ought to pay for their board. The preachers who are accredited among the brethren where they are known, and those that are really poor that are with us, will be boarded, and a special collection will be taken up for the purpose of giving all an opportunity of sharing in this expense. This seems to us to be just and right; and as we propose to place the price of board at 50 cts. per day, or at one shilling for breakfast and supper and 25 cts. for dinner, it will give a margin for this collection to those that board at the public table as well as others. It is our intention to make our friends, who rely on us to supply their wants, as comfortable as possible, and shall make an additional outlay to secure this end. But shall, after all we can do, have to ask the forbearance and charitable feelings of brethren towards us even with our best endeavors. By God's blessing and aid we will do as near right as we can, and leave it all with Him whom we love and serve, and to the judgment of the brethren.

Hiram Munger.

Campmeeting.

The Westford campmeeting is to commence on Tuesday, Aug. 28th, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a very pleasant location, near the depot, about eight miles from Lowell, on the Stony Brook Railroad. We think that tickets from Boston and back will be half price, as last year,—one dollar. This meeting will not interfere with the meeting at Wilbraham, being one week after. Those who can, and choose so to do, may attend both. We hope that all who can will make it duty as well as a privilege to be at this meeting. We doubt not the arrangement and management of the meeting on the part of the committee will be perfectly satisfactory, as they were last year. The meeting will be conducted on free christian principles. Come then, one and all, with the heart full of the love of Jesus and his word, with a mind to be good, do good, and get good, and so enjoy that liberality with which those are blessed who enjoy the freedom of the gospel.

J. S. White.

Quarterly Conference.

The next session of the Western Central Quarterly Conference in Maine will commence Thursday, Aug. 23d, at 1 o'clock, P. M., in Rome Town House, and continue over the Sabbath. Will all the ministers, and as many others as can, come to the work, and come in the work, praying for God's blessing upon the people. We want to see sinners converted, and God's word to run among the christians. Call on Brn. David Watson, Fletcher, Blaisdell, Martin, etc.

H. B. Sevey, Chairman.
I. C. Wellcome, Secretary.

Richmond, Me., July 25th, 1860.

Campmeeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a campmeeting in Levant, Me., commencing Sept. 17th and continue one week.

The cause of truth demands that the church should make an effort to give new impetus to the cause, by a general gathering of the brethren and sisters to comfort and strengthen one another with the words of truth. We expect this meeting will result in good to the church and exert a salutary influence upon community. The people want to hear the reasons of our hope. Let all come that can. Begin now to plan your business so that you can come. Begin to pray about it, talk about it, and get your tents ready for the camp. Above all, do not forget that you will need on the armor, so that you may be ready for the work as soon as you get on the field of battle. Brethren, make your business bend to this meeting. Get your Lamb, and come up to sacrifice to the Lord. If you have not a lamb, take a kid, or a pair of doves, only let your heart be in the work and God will bless you.

J. Hemenway, for the brethren.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Ct., commencing Sept. 3d, and continue over Sunday. The meeting will be holden on the old ground, a few rods from the Housatonic R. R. Depot. Arrangements will be made for boarding and horse keeping. We shall expect these preachers present, [illegible]

Notice.

A grove meeting will be held in the Anderson neighborhood, three miles south-west of Elenboro, Erie Co., Pa., August 25th, at 1-1-2 o'clock, P. M., and Sunday 26th at 10 A. M. We hope to see the friends of Jesus from the surrounding country at these meetings.

John T. Oakley, Evangelist.

Quarterly Meeting.

The first Quarterly meeting of the General Association of the Church of God, in Western N. Y., will be held at East Springwater, commencing Friday evening, August 24th, and continue over the following Sunday. We have a beautiful grove which will be fitted for the meeting on Sunday.

A general invitation to ministers and laymen is hereby given. We hope to have a general gathering of the lovers of Bible truth from the surrounding country at this meeting.

B. M. Morris, A. L. Hunt, Elijah Wetmore, } Committee of Arrangements.
T. G. Newman, Secretary.

Savoy Campmeeting.

This meeting will commence Aug. 27th, and continue one week. The object of this meeting is to persuade men to accept of the gospel, and be saved in the kingdom of God. Then come, brethren and sisters, one and all, in the spirit of labor and love, and let us have a feast of fat things on the mountain top. Efficient laborers in the gospel will be present to preach the word of life. The committee wish to say, that no pains will be spared in trying to supply the wants of the brethren and public generally; and are confident from last year's experience that we can meet them more acceptably. Board and horse keeping will be furnished on reasonable terms.

E. M'Culloch, Rufus Starks, J. E. Healy, } Committee.

Campmeeting.

There will be a Second Advent Campmeeting in Harmony Grove, Westford, Mass., to commence Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 1860, and continue over the following Sunday. This is a delightful location, convenient, within five minutes' walk of the depot, and near the village, where any can get lodging who do not wish to sleep in tents. This meeting is for no sect or party purposes; our object is infinitely higher,—the saving of men by the preaching of the Gospel in its happy adaptation to the present times.

Come, all ye lovers of Jesus, from hill and vale, from city and town, to the grove this year. Make the sacrifice, lay aside the means, help the poor, and all come to this feast. Pray over it, and come with a mind to work by faith, expecting the salvation of men. Those who wish can provide their own board, and bring the whole family with little expense. Bring tents and bedding. Tents and board will be provided on the ground for all who wish on reasonable terms.

L. Boutell, Groton; M. H. Corliss, Lowell; E. Heath, Lyon; S. Ayers, Worcester; M. M. Young, East Boston, Committee.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld. W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

For the Crisis.

"My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you."—John 14: 27.

Let the chilling breezes blow, all is well, all is well;
Let the tear of anguish flow, all is well;
Let the heart in sadness beat,
Still I can bow at Jesus' feet,
And feel that all is well.

Let sickness be my lot, all is well, all is well;
Let me be by friends forgot, yet all is well;
Let poverty my steps attend,
For in heaven I've still a Friend,
He is rich, and all is well.

Let dark temptations hover near, all is well, all is well;
Let all depart I hold most dear; still all is well;
This promise stands and long has stood,
All things work for our best good
When faithful to our Lord; all is well.

Come, ye weary laden, come; all is well, all is well;
In Father's house there still is room, where all is well;
The bride says come, the Spirit, too,
Is waiting now, poor soul, for you,
To make all well.

For the Crisis.

The Prayer of Faith.

The following article has been in my hands for several weeks, and I now send it to the Crisis for insertion. I wish to preface it with a few brief remarks.

My Diary for 1856 has this entry:—"Monday, June 16th. At home. Elder Wilson called on me. Wrote letters for him. P. M. Came to Nicholas Gould's—found Annie G. in awful spasms—was called home to see J. Wilson,—called back to see Annie, and watched with Annie with Mrs. ——."

The scenes of that day I cannot easily forget. I had the previous Thursday returned to my flock in Peacedale, after an absence of nearly three months. While busy with accumulated cares, I was told that Annie Gould, the daughter of one of our brethren, a member of the Baptist church, was lying at the point of death. In company with my wife and some sisters, I repaired to the house, and entered the room. There I saw the most distressing sight I had ever witnessed. Upon a bed, surrounded by friends, lay the sick one in a severe spasm. Her muscles were rigid, her teeth set, her head thrown backward, her neck stiff, her eyes rolled back in their sockets, and streams of blood and bloody froth issuing from both corners of her mouth.

Severe physical exertion had nearly prostrated her, and at the same time a storm of slander, as malignant as Satan could well invent, had crushed her spirit in the dust, and she longed for repose in that place "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." These circumstances operated so that she was thrown into spasms. A physician was called, who administered various remedies. During one of her spasms she was raised by her arm, and the result was an internal injury in the region of the left bronchia or lung, which caused the hemorrhage which I have mentioned. In this condition I found her, given up to die, and longing herself for the refuge from ills which the grave alone can afford.

After some effort, by rubbing her hands and feet, we brought her to consciousness, prayed with her, and left; but were immediately called back, as she was attacked again with a spasm. In short, we watched that child for six successive nights; and one or both of us were prevailed on by the entreaties of friends and the terrible necessities of her case, to attend her closely day and night, with the assistance of others, for about five months; when, after repeated consultations with an able physician, and all the medical wisdom which I possessed, combined with the most careful nursing, we were able to leave her in the hands of her friends and depart for Rochester, N. Y. Since then I have seen and heard from her frequently, and can bear witness to the story of her great feebleness and infirmity. During the months that she was under the care of myself and wife, I presume we saw her have not less than five hundred spasms—perhaps three times that number—each of which rendered her unconscious, and caused a recurrence of her hemorrhage, [illegible] enjoyed all the [illegible] by slanderers [illegible] who fall beneath [illegible] leave her to tell [illegible] statement for [illegible] till I could [illegible] it. She has [illegible] seen her at [illegible] view of it all, I give glory to God that I have here a fresh demonstration of what I have long known, that the prayer of faith shall save the sick.

I do not tell this to convert infidels, sceptics, or spiritualists. I have other arguments for them. I do not wish this to be put specially in their way. I do not desire to cast such pearls before them, or put myself where they can turn up their noses, and say that I am a liar,—but to those who believe God, and who know me, and who have confidence that it is not easier for Christ to forgive sins than it is for him to say arise, take up thy bed and walk. I present these facts praying that God may bless them to the strengthening of the faith of all believers who may read them.

STATEMENT OF SISTER ANNIE GOULD.

BELOVED BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—For the first time I address you through the much loved Crisis. Doubtless many of you who read these lines will remember the sick and suffering one who was with Bro. H. L. Hastings and wife at the Wilbraham campmeeting, four years ago next August. I had then been sick since the previous June. I returned home, after an absence of about three months, but very little better than when I left; and if at times I flattered myself there was some hope of my recovery, and that I was gaining strength, ere many days were passed, my fond hopes would vanish, and leave me more disheartened than before; for the least exertion would cause me to raise blood, and the old pain in my side and lungs to return with redoubled force. My nights were passed in sleepless agony, and in longing for the morning light to come, when my cough, which seemed to be gradually tearing my life out, would in a measure subside. Thus week after week, and month after month passed away. I did not leave my room from October until the March following.

Through the spring I was very feeble, and often thought that soon I should rest by the side of my sleeping mother, whose love and tender care I had never known since a child of five years. And oh, blame me not, brethren and sisters, if I say I looked forward to that time with anxious yearnings of heart, for I was so tired of living and knowing scarcely a moment's ease from pain. But still my heavenly Father saw fit to let me live, and I endeavored to repine not at the just decree of Providence, for well I knew "He tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb," and in him I put my trust.

I continued feeble through the spring; and when summer came with its joyous sunshine, and all nature looked smiling and happy, there was still no relief for me. In July I was again attacked with spasms, and for over two months lay at the point of death, insensible to all around me, while friends were hourly expecting the summons would come to call me hence. But God willed it otherwise, and I was again permitted to rise from my bed and walk around the room with assistance; but scarcely a day passed without my raising blood, sometimes two or three times in the course of the day, and fainting almost every hour.

The third year of my illness was spent in New London, Ct. I was carried there from Peacedale, R. I., the autumn previous, to visit my friends, thinking the change would do me good, and expecting to stop there but a little while; but was unable to be brought home until a year from that time; and although I could walk about some when I went, I was soon prostrated upon my bed. A physician, Dr. L. P. Weaver, was sent for, and God was pleased to bless the means used by him for my partial recovery. Dr. W. proved to be a skillful physician, and a kind friend. May God reward him for his kindness to the poor, weary one. I was under his care nearly eight months before I was able to come from New London to Peacedale, and then it was with much suffering I endured the journey; and when the weather became cold, the little strength I had been so long gaining left me, and many thought human nature could stand but little more.

Thus three years and ten months of my life passed away. In looking over that time I had thought I was spared for something, I knew not what; and that I should perhaps in some way be restored to health. I had been often asked if I could not obtain faith to be healed? I believed God was able to do it, but could not lay hold on his promises as mine until the first of last March. At that time a brother came to see me, and conversed on the subject. I consented to pray for the Lord to increase my faith. Soon my desire for life began to increase. I felt that I had a duty to perform,—that I must be up and doing, for God had need of laborers in his vineyard. When the Quarterly Conference met at Peacedale, I felt it my duty to send for some of the brethren to come and pray with me; but I was tempted and put it off, when it came to me so forcibly that I was [illegible] feeling [illegible], I sent for Bro. B. and others to come and pray with me, firmly believing that God would answer prayer, and I should be healed! [illegible]

Sunday, Apr. 29th, Brn. J. T. Dixon and P. C. Rodman, elders of the church at Peacedale, with some sisters of the church, came to see me, as had been their custom during my sickness. I thought then, "Why is God not just as willing to hear and answer prayer now as at any other time?" I believed he was, and that his promises were "Yea and Amen in Christ Jesus." I knew he had said in his holy word, "The prayer of faith shall save the sick." They knelt in prayer. I knew that God was there. I felt his Spirit, and was confident that I should then and there be healed. Bro. Dixon led in prayer. Bro. Rodman followed. God was with them. My feelings it would be impossible fully to describe. I felt like wrestling with God to answer then, for I could not let him go until I had the blessing. And praise be to his holy Name, he did answer. Never before did I experience such sensations. I felt as if an electric shock had passed through me, and it seemed as if the room was illuminated with the glory of God. I arose from the lounge. My pains, which had been many and severe, left me, and I could go about the house as well as any one present. I went into rooms I had not been in before for two years. It was about four o'clock when I was healed. At two I had a turn of raising blood, but have raised none since. My cough has left me, and I have now no pain in my side and lungs. Have been to two evening meetings this week, and visited many of my friends.

There are some probably among the unbelieving who will doubt the truth of this; but there are others who will not hesitate to declare it to be the work of Him whom they delight to serve. With the hope that it will encourage and strengthen the faith of such, and that some poor suffering child might read this, and thus be led to apply to the Great Physician for relief, I have been influenced to give a sketch of what the Lord hath brought me through.

I would say to those who are afflicted, remember that there is a God in Israel who will heal you without money and without price. He will not torture you by trying experiments, nor by drawing blisters and sores. His medicine is very sweet. It heals mental as well as bodily ills, and it is such as none but He can give. O! then, go to him, rely on the promises of your Maker, and all will be well.

Dear brethren and sisters, the Lord has been truly good to me, and my determination is to serve him while I live. Let us all be faithful a little longer, and "He that is to come will come and will not tarry." He will come to gather his ransomed home. There will be no sickness, no sorrow there, but all will be joy unspeakable. Jesus will soon appear. Let us gain the kingdom. It will pay well to take up the cross and follow Jesus. Although there are many of you whom I never expect to meet in this world, my prayer is that we may meet in a better and brighter land, and all worship together around the great white throne. May God bless you all, is the daily prayer of your sister in Christ. ANNIE GOULD.

For the Crisis.

Controversial.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—My opponent has given you his views of Hades, and I believe they are very popular views. But what does he say? Why, that hades, rendered hell in our common version of the Scriptures, means not the grave, but the place of the dead, that is to say, the place where the departed spirits of all dead men live. That in hades there are two compartments—the one is Paradise, and the other Tartarus—the former a place of delight, an Elysium, and the latter he says is "a place of torment." Now I beg you to notice, first, according to his own criticism we are informed that hades expresses precisely the same as the Hebrew Sheol. You will then please to read Eccl. 9: 10—"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, (Heb. sheol,) whither thou goest." Question: If there is no knowledge nor wisdom in Sheol (Gr. hades,) by what logic is it proved to be a place of delight or torment?

Again, if demons or devils are now cast down to hell, or tarus—de facto, as is affirmed—and yet this tartarus is a place of torment,—with what propriety did demons ask our Savior if he had come to torment them before the time? Did they not realize that they were already in "a place of torment?"

But again: Demons are in the darkness of our atmosphere—entering at times into men, and once into swine; and Diabolos, their chief, is the prince of the power of the air, going up and down the earth, seeking whom he may destroy. Now if in the meantime he and his be in Tartarus, and Tartarus is one of the compartments of Hades, the place of departed spirits, pray why is it not then proven beyond controversy that the place of torment—the dwelling place of departed spirits—is the air or atmosphere surrounding this earth? And then why is not Spiritualism a truth in its fundamental [illegible]? Once more, Rev. 20: 14.—"And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." [illegible] would do [illegible] hell (hades) entire—with its two compartments, its Paradise as well as its Tartarus—will be cast into the lake of fire? Is Paradise to be destroyed again? and that in a lake of fire? Or will my opponent assume—I say, will he assume, that the delightful part of Hades—the Paradisiacal part—will be saved from such an ordeal? But granting even this, will he tell us for what purpose the other part of Hades—the Tartarus part—the place of torment, is to be put into a lake of fire? Is the place of torment to be put in the lake of fire to burn up, or to make it more tormenting? Can he tell us that, or can he, as "a philosopher," tell us the why and wherefore of such an arrangement?

Finally, I ask, can he give us a single plain and pointed passage of scripture, in proof of his position? Pardon me for saying it, but until this can be done, I must deny that he has either scriptural, or rational—a logical, or metaphysical, reason for his position. P. B. M.

Selections.

Come to Jesus.

Listen, fellow-sinner. How kind, how wonderful an invitation is this! God speaks to THEE. The Father says, "COME!" The SON says, "COME!" The Holy Spirit says, "COME!" Many poor sinners who have accepted the call, join their voices in the appeal, and say, "COME TO JESUS." When he was himself on earth, he tenderly said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," Matt. 11: 28–30. What he said then, he says NOW! The invitation he gave to the men of that day, he gives to THEE, fellow-sinner! "Come unto me!"

"Come unto me!"

He promises rest. But far better than rest of body is rest of soul. It is wretched to be a slave, to groan, bleed, toil; but far worse to be Satan's bondsman, dragging about an evil conscience and an aching heart. Rest from this cannot be had but by coming to Jesus. And if we come, he will lighten every other load. Are you poor? Come, and he will make you rich forever. Are you sick? Come, and he will cure your worst disease. Are you sad? Come, and he will wipe away your tears. Are you bereaved? Come, and he will be to you a brother in adversity, who changes not, and never dies. Is sin a burden? Oh then come to Jesus, and he will take it all away. Do you dread the day of death and judgment? Come, and that day will be the dawn of life and glory. Oh then come! To be merely called by such a person should be enough to make us glad. Of a stranger we might say, "Perhaps he intends me no good;" of a selfish rich man, "Who can expect ought from him?" But if a Howard or a Wilberforce said to a mourner, "Come!" he might feel quite sure some kindness was intended. Now He who invites thee, sinner, is both able and willing to help you. He has clothes and food for the naked, hungry and perishing, wealth for the poor, eternal life for all. His very word,—"Come,"—is enough to make thee glad. A blind beggar by the wayside, hearing he was passing, cried out, "Mercy, Mercy!" The people told him to be quiet; but he shouted the louder, "Have mercy on me!" Jesus invited him; and then some said, as though quite sure of a blessing, "Be of good comfort;—he calleth thee." They knew Jesus never called, and then refused; and so they told him to rejoice. Sinner, be you of good cheer. The same Jesus calleth thee. As the blind man threw off his cloak lest it should hinder him, do you cast off every sin that would stop you,—rush through every crowd of difficulties, and, falling at the feet of Jesus, say, "Have mercy on me!—I am blind!—I am lost!—save, or I perish." Are you too great a sinner? The more need to come. Have you a wicked heart? With that wicked heart come. Have you nothing with which to purchase his favor? "Without money," come. Rich and poor, master and servant, old and young, white man and black, sinners of every class, COME. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Acts 14; 31.

Questions.

1. What part of Adam did God address himself to when he said, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" soul, spirit, body, or the whole man just as he had made him?

2. Which told the truth, the Lord or the serpent? The Lord said to Adam in relation to eating the forbidden fruit, "Thou shalt surely die," etc. It seems to me that when my brethren say that man is immortal, and must live on through an endless eternity, either in happiness or misery, they confirm what the serpent said.

3. Did Adam ever get back into the garden after he was turned out, and eat of the tree of life? If he did not, how could he live forever? Was not this the very reason why Christ was sent into the world, that man might come unto him and "have eternal life?" Is not "eternal life the gift of God through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ?" These are questions for my professed orthodox brethren to decide.—Advent Review.

Swearing.

Howard, the philanthropist, was standing in a crowd by the door of a post-office, when a man uttered a volley of oaths. "Look to your pockets!" cried Howard, buttoning up his own tightly; "always take care of your pockets when you find yourself amongst swearers. He who will take God's name in vain will think little of taking your purse, or doing anything else that is evil."

A worthy clothier in Edinburgh was accustomed, previous to engaging his clerks, to put the question to them directly, "Do you swear?—if so, you need not think of entering my house." [illegible] fire of hell. [illegible]

"My lads," said a christian captain to the crew when about to take command of the ship, "I am going to ask you a favor, which, as a Briton, I expect will be granted by a crew of Britons. What say you, my lads, are you willing to grant your new captain a favor?" "Ay, ay!" shouted all hands; "let us be told what it is." "Well, my lads, it is that you will allow me to swear the first oath in this ship; no man on board must swear till I do. What say you, my lads, will you grant me this favor?" The jolly tars stared, and stood for a moment quite at a loss what to say. "They were taken," as one of them described it, "all aback." "They were brought up," as another described it, "all standing." The appeal seemed so reasonable, and the manner of the captain so kind and prepossessing, that a general burst from the ship's company answered, "We will, sir!"

What Shall I Do?

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Give prayers; the evening hath begun;
Be earlier than the rising sun;
Remember those who feel the rod;
Remember those who know not God.
His hand can boundless blessings give;
Breathe prayers; through them the soul shall live.

Give alms; the needy sink with pain;
The orphans mourn; the crushed complain;
Give freely; hoarded gold is cursed,
A prey to robbers and to rust;
Christ, through his poor, a claim doth make;
Give gladly, for our Savior's sake.

Give books; they live when you are dead;
Light on the darkened mind they shed;
Good seed they sow from age to age,
Through all this mortal pilgrimage.
They nurse the germs of holy trust,
They wake untired when you are dust.

Give smiles to cheer the little child,
A stranger on this thorny wild;
It bringeth love, its guard to be—
It, helpless, asketh love of thee.
Howe'er by fortune's gift unblessed,
Give smiles to childhood's guileless breast.

Give words, kind words, to those who err;
Remorse doth need a comforter.
Though in temptation's wiles they fall,
Condemn not—we are sinners all.
With the sweet charity of speech
Give words that heal, and words that teach.

Give thought, give energy to themes
That perish not like folly's dreams.
Hark! from the islands of the sea
The missionary cries to thee;
To aid him on a heathen soil,
Give thought, give energy, give toil.

Wickedness in the World.

The Bible never makes me infidel. It never throws a shade of doubt over my mind. I run to it as I run to a refuge from the summer heat. It is a joy and comfort to my soul. It is the staff on which I lean. But when I go out of the Bible, and look at human life as it is, its tendency is to weaken my faith, and carry me toward infidelity. Why, out of eight hundred million people on the face of the globe to-day, it is understood that there are only two hundred million within the bounds of christianity! What, then, is the moral condition of six hundred million of our fellow beings? They are heathen—they are rooted through and through with abominable heathenism! And look at the two hundred million nominal christians.

Blessed christians are those in Italy! Splendid christians are those in Austria! Great christians are the serfs, packed and huddled together in christian countries of Europe! Yet all these go to make up the two hundred million christians on the globe. And if from these two hundred million you exclude all that christians themselves exclude in talking about each other, there are only about two dozen real christians in the world, after all! But, not to exercise such a narrow and mean charity as this, not to be governed by any such metaphysical nicety as this, but forming our judgment in the largest and most tolerant way, there are probably not more than a hundred thousand of those that ordinarily call themselves christians, who prove themselves to be such by a moral life, by sweetness of disposition, by any approach to obedience to the Divine will.—Beecher.

"The Greatest Heresy."

"Popery?" No. "Pelagianism?" No. "Socinianism?" No. None of these. What can it be? A more general and widely diffused error than either named. It creeps into families and disturbs their harmony. It lurks in neighborhoods and sets friends at variance. It steals into churches and destroys their peace. It nestles down in editorial chairs and gives to the many-tongued press its bitter words. It strides the hobbies of reform and turns them into centaurs of fury. It gets into the councils of society, and curdles their charity with its acids. It stands on either side of the imaginary line that divides a nation into sections, and hurls poisoned arrows from one side to the other. It is the very essence and incarnation of the mischief-making principle, and the arch-enemy of the gospel of Christ. What can it be? we hear from north, south, east, and west.

Must we answer, when the very nature of the heresy is such that the subject of it is almost invariably, and by a kind of fatal necessity, unconscious of its power, and only by divine grace is ever freed from the hateful scourge? A careful reading of the thirteenth chapter of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, will confirm the assertion of an excellent Divine, that "the greatest heresy is want of love."—Amer. Messenger.

VALUABLE PRESENTS.—Some one speaking of New Year's presents, says, "The best thing to give to your enemy is, forgiveness; to your opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to your children, a good example; to your father, deference; to your mother, love; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity; to God, obedience."

A Suggestion for Family Worship.

There is a family in this State in which the Scriptures have been read daily for more than a quarter of a century; and in this reading the children have been greatly interested, one after another, from the time they were old enough to speak. The father, to secure this interest, and make the service pleasant to each child, has practiced pausing here and there in the chapter, and asking this or that child to repeat the last words or lines read, selecting the easiest words for the youngest child, and perhaps asking of an older child an exposition of a verse or phrase. In this way the constant attention of each child is secured, as neither the oldest nor the youngest is willing to lose a sentence, lest he should be called upon to repeat it, and not be able.—Examiner.

Reform.

BRO. GRANT:—The following article is published in the Christian Advocate and Journal. I have thought that a perusal of it might be profitable to some of our brethren who read the Crisis. It is designed for the "Clergy," but if its sentiments are correct, (and I think they are,) it will apply with equal force to every one who names the name of Jesus. "Dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—2 Cor. 7: 1.

R. WAKEFIELD.

"THE CLERGY—TOBACCO."

"To reason with men against the sinful indulgence of their appetites is too often a thankless service. This appears, how frequently, in the case of the impenitent; again and again in the case of the mere professing christian, and not unfrequently is it found to be unavailing with even the christian minister himself. In no wise does the uselessness of such reasoning appear more plainly with the latter class of individuals, than when they are remonstrated with respecting the use of tobacco. Not a few of the ministers of the pure and self-denying Jesus, it is sad to say, are chargeable with this vice, (for vice it is.) Tobacco, like arsenic and alchohol, is neither food nor drink; it affords no element which is at home in the human system; by nature it is foreign or hostile to it; no particle of the substance becomes incorporated into the body either as fluid or solid, either as bone, muscle, sinew, nerve, or aught else belonging thereto. On the contrary, it is well known that the healthy, underanged human organism is pained and irritated by the introduction into it of the smallest portion; nor does it cease its efforts to expel it as an unwelcome intruder and dangerous enemy. Its habitual use, therefore, sinks to the low level of indulgence—self-indulgence, sinful self-indulgence, the self-indulgence of perverted appetite, identical in nature with that of the drunkard, the opium eater, and the glutton.

It would seem that nothing more than the above needs be stated to lay the professing christian, and especially the christian minister under a sacred obligation to refrain from the use of this narcotic. Need they require expostulation, entreaty, rebuke, to induce them "not to make provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof?" Alas! that one called by the name of christian should be so wanting in regard for that holy purity of life which the profession of christianity demands! I am aware that many otherwise excellent and useful men are addicted to this pernicious habit, (for less than this it cannot be called,) but this is the mischief. Were it the vile and ignorant only that indulge in the weed, a crusade might be preached against it with some prospect of success. It is the respectability which it obtains by the example of the cultivated, the learned, the otherwise virtuous and useful that renders it impossible, availingly, to lift up one's voice against it.

So it was some thirty years since with respect to intoxicating liquors; then many a professing christian visited his sideboard oftener than his closet; and many a deacon and class-leader was brought to his knees as frequently through the humiliation of old Jamaica, as of a broken heart and a contrite spirit; while the minister not seldom would pass from the retirement of his study to the morning service, after having renewed his spiritual strength by a closer communion with his decanter than with his God. Who can observe the spittoons in some pulpits, (and the floors in many meeting-houses,) [illegible] than sulphurous fumes to be found in some parsonages; or see, as one occasionally may, a portly blood of a preacher parading the street with a cigar in his mouth, without thinking that, considering the times, these are not a whit better than the tippling, alcohol-inspired parson of other days? I grant that such a preacher may be exceedingly independent; he may puff away with the utmost nonchalance; but the question arises whether he is not too independent for the pure and holy religion of which he is an [illegible] minister? Is he not indifferent also to the moral deformity of self-indulgence, [illegible] "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself [illegible]" May the Lord grant [illegible] array the intelligent and moral portion of the community as strongly, at least, against health-destroying, body-contaminating, wife-annoying, home-defiling, and church-desecrating tobacco, as they are already arrayed against the demon, alcohol. Christ's ministers may then find in common prudence a motive sufficient for the disuse of the filthy weed.

Would that all now might find it where they should, namely, in the high duty personally to exhibit to the world characters dignified and adorned by a holy, Christ-like, self-denial." W. E. P.

The Daily Baptism.

Nature has provided the human body with not less than seven million avenues through which the effete matter is carried off. When we take a sudden cold these minute canals are closed, and the infinitesimal streams set back towards the fountains of life, and are discharged into the internal organs and cavities of the body, corrupting and corroding the elements and channels of the circulation, and interrupting the harmony of the vital forces and the organic action. When one steps into his bath Nature returns a grateful oblation through these seven million open mouths! There is a renovating power in the daily ablution, whatever may be thought of the baptismal ceremony as practised in the church.

"The perspiratory pores in a square inch on the palm of the hand are three thousand five hundred and twenty-eight in number, with each of which a little tube, a quarter of an inch long, is connected, making the length of tube in a square inch eight hundred and eighty-two inches, or seventy-two and one-half feet; on the pulp of the finger the number of pores is a little greater; on the heel the number is two thousand two hundred and fifty-eight, and the length of the tube is forty-seven feet. Taking two thousand eight hundred as an average of the number of pores in a square inch over the whole surface of the body, and seven hundred consequently as the length of the tube in inches, the surface in a man of ordinary size being two thousand five hundred square inches, there would be seven million pores and one million seven hundred and fifty thousand inches, or nearly twenty-eight miles of perspiratory tube.—Ex.

Cure for In-growing Nails.

It is stated, by a correspondent, that cauterization by hot tallow is an immediate cure for in-growing nails. He says: "The patient on whom I first tried this was a young lady, who had been unable to put on a shoe for several months, and decidedly the worst case I have ever seen. The edge of the nail was deeply undermined; the granulations formed a high ridge, partly covered with skin, and pus constantly oozed from the root of the nail; the whole toe was swollen, and extremely tender and painful. My mode of proceeding was this: I put a very small piece of tallow in a spoon, and heated it over a lamp until it became very hot, and dropped two or three drops between the nail and granulations. The effect was almost magical. Pain and tenderness were at once relieved, and in a few days the granulations were all gone, the diseased parts dry and destitute of feeling, and the edge of the nail exposed so as to admit of being pared away without any inconvenience. The cure was complete, and the trouble never returned. I have tried this plan repeatedly since, with the most satisfactory results. The operation causes but little if any pain, if the tallow is properly heated. A repetition might, in some cases, be necessary—although I never have met with a case that did not yield to one application. Admitting the theory of Dr. Lorinser to be correct, the modus operandi is very plainly to be seen. The liquid cautery insinuates itself in every interstice, under the nail, accomplishing in one minute, without pain, all that can be effected by the painful application of nitrate of silver for several weeks.—Medical and Surgical Journal.

Living on Excitement.

He lives the longest who eats plain, substantial food, and drinks pure water, other things being equal. But many prefer highly seasoned and mixed dishes and stimulating drinks. All such persons die before their time, usually from inanition or wasting disease of the bowels. As certainly will the mind suffer declining vigor and efficiency, its stimulants being novel reading and a morbid thirst for new things.—Hall's Journal.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION,

Payable in Advance.

For a single copy one year	$1.00
For a single copy 6 months	1.00
For a single copy 3 months	.50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.00
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address, 6 months	15.00
Thirty copies to one address, 6 months	[illegible]

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the paper within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send as much in addition [illegible]

The Morning Call.—Rom. 13: 11.

TUNE—Midnight Hour.

The Morning Call in mercy sounds,
The faithful Watchman lifts his voice;
Its thrilling tones re-echo round,
To bid the saints rejoice.
Now virgins rise, break forth and sing
The glorious Advent of our King;
The Morning Call in mercy sounds—
Go forth to meet your Lord.

Blow! Watchman, blow a joyful sound!
For dark and dangerous was the night;
And daring scoffers thickened round;
The evil servants smite
The faithful ones who watch-care keep,
With lamps well trimmed—nor can they sleep,
For the morning Call in mercy sounds,
Go forth to greet your Lord!

This Morning hour God's word sheds light;
Its brilliant rays dispel the gloom;
The pilgrim's pathway now grows bright—
The King is coming soon.
Now tune your harps once more and sing
Your sweetest strains to Zion's King.
The Morning Call now joyful sounds—
Go forth to greet your Lord!

Behold! He comes—the Mighty One—
Ye virgins, rise! go forth and meet!
Dry up your tears! The King doth come,
His joyful bride to greet.
The trumpet sounds—the day has broke—
The living changed—the dead awoke,
To blend their songs in gushing strains,
All hail! Messiah reigns!

"Come" and "Go"—or Preaching and Practice.

I do not believe there is one who, having arrived at years of discretion, is not capable of giving a bit of good advice. There are some, no doubt, so utterly depraved as neither to give or take it; yet they might if they like, but they won't. There are others, however, who strive to live the good they teach. But by far the greater numbers, in a general way, recommend the theory of virtue, and say to the world at large, go practice it; at the same time they live a "free and easy" life themselves, thinking that they did their part by occasionally "luffing," to fire a blank cartridge at the devil.

Such work is like the aforesaid firing, all report and no execution; for I am sceptical that heartless preaching ever did lasting good. The "mote and beam" controversy is but a recrimination; for the lifeless professor, reproving the man with the optical mote, is apt to get twitted about the beam in his own eye. For instance, if I be a drunkard, how could I say to the tobacco chewer, "Leave off that filthy habit?" And vice versa. This is on the "go" system or preaching without practice. It will never do much good for a man to preach truth, honesty, and piety, if he lie or prevaricate, which is almost as bad; swindle, or otherwise outrage the moral obligations. How can a minister teach the doctrine of patience and love, when from the desk he hurls upon his hearers cutting personalities, laying on the lash of reproach and bitter invective, forgetful of God's work in his desire to avenge himself of some real or imaginary injury? The man who, under cover of religion and from the sacred eminence of the pulpit, undertakes to flog his congregation, is too much like a minion of popery, and is nothing but a clerical bully and a meddling priest. A preacher may be very earnest and pressing in his admonitions, but let love be at the bottom, and pervade counsel and censure, lest he might perchance offend one of those little ones for whom Christ died.

All men should be christian, but especially those who go forth to preach the gospel of the loving, merciful, long suffering Redeemer. A man may devote his talents, property and life to the propagation of a truth, and miss his acceptance with God at last, simply because he lacked that charity or love which consecrates the sacrifice. The christian is a soldier ever armed, ever fighting, or on the watch. As a leader, or a follower, or both,—for indeed he should be both,—he ought ever to show by his example that he supported the doctrine which he teaches. If a general, on the field of battle, ordered a regiment to go and storm a battery which was sending its deadly [illegible] their ranks, no matter how hopeless the task, under an iron discipline they might move to certain death, with the steady tramp of resolute despair; but picture to yourselves a man like the chivalrous Garibaldi placing himself at their head, and with waving sword exclaiming, "Follow me!" with what a cheer and a rush would they close upon the foe, and have their flag placed upon the enemy's redoubts, before those merely under discipline could move an hundred rods. So much for the "come" system, or preaching with practice.

The "come" system is adopted by God in his thrilling, yearning appeals to the sinner. There is a most earnest desire to conciliate, and win back the fierce rebel to his King. Listen to it: "Come, now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." O, my God, forgive me for ever spurning such love as this! Hearken again to the words of the Savior, whose lips distil peace, and whose heart overflows with the mighty love which drew him from the bosom of the Father. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—Matt. 11: 28. To the thirsty he says, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink."—John 7: 37. This was a reiteration of the universal invitation thus given through Isaiah, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money come; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." And this invitation stands conspicuous in the very last verses of the Revelations, that the poor weary sinner may not overlook the bountiful provision made for him. "And the Spirit and the bride say, come. And let him that heareth say, come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely.

If such language does not teach a free offer of salvation to every creature, and upset the doctrine of election and reprobation, there is no understanding of the Bible.

O, my dear friends, let us ever say, come, COME; and with our love and example, we may do more for the salvation of sinners, and lead more to Christ, than could be driven in with a million whips or heartless admonitions. JNO. F. COTTON.

For the Crisis.

"Go, work in my Vineyard!"

I recently read the following from the pen of a young man of talent and ability, who is not entirely destitute of the knowledge of God, or of the truth as it is in Jesus:

"I believe that I have told you now nearly all the missionary work that I have done since I have been in California,—nothing at all. I hesitate somewhat in telling you of my own spiritual condition. It is an old monotonous story. I am called in mind even more frequently than I have ever been before, and I feel more and more impressed with a sense of the fact, that your people have the gospel truth. When I came to California, I postponed my purpose of joining you in your labors until I should have acquired enough of this world's goods to enable me to live and work independent of all. Now that I have about obtained that competency, the Lord seems to demand the fulfillment of the tardy vow. What a merciful God, thus to have prolonged his blessed invitation to a person like me!"

At the risk of being thought intrusive or offensive, I wish to say a few things, which, while they may or may not, reach and benefit the writer of the above, will at least relieve my heart of a load that presses on it, and may perhaps reach and benefit some others to whom what I say may apply.

First, then, let me say, I am no sectarian. I answer to no party names but such as the Holy Ghost has given. In the language of Baxter, "I am a christian, a mere christian, nothing but a christian." I am bound by no creeds or confessions, and I stand pledged only to what I write or speak, and to that only so long as I believe it to be truth. I subscribe to the Bible; the words of the Holy Spirit are my rule of faith, and I desire that my practice shall conform to them.

I know no man after the flesh. I honor no man because he may be in some measure associated with me. Gladly would I be free from association with some who do not follow Christ. I am a companion of all them that fear God, and I hold that christian love is greater than either faith or hope. No sectarian title, whether it be Baptist, Methodist, Orthodox or Adventist, opens the door of my heart to him that bears it. "If any man have not the SPIRIT OF CHRIST, he IS NONE OF HIS." To my mind the human race are divided into two grand classes—saints and sinners. I thus estimate them. The line of division cuts through the heart of every sect under heaven. I would be associated with the godly and the faithful; and I will not be entangled with, or responsible for, the acts, sins, blunders, follies or iniquities of sinners, hypocrites and backsliders, whatever may be their faith, profession, or sectarian title.

I am not, however, indifferent to matters of faith. I have a faith, a "precious faith," and a hope, a "blessed hope," for both of which I believe good reasons can be given.

And among the things which I firmly believe is this; that we are living in the concluding period of the gospel dispensation, and that the salvation and redemption of the people of God is now emphatically at hand. I am no prophet. I do not "know the time and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." I have listened, in time past, to the positive and definite statements of some with sadness, and have beheld their disappointment with sympathy, but without surprise. I have witnessed the overaction and reaction, and the indifference and prejudice consequent upon such occurrences. I have sometimes followed in the track, and endeavored to gather together the fragments and remnants which have survived, thus strengthening the things that remain, that are ready to die; but amid all the disappointment and discouragement, I am still unshaken in my expectations of speedy deliverance. And my faith does not rest upon the assertions of great men, or the authority of learned men, which indeed are not wanting; but upon the sure word of prophecy. The lapse of years; the accomplishment of ancient predictions in ages gone; the fulfillment of many prophecies before our eyes; the moral condition of the world and of the church,—all these conspire to teach us, and voices of providence and prophecy alike thunder in the ears of a godless world the solemn cry: "REPENT FOR THE KINGDOM OF GOD IS AT HAND."

Now all this is contrary to the spirit and the expectations of the present age. Good men doubt it, great men dispute it, small men deny it, and even watchmen who have overslept themselves, wander about, calling the hours of midnight when the morning light is reddening the eastern skies, and their lanterns are growing dim beneath the rising glory that is soon to unfold itself.

And now what is to be done? If the coming of the Lord draweth nigh—if the great day of the Lord is near and hasteth greatly, what then is our duty? What do God and his church, and the age with its boundless activities demand of us?

I address my brethren, and especially, "I write unto you, young men, for ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you." Some of you have rare talents—some of you have culture, and have enjoyed educational opportunities to which I have been a stranger. You are entering upon life—mature or active life. Before you, fame holds out her chaplet, and honor waves her palm. Before you, wealth exhibits her treasures, and luxury unfolds her pomp. But there is a God! There is another age and another world. There is a hell and there is a heaven. There is a life to which this is as a drop to the ocean, as an atom to the universe. There is a judgment seat, and you and I must stand there certainly, and stand there soon. There is a Christ. O how he bled and died for you and me! He took it upon him to bear the world's guilt in his own body—the world's anguish in his own heart. He has bought us and paid for us with his precious blood. He has died that we might live. He has kept us from the terrible rocks on which others around us have been shipwrecked and lost. Has Christ any claims upon us? Can we repudiate them? Shall we honor them? The Judge standeth before the door. Shall we be found of him in peace?

God moves upon our hearts by his Spirit. This is the only tie that binds us to God. All sins may be forgiven till the Holy Spirit is insulted and driven away; then we are beyond hope. That Spirit leads the children of God. It indites their prayers—it helps their infirmities. It comforts, teaches and strengthens them with might in the inner man. It shall finally quicken their mortal bodies to glorious and deathless life. But if grieved, despised and rejected, it leaves us and we perish. For

"There is a time, we know not when,
A point, we know not where,
That marks the destiny of men
To glory or despair.

There is a line by us unseen
That crosses every path,
The hidden boundary between
God's patience and his wrath."

That which keeps us from perdition, that which leads us to the path of life, is the Holy Spirit of God. Is it safe to grieve it, to neglect its teachings, even for a single hour? Has the Holy Spirit no claims upon us? Shall we discharge the responsibilities which it imposes? Young men, God calls us. Christ calls us. The Holy Spirit calls us. Shall we heed these calls? To each obedient soul the mandate comes, "Go work in my vineyard!" The call is not to rest, but to toil; not to honor, but to shame; not to pleasure, but to pain; all this with the promise of Him who never lies, "What is right I will pay thee."

Is this a time to seek for pleasure, to heap up gold, to gather honors, to choose our own way? Shall we say to God, wait till I have done my will, and then I will perform yours? Shall we presume to know better than God our time and place and kind of labor? Shall we call upon the majesty of heaven to abide our pleasure? Are we the rulers and directors in the universe, and shall the Eternal listen to us if we despise his call? May there not come a time when he shall disdain our cries?

The whole question resolves itself into this: Will we obey God? Will we do what we know is duty? Shall we heed the voices of divine providence that swell like clarion-blasts in the ears of those that slumber idly in these perilous days? Shall we wake at the call of God that bids us rouse ourselves to duty? Shall we heed the voice of Christ, saying, "Go work in my vineyard?" Shall we listen to the admonitions of the Holy Spirit, which begets each holy desire within our hearts? Shall we obey? Shall we obey now?

Have we other plans? By what right do we plan contrary to the will of God? Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered? Shall we wait to get money? Does money, competence, wealth, that hardens the heart and blinds the mind and keeps a man from trusting in God,—does this prepare a man to preach the word of him who had not where to lay his head—who was cradled in a tavern manger, and buried in a stranger's grave? Did the apostles wait for this? How long must they have waited? Did Barnabas do thus when he sold his possessions and laid the money at the apostles' feet, and then went out to preach, with no cares to oppress him, or burdens to bow him down? Have not most of the men whom God has honored been poor men? Did not the prophets, of whom the world was not worthy, wander in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented? Did any of the apostles have much money, except Judas, who was a thief and bare the bag? Were not the ancient men of God men of exemplary poverty and humility? Was not Luther poor,—so poor that he was glad to turn wooden dishes for a living, even when he was known throughout all Europe? Where has God ever set his special seal upon the labors of the rich?

Do you seek wealth that you may be saved the privations that attend us who preach the word, and will not sell nor hire ourselves for gold? What are you better than we, or better than our Master? Is the cross too heavy to be borne? Is poverty for Christ's sake a dishonor to your souls? Would you be rich that you may preach the gospel freely? I have preached it as freely as you can, with but a shilling in my pocket. Can you not intersperse your preaching with tent-making or other labor, as did Paul, if necessity requires? Do you think it will be a favor to men to have men preach the gospel and refuse to receive of them the carnal things which they love to bestow? Do not they know that "it is more blessed for them to give than to receive?" Will not they incline to covetousness with such an example before them, and look first to self and secure a competence, and then think of serving God? Do you think to preach more independently with certain bank notes in your pocket which will obtain for you what you need? If so, you greatly mistake the value of money, or else misunderstand the strength of faith. Did ever Peter and John preach more boldly than when Peter had just said to the poor beggar, "Silver and gold have I none?" Ah, brother, there is something that makes a man bolder than money in the pocket does, and that is faith in God. He that believeth shall not make haste! No one shall hurry or frighten or shame him, though he be poor as Lazarus at the rich man's gate. All the gold of California cannot make a man so safe as that promise, so strong that our translators could not get out more than half the essence of Paul's five piled up negatives into the verse, "He hath said, I will never leave you nor forsake you"—or as the poet more fully expressed it,

"The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose,
I will not, I will not desert to its foes,
That soul, though all hell shall endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no NEVER, NO NEVER forsake."

With this word to rest upon, we may BOLDLY say, "The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me." Are you anxious as to your temporal support, and do you doubt whether you could get your living unless you hired out to some religious "lodge" to do their religion, or run their church at so much a year? O ye of little faith! How can you preach that men should believe God, while you are full of doubts? How can you trust God for life eternal, when you distrust his promises for temporal life. Hath not godliness the promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come? Can you not trust God for a piece of bread? Do you mean anything when you pray, "Give us this day our daily bread?" Do you believe that God "clothes the grass of the fields," and that "the very hairs of your head are all numbered?" Have these words ever failed? Why then distrust God? Said Jesus, when "I sent you forth without purse or scrip, lacked ye anything?" And they said "nothing, Lord." So say I, and every year I confirm the answer. In sickness and in health, the promise fails not. Meal is in the barrel and oil in the cruse. God liveth—let us trust him.

Will you wait then to obtain worldly gain when souls perish and the day of God rolls on apace? Who shall answer to God for the blood of those that die, while you neglect your work? Who shall give up an account for the one talent wrapped in a napkin and buried in the earth? Who shall answer for you before the throne of vast and dread award?

My brethren in Christ, AWAKE! The cause of God languishes because you fail to pray. Cry to the Lord of the harvest, and he will, in answer to your prayers, thrust these men forth into his field. The eleventh hour approaches. The householder goeth to the market-place, as it were, for the last time. To you, and YOU, he says, "Why stand ye here idle all the day long? Go work in my vineyard." Will you go?

I pray God to send you forth. Gladly would I do all this work. I cannot. My strength fails beneath numerous toils. Others fail, and if the toil is protracted long, their brown hair will lie damp in the silent sepulchre. The harvest is great, the laborers are few. They faint beneath their toil. O for strength from God! O for consecration, in the church, of body, soul, spirit, time, money, life and all, to God and his work! O for earnest, fervent, effectual prayer, that shall rise from every altar; that shall reach wayward sons and wandering daughters, and bring them to the yoke of Christ. O for an army of new laborers! fresh men, young men, strong men, wise men, holy men, men of God, of faith, of prayer, of power. Shall we see them with bright sickles coming to the harvest field? Shall we see them take up the mantles of the fallen, and fill the places of the faint? Shall we have help ere it is too late? "Help, Lord! for the godly man ceaseth, and the faithful fail from among the sons of men!" H. L. HASTINGS.

Sympathy.

Notwithstanding many pride themselves in possessing a mind sufficiently strong to remain unmoved at the affection of another,—declaring it a juvenile or feminine weakness to weep for another's sorrows; or on the other hand to move a muscle indicating heart-felt pleasure at the joy and prosperity of another; yet the sons and daughters of "Him that sitteth upon the circle of the earth" have received a command, through no less a medium than the apostle Paul, to "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." That is, he would have us feel in consequence of what another feels, instead of priding ourselves in stoical indifference, or marble dignity.

But, say some, I feel no emotions of grief at the distress of others. Well, I can only say, you must humble yourself before God, be converted and become like a little child; then you will no longer remain that cold-hearted, selfish being; but will just as naturally experience emotions of joy or grief, at the prosperity or adversity of Christ's members, as you would a pleasing or adverse affection of the members of your own person. What if the smallest and most extreme member of your person were severely bruised? Would you say you feel no sympathy? As sure as you feel, because that little member is affected, just as surely you will experience sorrow when a member of Christ's body is afflicted; at least, so I understand the apostle to teach in the 12th chap. of his first epistle to the Corinthians; one verse of which I will insert: "Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." It is true, that the mingling our tears with those who have been bereaved and afflicted, does not dry their tears, but as a very able writer remarks, "it may serve to dilute them," thus rendering the cup of grief less poignant. And who that claims any affinity to Jesus Christ will be so parsimonious as to withhold that, which in any measure serves to mitigate another's distress? Surely he must have received a very stinted measure (if indeed any at all) of the Spirit of Him who declared relative to his disciples, "In all their affliction he was afflicted," and again: "he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye."

Some may say it is not manlike to weep. That may be true; but if it is Godlike, we should not be ashamed to weep. "Jesus wept." And if he who knew more of the science and erudition of heaven and earth than any other being who has ever visited this planet, possessing sufficient strength of mind to withstand any temptation to self-indulgence, and finally, voluntarily give himself to suffer a death of crucifixion to save his enemies; if such an one wept, why should his disciples consider lachrymation beneath their dignity? Especially when it serves to discover what the apostle no doubt intended it should, our love for our fellow beings, and thereby enable us the better to reach them with the precious truths of the gospel.

I wonder not that stoical indifference and precision has obtained so largely among those who profess to be governed by popular etiquette instead of the etiquette of heaven. Heaven's etiquette is, that we should do to others as we would they should do by us. And who, and where is he that would receive the cold shoulder? No marvel that the cold, proud, unfeeling heart, can pass its fellow without even a recognition, a kind look, an encouraging word, a cheering smile, because, forsooth, the last happens to be less fortunate in the possession of certain trivial things which will soon perish with the using. The first mentioned feel, without doubt, some of that consequential dignity which characterized a certain heathen king while ambulating in his gorgeous palace, with the arrogant inquiry upon his lips, "Is not this great Babylon which I have built?" etc. No acknowledgement of an overruling power, but great I had done it all. I presume if some of the common people had chanced to have passed his majesty, his neck would have been as stiff as some of the modern's in this nineteenth century.

But weeping with those that weep does not fulfill all the injunction of the apostle; but in connection with this, he would add another test of our affectionate interest in the welfare of our fellow beings, which is to rejoice at the prosperity and happiness of another. The adherence to this part of the apostle's injunction is, to me, a more striking proof of friendship than the first, from the fact that no person will rejoice because another is happy, unless he is in reality a friend. And may we not safely enroll those among our list of friends, who rejoice because we are happy? For one I feel no hesitation in the matter, from the fact this criterion has proved safe thus far. Possibly, one might, while beholding another's distress, weep without being a real friend; but where can be found the one that rejoices because another rejoices, unless it be a bona-fide friend?

If there is a place where the truly benevolent soul will languish and suffer, methinks it is among those that pass for friends, but who by their words as well as their manner evince a sad uneasiness, while a bountiful providence pours its rich blessings on the first.

Will not all try to cultivate that plant of celestial origin, "True Benevolence," until its growth shall enable them to rejoice at another's joy? It is said our Savior "rejoiced in spirit," but it was not on account of blessings bestowed on himself, but because of the benefits conferred on others!

Shall we not all learn to go and do likewise, and thus disengage ourselves from the spirit of selfishness so rampant in these last days, and so detrimental to a growth in grace? BEULAH MATHEWSON.

Can You Believe?

1. Can you believe that all men are immortal, when God positively declares that man is mortal? Job 4: 17.

2. Can you believe that all men are immortal, when Paul says "God only hath immortality?" 1 Tim. 6: 15, 16.

3. Can you believe that all men are immortal, when Paul tells us that we must seek for immortality? Rom. 2: 6 and 7. What need of seeking for what we already possess? See Rom. 8th.

4. Can you believe that a heathen Socrates brought immortality to light, when God's word says it was brought to light by the Gospel? 2 Tim. 1: 10.

5. Can you believe that the soul will never die, when God declares "the soul that sinneth it shall die?" Ezek. 18: 4.

6. Can you believe this to be simply a spiritual death [illegible] Josh. 10: 25, 27, 32. Chap. 11: 11.

7. Can you believe that Samson believed in the undying nature of the soul, when he exclaimed, "Let my soul (margin) die with the Philistines?" Judges 16: 30.

8. Can you believe that Balaam believed in the endless existence of the soul, when he said, "Let my soul die the death of the righteous (marginal reading, which is correct)? Num. 23: 10.

9. Can you believe that David taught the undying nature of the soul, when he says, "God spared not their (the people's) soul from death?" Ps. 78: 50. And again when he said, "none can keep alive his own soul?" Ps. 22: 29.

10. Can you believe that the soul is immortal, when such an expression is not to be found in the whole Book of God, but teaches so positively that it dies?

11. Can you believe that God made the man's body and put a soul into it, when Paul says the first man was made a living soul? He did not make a soul and put it into him.

12. Can you believe that the dead know more than the living, when God's word plainly says "The dead know not anything?" Eccl. 9: 5, 6.

13. Can you believe that man's thoughts live on when the body dies and the breath goes forth, when David says, "In that very day his thoughts perish." Ps. 146: 3, 4.

14. Can you believe the dead are praising God in Heaven, when David says "The dead praise not the Lord?" Ps. 115: 17.

15. Can you believe that dead folks know more about the Lord than the living, when the Psalmist says, "In death there is no remembrance of Thee?" Ps. 6: 5.

16. Can you believe that David is now in Heaven, when Peter says he is both dead and buried, and that he has not yet ascended to the heavens? Acts 2: 29, 34.

17. Can you believe that there is any necessity of a future judgment and resurrection, if men are now in heaven and hell receiving their reward? If so, what is the use of bringing them out, judging them, and sending them back to the same place again? Has not God appointed a day to judge the world?

18. Can you believe that, when the judgment comes, he will call the dead from hell and heaven, when he says he will call them from their graves? John 5: 28.

19. Can you believe that Paul believed in and taught the doctrine that all the good of ages past are now in heaven, receiving their reward, when he said, "If the dead rise not, then . . . they also which are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished?" 1 Cor. 15: 18.

20. Can you believe that Paul esteemed the resurrection of as little worth as most men now do, when he said, "What advantageth it me if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die?" 1 Cor. 15: 32.

21. Can you believe that "death is the gate to endless joy," when Paul says it is an enemy? 1 Cor. 15: 26.

22. Can you believe that Paul expected his crown at death, when he says the Lord will give it him at His coming? 2 Tim. 4: 8.

23. Can you believe that murderers will live forever, when John declares that "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him?" John 3: 15.

24. Can you believe that the wicked will never cease to be, when God's word declares that "they shall be as though they had not been?" Obad. 1: 16, 25.

25. Can you believe that the wicked will live forever and never die, when God positively declares that "All the wicked will he destroy?" Ps. 145: 20.

26. Can you believe that wicked men will suffer eternal pain, when God says "They shall be burned up root and branch," and be destroyed, shall perish, be consumed, die, lose life, and come to an end, and shall not live out half their days. These terms are applied to the punishment of the wicked in about two hundred texts; 1st, The wicked will be punished. 2d, This punishment will be eternal. 3d, And will consist in destruction. Matt. 25: 46, 2 Thess. 1: 7, 10.

27. Kind reader, can you believe that God will leave you unmolested in the judgment, if you reject all the plain truths of his word. Eternal life is a gift through Christ, and not through our parents. Oh, fly to Jesus and live forever. [illegible]

For the Crisis.

Report of the R. I. State Conference Quarterly Meeting.

CENTRAL VILLAGE, COVENTRY, R. I.

Conference convened Thursday morning, June 28th, 1860, at 9 1-2 o'clock, Bro. Bellows presiding. Opened by singing, followed by prayer by S. W. Bishop.

Report of the last meeting was read and accepted. None of the delegates were prepared to report on the tract resolution passed at the last meeting,—continued for future report.

A call for other business was made, and there being none, the brethren agreed to spend the remainder of the forenoon in discussing the following question:—

"Are there promises in the Scriptures of truth to the literal descendants of Abraham yet unfulfilled, and to be fulfilled in the future?"

We had a pleasant and profitable season in comparing notes on the question, till noon, when we adjourned to the afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Afternoon. Being obliged to return home after the meeting, the brethren urged me to preach this afternoon, which I did from the text, 1 Tim. 6: 12, enjoying the season very much; and if I may judge from the earnest attention of the brethren during the discourse, and the animated remarks following, it was enjoyed by them also. Bro. Brower preached a good solid discourse on Wednesday evening, before the conference commenced, on Heb. 5: 9.

Friday morning, 8 1-2 o'clock. Conference met as appointed, and was opened by prayer, Bro. Bellows in the chair. The clerk being absent, J. P. Babcock was chosen clerk pro. tem. The delegate from Exeter church made some remarks, showing that church to be in a good condition. Bro. H. F. Carpenter, as delegate from the church at Danielsonville, Conn., presented their request to join the conference, which was accepted, and the church received. Bro. Carpenter spoke of the church as being in a flourishing state. There was some discussion in regard to where the next meeting should be, and the conference finally adjourned to meet at Danielsonville, Conn., Sept. 6th, 1860. The remaining exercises, which were reported by Bro. Bellows, I give in his own words.

"Thursday evening, Bro. Carpenter preached a very interesting discourse from Rev. 6: 7,—"The great day of his wrath is come," bringing out some important truths, and showing we are near the day of God.

Friday morning, assembled for conference and enjoyed a blessed season; the spirit of the Lord was with us in power; all could say it was good to be there; after which our aged Bro. Huntington preached a very comforting discourse from Isa. 60: 20,—"The days of thy mourning shall be ended." O! how we do love to hear the old fathers in the gospel bring out the solid truths of the Bible, combined with a large experience. He related some remarkable incidents in his own life, showing how the Lord had comforted him in the days of his mourning, in answer to prayer. We all could say it was good to be there.

Friday afternoon, Bro. Brewer preached a very instructive discourse on the seven vials, making it very plain from his large diagram that we have come down under the opening scenes of the seventh vial. It was truly solemn. The great events of the judgment rolling on, and the inhabitants of earth asleep. At seven o'clock in the evening met for prayer and conference; after which, Bro. Bishop preached an able discourse from 1 Thess. 5: 2, showing the Lord to be nigh at hand, by tracing down the stream of time on the prophetic chart. No one could fail to see that the end must soon come. Dear Brother, we had one of the best conferences that I ever enjoyed. I wish you could have stayed."

The Light Ship.

The Light Ship is now ready. It is not for me to say any thing in its favor, only that it has been written for a good purpose, and I hope and believe it will not fail of doing good. To those who are not sailors, the retail price will be 10 cents, postage 1 cent, which is cheap, with one-fourth off per dozen or more.

The tract cost more than I expected, but I have got it through, thanks to the sailors' friends. I trust the bread which they thus scatter upon the waters will return to them again after many days.

I must also thank Bro. J. T. Howland, Broadway, N. Y., for the beautiful wood cut which adorns the title page.

Send in your orders to the Crisis office, and keep the ball rolling as the sales from each edition shall, I hope, supply a constant free distribution to the seamen of all nations. Yours faithfully,

JNO. F. COTTON.

☞ Let us recollect the admonition of a famous man, that the humblest persons are bound to give an account of their leisure; and, in the midst of solitude, to be of some use to society. The spare minutes of a year are mighty laborers, if kept to their work. They overthrow and build up; dig or empty. There is a tradition in Barbary that the sea was once absorbed by ants.

☞ A word of kindness is seldom spoken in vain. It is a seed which, even when dropped by chance, springs up a flower.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, AUGUST 22, 1860.

No Paper Next Week.

We propose to give our compositors and office help a rest next week. They have discharged their duties in a very faithful and prompt manner during the last year, and we think it not unreasonable that they should have one week in a year to themselves. And more than this, we would like one week's freedom from editorial care ourselves; and we have chosen the time during the week of our great annual gathering at Wilbraham.

☞ As this is the last number but one of the volume, it is a good time to subscribe for the Crisis. We hope our friends will make an effort worthy of the important truths we advocate. Let every one try to obtain a new subscriber. Our subscription list is continually increasing, in consequence of the kind efforts of the lovers of truth; but as "the end of all things is at hand," let us all double our efforts.

Campmeetings.

We would say a word to those who attend campmeetings for the sake of receiving spiritual benefit. It often happens that people go to a campmeeting expecting to receive much good, and return disheartened and disgusted, much prejudiced against such meetings, with a determination never to go again; having come to the conclusion that the tented grove is a poor place to get religious strength. Others attend the same meeting, and think it the most heavenly one they ever enjoyed, receive great comfort, and feel its blessed effects for month's afterwards, remembering it with joy all their days. Why this difference? Some answer, "We are differently constituted." True, but we are fully satisfied that the cause does not lie in varied constitutions, because we find every variety of temperament, organization and education, enjoying or disliking camp and prayer meetings. Then there must be some other cause for the difference.

We think the point may be easily settled with a little observation. We have noticed, from several years experience, that invariably, those who enjoy the camp and prayer meetings, are the ones who take an active part in them; while those who receive no benefit, are, in nearly all cases, those who seldom, if ever, take an active position. To such, the meetings become a burden, and they soon seek enjoyment elsewhere, in the pleasures of the vain world. If such would at once engage with earnestness in the conference meetings at the encampment and elsewhere, they would be satisfied that it is not their temperament or constitution that prevents them from enjoying a good campmeeting or neighborhood prayer meeting; but their want of interest and labor in the vineyard of the Lord. For lack of action, they are like land long without rain, dry and unfruitful. The fallow ground of their hearts needs breaking up and moistening with the sweet influences of the Holy Spirit, which will not take place, so long as they refuse to work for the Lord.

A good campmeeting is one of the best places in the world for this class of people, if they will only enter at once into the prayer meetings, confess their wanderings, and do their part of the work. But if they go as idle spectators, they must expect no benefit, and will probably return from the meeting disgusted, having concluded that campmeetings do little or no good, and resolve never to go again, and wonder how others can enjoy them so well.

Men may go to campmeeting enjoying a good degree of the christian religion; but if they take the position of spectators instead of actors, they will enjoy less than they would to have remained at home, and will find themselves really losing ground, and backsliding from the Lord. Every one who would derive the greatest benefit from a campmeeting, should improve the earliest opportunity, after they arrive upon the ground, to take some part in a prayer meeting; commit yourself at once to the worship of the Lord, and improve every opportunity for doing good during the meeting, and you will find your spiritual strength greatly increased. All who expect to enjoy a campmeeting, should go determined to work for the Lord, if they would return full of love, joy and peace.

Again, those who would enjoy a prayer meeting on the campground, should not be listening to all the sounds from other meetings, and thus cause distraction in their minds; but attend wholly to the particular meeting in which they are engaged.

If you do not hear your favorite preacher as much as you would like; if some particular doctrine is not made so prominent as you wish; if some one talks or prays too long, or preaches something you do not believe; or anything else is out of order; do not be uneasy and talk unkindly about it; but show by your sweet smiling face, and kind words, that the love of Jesus reigns in your heart, producing forbearance and long-suffering; thus promoting the harmony and general good of the whole, while at the same time you add much to your own peace and joy.

Do not be satisfied without persuading some one to come to Jesus. Go talk with that young lady, that young man, that backslider, and in humble kindness ask them to follow Christ and become earnest christians. Remember, "He that winneth souls is wise."

Editorial Notices.

☞ We regret to say that we shall not be able to attend the Savoy campmeeting.

☞ Do not fail to read the article in another column, headed "hints to mothers." It is full of truth—important truth.

☞ The news from Rome, Constantinople and Syria is startling. The end is rapidly approaching. Those who are not ready, may soon find it too late for preparation. "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come."—Rev. 14: 7.

"THE LIGHT SHIP" is launched with good prospects of a prosperous voyage. We have not yet had time to inspect the beauty and harmony of its parts, but its general appearance is first rate.

"The Light Ship" is a tract of over sixty pages, for seamen, written by Bro. J. Fred. Cotton, in the dialogue style, which cannot fail to be interesting, judging from what we have seen from the pen of its author. For sale at the Crisis office. Price 10 cts. single, one-fourth off per dozen. Postage 1 cent.

Castleton.

The Lord is still doing a good work in Castleton, Vt. The truth has taken strong hold in this place, and is continually spreading, producing sweet peace and joy wherever received. We have never known an instance, during our eighteen years' experience and observation, where one heartily embraced these glorious truths that we love so well, which some are pleased to call heresy, and defended them with a christian spirit, but that they have found Jesus more than ever precious. On the other hand, we have never known one to be prospered or comforted in opposing them. We do not believe Christ is divided, and leading his children in opposing directions, like chaplains in two contending armies

It is very encouraging to hear the joyful testimonies, in this and other places, from those who have been trying to serve the Lord for many years, supposing they had all the light and truth that was for them in this life, who now find the Bible to be a harmonious whole, which they can read and understand themselves. Many feel as great a change as when first converted. Their peace before was like a small stream that dries up every summer; now "like a river," whose onward flow never ceases, whose deep waters are never disturbed. Before they saw the truth on the state of the dead, the punishment of the wicked, the return of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the coming kingdom; their hope was like a drifting anchor in a storm,—all was uncertain and perilous. Now, their hope is like the firm sheet anchor that holds the noble ship in the wildest storm. All doubts are gone, and they face the storm in grand sublimity, knowing that they enjoy the watch care of him who said to the tempest waves, "Peace, be still, and the winds ceased." To those who have this "blessed hope," worldly fame and costly attire, golden store and diamond gems, are worthless as to a dying man. He heeds not their glitter; one beaming smile from Jesus eclipses them all.

One of our number in Castleton, Mary Patterson, sleeps in Jesus. She was an orphan girl, a stranger in a strange land, the first one that came forward for prayers, and the first sister that was baptized. Since her conversion, she has ever been active in all our social meetings in telling what her "dear Jesus" had done for her in this cold friendless world. She was but six days in passing from blooming health to the gates of death. At Sabbath dawn, she said to her young sisters in Christ, who had watched with her during the night, "This is my last morning." With the rising sun, she calmly fell asleep, trusting in Jesus to raise her at the first resurrection. She is now safely beyond the world's cold frown, and the tempting wiles of the adversary. "All is well." Earth's rude strife can molest her no more; the last pang is felt, the last groan is uttered. Soon we hope to hear her join in the triumphant song, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Sabbath, Aug. 12th, we spent with the church in Poultney, and had an interesting season. They still love the way to glory. Two were baptized, and went on their way rejoicing. Bro. J. Howell, their pastor, is highly esteemed for his faithful labors. His health is rather poor.

At five o'clock we met in Hydeville, a part of Castleton, and immersed two more. It was a pleasant scene. Ninety-eight have now been baptized in C. during the past few months, and the work is still onward.

We were glad to receive a visit from Bro. D. A. Jones, who formerly lived in Danielsonville, Ct., and was instrumental in raising up the interesting church in that place. To those who do not know him, we would say that he is a superior dentist; but feels it a duty to leave his successful business, in part at least, to preach the glad tidings of the coming kingdom. His labors in this direction have been blessed. If any know of a place destitute of a good dentist, and wish for one who will be useful in the cause of Christ, address Dr. D. A. Jones, Pleasant Valley, Ct. Should he visit you in his travels, those who wish for dental work will do themselves a favor by securing, if possible, his services, and at the same time assist him to support his family during his absence. Paul worked at his trade of tent-making, and said, "Ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to them that were with me." Bro. Jones is willing to do the same.

Sabbath evening, he preached in Poultney, to the edification of the Church. We met with the dear saints at Castleton, and had a heavenly season around the communion table. Though many eyes were moistened with tears, "great peace" filled our hearts. At the close of the communion, six came forward for prayers, and we had a melting season in interceding for their eternal welfare. Several others are almost persuaded to be christians. Praise the Lord for his wonderful works. Let us all love and obey him, and soon "we'll be gathered home."

Aurora Borealis.

The following extract shows that the "wonders in the heavens," known by the common name of "Northern Lights," are of modern appearance.

The "Aurora Borealis" was seen "for the first time in America, Dec. 11th, 1719. It filled our country with great alarm. It was dreaded as being the precursor of the judgment fires which were to consume the world. It had a similar effect on the people in England in 1715."—Dr. J. B. Felt, History of Salem, Mass.

Sometimes the Aurora Borealis has the appearance of great fires, mingled with smoke; at other times it resembles blood. We think the prophet Joel had reference to these when the Spirit directed him to say, "Before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come," "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire, and pillars of smoke."

Signs of the Times.

Various speculations are afloat among the different classes in the world, as to the purport of the "signs of the times." All are free to admit that shadows of coming events indicate the approach of something grand in the extreme. Yet they differ widely as to the nature of the revolution now approaching. Some think the world is to be freed from the tyrant's yoke, and the oppressor's foot, by political revolutions and the spread of republican and democratic principles; others, that the churches will reform the world and convert it to christianity; while an increasing host of others are advocating that the inhabitants of our planet are to be set right by the agency of the spirits and Spiritualists. These various classes assure us that the world is growing better, while the Scriptures declare the opposite, and affirm that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" and the record of crime from all parts of the world harmonizes perfectly with the Bible statement; thus proving that those are in error who assert that the world is growing better; consequently, their hopes cannot be realized, if they expect to see an improved state of things under the present dispensation. Their worldly plans for reforming society will only prove to be failures, as truly as the efforts of Julian the Apostate, when he endeavored to overthrow the Bible by rebuilding Jerusalem. "The Scripture cannot be broken."

The Lord has foreseen and foretold; and, as Peter says, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise; in your hearts knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The prophet has declared, that "In the last days perilous times shall come," and no man or set of men can change the great current of corruption, selfishness, covetousness, boasting, pride, blasphemy, and licentiousness, that is now sweeping like a deluge over our planet.

To him who takes heed to the "sure word of prophecy," the "signs of the times" are speaking in thunder tones, "The end of all things is at hand." The great monarchies of earth have risen and fallen, in harmony with the prophetical programme; and the last touches of the prophet upon his wonderful panorama of the world, are now fulfilling before our eyes, in the Italian and Turkish movements, the Eastern Question, Spiritualism, and the "WONDERFUL MAN"—Napoleon.

All these are certain signs that the "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS is about to make his second advent to our planet, for the purpose of overthrowing all the kingdoms of this world, raising the dead, and setting up his everlasting kingdom, "which shall never be destroyed," nor "left to other people." Until this great and crowning event transpires, wickedness and infidelity will daily increase. Let us pray, then, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven."

Dear reader, are you ready to meet the Son of Man, when he "shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him?" Are you trying to please him in all things?" Do you love him, and his appearing? Paul says there is "a crown of righteousness" laid up for "all them also that love his appearing;" consequently, no crown for those who live so far from Christ that they have no desire for his return. Is that your sad condition? Then haste and get ready. Fly to Jesus at once for pardon. There is not a moment to lose. Eternal life is soon to be gained or lost. Now decide to be a christian. May the Lord help you, and save you when he comes.

A New Christology.

The Spiritual Eclectic, published in Boston and Portland, says: "One of the great and earnest demands of the age is a new Christology; a new theory, philosophy, or, if we please, science of Christ, or the God man."

There is no doubt but those who have departed from Christ our Savior, as have the Spiritualists, will seek some other means of salvation, forgetting that Jesus says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that entereth not in by the door, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."—John 10: 1. As every Spiritualist, so far as our knowledge extends, denies that Christ was begotten by the Holy Spirit, as the Bible declares; and consequently denies that he was the Son of God, any more than every other man; or our Savior, any further than Shakespeare or J. Davis, we are not surprised that they call for "a new Christology," or "science of Christ." They should remember that the apostle Peter hath said, when "filled with the Holy Ghost," "There is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." We need no new Savior, as Jesus "is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

But those who are advocates of the "new Christology" have departed far from the gospel of Christ, and as a substitute for him, talk very piously about a "Christ-principle," or "a divinity in man, a divinity in nature, and even in all things." This they denominate a "liberal theory," "a comprehensive, satisfactory Christology," "a sublime, philosophical . . . at-one-ment." Says Paul, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." How plainly this prophecy is fulfilling before our eyes.

There is a kind of sickly sentimentalism, rationalism, and idealism, that is becoming quite popular at the present day among intelligent and fashionable people, that is taken as a substitute for Christianity; and yet is no more like it, than is Mohammedanism. Their doctrines are very similar to those of Spiritualists, but they are not known as such; and even repudiate any affinity for them; and seem ignorant of the fact that they are imbibing the sentiments of anti-Christ, and preparing the way for a union with the great apostacy now rising into power.

It is high time for the faithful to inquire for "the old paths,"—for christians to gird on their armor for the last great conflict with the enemy of all righteousness, who is trying to bedim the truth of the Bible with ethereal fancies, that have no more foundation in truth, than the wild dreams of a maniac, or the horrid visions of one raving with delirium tremens. The "strong delusion" is doing its work. Dear reader, beware of its seductive influence. Keep close to Jesus.

Shimeall's Chronology.

The work on Chronology, by Mr. Shimeall, indicates deep research, and very close investigation. His arguments showing the age of the world, appear to be based on sound premises. He has grappled with chronological difficulties with a thorough and persevering earnestness, worthy of the importance of the subject. It is a valuable addition to the library of the Bible student, who wishes information on this deeply interesting point. Mr. S. thinks he has clearly shown that the six thousand years from creation terminate in 1866–8, when we may expect the introduction of the reign of Christ. It is a remarkable fact, that nearly all writers on Chronology, terminate the earth's great working week between the present and 1868.

Events indicate that the end may be even nearer than '68. Those who are not ready to see the Savior, certainly have no time to lose, before they make preparation.

The following interesting remarks on Chronology, and Mr. Shimeall's work, are from Bro. Apollos Hale, of Charlestown, and were published in the second number of the Voice of the Prophets. After speaking of the difficulties hitherto experienced in the study of Chronology, he says:—

"Standing on this position, the late work of Mr. Shimeall was put into our hands. And we here give it as our judment, that he has done more, with the acknowledged aids he brings to the task, for the doubtful science, than any other writer whose works we have consulted. We do not refer to his chronological system, in its details, so much as to the facts he brings forward to settle the true source of Chronological information, as the point of time where there was so much uncertainty, and so wide a difference in the estimation of those whose claims to competency were of an equally high order.

To come directly to the point, the principal reason why the six thousand years argument has been of so little practical importance, in itself, was the uncertainty of the world's age before Christ. Different accounts, each one claiming to be based on the inspired record, differed more than a thousand years as to the chronology of that period, with great names favoring each account. And until the true account could be satisfactorily determined, the six thousand years argument could be of only hypothetical or collateral importance. If, according to the Septuagint, more than five thousand years had passed at the birth of Christ, the six thousand years ended long ago, and the argument with them. If the shorter account was received as correct, it made a difference, but the doubts in the case made all reference to the age of the world very doubtful.

Here, then, was the point to be settled. And this point Mr. S., with the aid of the English writer to whom he refers, has settled. He shows that in the translations and compilations from the original Hebrew record, there were systematic corruptions; he points out the motive for making the corruptions; the amount of corruption which that motive demanded at the times when the corruptions were made, and the fact that just that amount was made. The motive was to make the Hebrew account of their own nation coincide with the traditional or fabulous accounts of the heathen nations with whom the Hebrews were intimately connected. Proud, and ambitous of a remote antiquity, these heathen counted a much larger number of years than they ever had. Several instances are cited by Mr. S., in which he shows that the difference between the original Hebrew and the corrupted chronology is exactly according to the difference between the true estimate and the false heathen estimate of the precession of the equinoxes. These corruptions were made at different dates, distributed over a period of more than twelve hundred years. Josephus is included, whose dates have been a greater puzzle than those of any ancient writer whose works have come down to us in so complete a form. But under the principles presented in the work of Mr. S., the chronological difficulties of Josephus appear to be all explained, as easily as the motions of the heavenly bodies are under the astronomical principles of Copernicus or Newton.

Now, the fact of the corruptions, by a fixed and uniform scale, being settled, the corruptions themselves take an important value. By determining the amount of the departure from the true standard, you determine not only where the true standard is to be found, but also what the true standard ought to indicate as the true date. Let us illustrate. John leaves the old parental mansion, and the watch he takes with him agrees with the old family clock, which has always been regulated by the divine standard, ordained for signs, seasons, days, and years. He goes to a neighboring country where he finds standard time to differ from his, and he sets his watch to correspond with the new standard. He is gone from home seven weeks. On his return, some one inquires of John the time; he gives the answer from his watch, and is met by the statement that there must be some mistake. He now recalls the difference between the time at home and abroad, and the setting of his watch by foreign time, when the following questions come up. 1. What was the difference between your time and theirs? Answer, One and a half hours. 2. How long was you absent? Answer. Seven weeks. 3. How long after you left did you alter your watch? Answer, One week? 4. How much faster did their clocks run than your watch? Answer, Ten minutes a day. 5. And your time now corresponds with theirs? Answer, Yes. 6. What time in the day did you leave home? Answer, Just seven weeks this day, ten and a half in the forenoon, by the old clock. It is now six and a half by your watch. The difference between your watch or foreign time, and the old clock, is just eight and a half hours, and the time by the old clock should be just ten A. M. On turning to the old clock, that is seen to be the time it indicates.

Thus the precision of the difference confirms the accuracy of the true standard. So these corruptions of the original Hebrew record have a double value. The proof of their heathen origin being prima facie the true standard is thus settled. The scale on which the corruptions are made being exact and uniform, they show what the true standard should indicate. 'As these eras of corruption are not adventitious dates, but all come out historically right, so far as their historical elements have been preserved, it will be also seen that the scriptural epochs and periods, resulting from the several eras of corruption, are not adventitious, but uniformly come out critically exact.' (p. 48.)

We know of nothing in confirmation and corroboration of the Hebrew chronology, so positive, and so decisive. Thus God makes not only the wrath, but the vanity of man to praise him.

It is not supposed, however, that there is anything in this corroborating testimony that affects particular dates, within the margin of uncertainty before referred to. That uncertainty remains. But we know the difference between the old family clock and the fast reckoning of heathen time."

The State of Europe.

The state of affairs in Europe becomes more and more ominous of the end of the christian dispensation. All things are proclaiming in thunder tones to a guilty world, that "the times of the Gentiles" are nearly fulfilled. The last features of the prophetic chart are passing before us in grand review, "Signs there's no mistaking proclaim Messiah's near." And yet, notwithstanding all the bright evidences which show that "Jesus soon is coming," it is all the children of the Lord can do to keep awake amid the great perils of these last days. The Savior foresaw this, and hence cautioned those who should be living in "the time of the end," against going to sleep, lest, coming suddenly, they be found unprepared to meet him.

Now is the time to watch. Now is the time to exhort "one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." It is to be feared that some of the Lord's professed people are exhorting one another so much the less, as they see the day approaching; even absenting themselves from the house of prayer; thus utterly disregarding the instructions of our Savior. Many there are, who seem to be wise above what is written. They appear to think, because they have a correct faith, all will be well; forgetting "that faith without works is dead."

We wonder how any one who has ever been interested in the signs of the times, can be indifferent now. It must arise from blindness caused by careless living. Unless such change their course at once, there is great danger that they be found unprepared and among the foolish virgins, with no oil in their lamps at the coming of the Bridegroom.

Those who have kept upon their watch towers, have never been better satisfied than now, that our hope is about to be consummated. The work of desolating the harlot is progressing with earnestness, both in Italy and Syria. Garibaldi in Italy, and the Druses and Moslems in Syria, are desolating the same harlot power. Apparently, their terrible work is but just begun; yet there may be a cessation for a season; but, if so, it must begin again, and go on with more awful results. "The Scripture cannot be broken."

As if to leave the Roman church to her fate, in the hands of those who are pledged to destroy her; whose business it is to "make her desolate and naked . . . and burn with fire;"—it is said that Napoleon is about to withdraw his military forces from the seven-hilled city. On this point a Paris correspondent of the New York Times writes, July 17th, as follows: "It is now clear that Garibaldi has set out for the liberation of the whole of Italy . . . . From Rome we hear that, simultaneously with the arrival of the Duke of GRAMONT, French Ambassador, at that city, the French troops received an order to commence, company by company, the return to France." If the French troops are withdrawn, it will probably be the signal for the onset upon "the abomination of desolation," that has so long trodden upon the truth, and persecuted the children of the Lord. Her death struggle is evidently at hand. Then follows soon the triumph of the saints. Let us keep awake. It is too late to sleep now. We peril our hope of eternal life, if we do.

Correspondence.

From Eld. S. G. Mathewson.

BRO. GRANT:—As the truths of the gospel have been brought out in this place during the past winter, relative to the sleep of the dead, and destruction of the wicked, quite a volley of N. D. George's pamphlets, advocating the opposite view, appeared in our midst, in order to counteract the truths that "the dead know not anything," and that "the wages of sin is death." I thought best to review this pamphlet; and did so by giving some four or five discourses, one on each Lord's day P. M., taking up every passage he brought to sustain his position. And when I came to 2d Cor. 12, the solution I gave of the same, being more clear and lucid to the minds of some than any previous explanation they had listened to, they desired it might appear in the Crisis; which desire I freely comply with, hoping it may subserve the cause of truth.

It seems, in the commencement of this chapter, the Apostle entirely discarded the idea of boasting, which is in perfect harmony with all the teachings of the great Head of the church. Humility is of essential value, if we would understand the great and glorious truths of the gospel; as our Divine Leader pertinently inquired, "How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only." But the relation of the Apostle to the Corinthian church, and the opposition which he met with at this time in the promulgation of the truth, demanded the revelation of a secret kept by him fourteen years; namely, a vision or revelation. He says, "I know a man in Christ, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) such an one caught up to the third heaven." Now what does the Apostle mean by being out of the body? I answer, he could not mean death, for he must have known whether he had been dead fourteen years, or whether he died fourteen years ago, and had been raised from the dead; consequently, it does not teach a separate existence of the soul from the body. Then, if it does not, our opponents gain nothing from this source to sustain their position. But the Apostle himself proves in other places that he was absent from the body without being dead, e. g.: 1st Cor. 5: 3, 4; Col. 2: 5.

But what is the gist of his teaching in this passage? He says, "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord." So real were the scenes presented to his view, that he could not tell whether he was caught up bodily to paradise, and actually heard unspeakable words; or whether he was transported away in the spirit, as was John on Patmos Isle, and heard those unutterable words in vision.

Sandy Hill, N. Y.

From Eld. L. Boutell.

Dear Brethren:—As the time is fast approaching for our camp and grove meeting, and as we have but one object in view, viz., the stirring up of our brethren to more efficient effort for the salvation of our fellow men, by the preaching of the gospel, especially that portion which lights up our pathway to the glorious future; therefore, I hope all our brethren will be preparing to leave their work and attend these precious gatherings. While you are laying aside the needful, be sure and get where you will come in the fullness of the blessing of Christ's gospel.

Our meeting in "Harmony Grove," Westford, Mass., will be one where christian liberality and gospel freedom with the truth relative to the coming Messiah, may be expected.

Being desirous to co-operate with all the lovers of Jesus and his appearing, while the last golden moments are passing, we therefore invite the scattered flock of God to come to this feast, bringing your friends, neighbors, and children with you. We shall do our best to get the fare reduced. Will Bro. Young see to it in Boston, Bro. Carlies in Lowell, Bro. Ayers in Worcester, and notify in the "Crisis."

And Brn. coming in numbers from any given place, can get the fare reduced by attending to it.

Let preacher and people bear the call,
And come to Westford one and all;
And for your comfort we'll do our best,
While journeying to the land of rest.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

By the arrival of the Steamship Persia, we have news from Liverpool to Aug. 4th.

Reports of the Syrian conferences being broken off are unfounded. It is officially announced that the protocol agreed upon is for 12,000 European troops to be sent to Syria, remaining there not over six months, one half to be furnished by France. Another protocol calls on the Porte to carry out its engagements respecting Christians. The Syrian force is to be under the orders of Commissioners of the Great Powers.

The English Parliament had agreed to vote £2,000,000 for fortifications. Preparations were in progress for the great party battle on the paper duty resolutions.

There are rumors of a contemplated interview between Napoleon and the Queen of Spain.

The text of the convention between Garibaldi and the Neapolitans is published. The evacuation of Sicily by the Neapolitans is stipulated.

It is asserted that Garibaldi was preparing to transport troops to the main land.

There was a great panic at Shanghae, in consequence of the approach of the rebels. Business was suspended, and exchange was half per cent. higher.

Garibaldi on entering Messina was received with great enthusiasm.

London, Aug. 5th. A popular movement had taken place at Arino, in the Papal States, but it had been suppressed.

The Neapolitan troops were being directed on Calabria.

Paris, Saturday. The Patrie says the regiments intended for Syria left Chalons today.

Four steamboats left Toolon yesterday to embark the troops.

Great agitation prevails in Jeddah, Candia and Arabia.

Naples, Aug 8. The city is tranquil.

Rome, July 31st.- At the disturbance in Arpino, the people shouted for Garibaldi. Lamoriciere sent troops to Lerracino.

THE SYRIAN QUESTION.

Paris, Friday. All the powers have agreed upon the conditions of a European intervention in Syria. A conference will assemble at three o'clock to sign a convention in reference to the measures to be taken in common.

ROME.

The Pope has addressed an energetic letter to the Bishops of Syria. His Holiness laments the massacres of the Maronites which have been committed by the Druses, and expresses his horror of the barbarities of the Turks. His Holiness further speaks in high praise of the French expedition, and exhorts the princes to repress the excesses of the infidels, and to arrest the enemies of morality, justice, religion, and social order.

The Syrian War.

The following are extracts of letters from a European resident in Damascus to a friend in Beyrout:

Damascus, July 10—6.30 A. M. A few minutes after I closed my letter of yesterday, an uproar commenced in the street opposite my house. The Moslems—men, women and boys—began to assemble, crying out that all should go to the Christian quarter to plunder, burn and massacre, and threatening not to leave a house or a Christian. I went to the street and spoke to them, hoping it would come to nothing. It grew rapidly worse. Every one was calling to others not to come without arms, and the women were violently exciting the men. There was some fear expressed of the soldiers, but most declared that the soldiers would not interfere with them. I now found it prudent to take the advice of some of my neighbors, and keep inside my house. The street past my house is about the shortest road from the Shughoor and the Meedan, the two worst districts in the city. Soon after I went into my house the ruffians began to return from the Christian quarter with burdens of plunder, while the number running toward it were increasing, while threats, imprecations and yells were numerous and loud. Every sort and size of thing was carried past my house—mares and goats, gold and iron nails, silks and cottons, chests, large and small, tables, chairs, books, and every imaginable article. There was a regular stream of these plunderers past my door till some time after sunset—nearly five hours. Afterward they became fewer, but they never ceased all night, and with the dawn they again increased. As soon as they had plundered some of the houses they set them on fire. During the night, though there was clear moonlight, the flames and smoke presented a sight as grand as it was awful.

During the first half of the night the flames presented an unbroken arc of a circle, as viewed from my roof, of more than 70 deg., extending from a little North of Bab Shurky to the extreme North point of the Christian quarter. Towards morning the arc became shorter, partly because it had been steadily approaching me, and the Christian quarter as it comes this way grows narrower, and partly, perhaps, because the line of fire was not sweeping all the houses on the North border of the quarter. Towards morning the flames also became lower, or less violent, on most parts of the line, and fewer houses were in flames at once. Still the fire is raging fearfully. There has been an increasing tumult of arms, of the fire of breaking open houses, etc., all mixed up together. I have no means of guessing the amount of murder committed.

The Beyrout correspondent of the Daily News, writing on the 19th July, says: When the last dispatches left Damascus, at 2 P. M., on Thursday, the 12th inst., the burning, slaughter, murder, pillage and other atrocities continued not merely as bad, but worse than ever, for the miscreant fanatics of the place had been just then joined by a host of Bedouins, Koords, Druses and other scoundrels, who were only too happy for the chance of pillage.

When the last advices from Damascus left that place, the whole Christian quarter had been utterly destroyed. Four thousand Christians had taken refuge in the house of Abdel Kader, who defended them against all comers. Three thousand had taken refuge in the castle under the Pacha, and several hundred in the English Consulate, which as yet (being situated in the Moslem quarter of the town) had been respected. Upward of two thousand Christians, it was calculated, had been murdered, all in cold blood; and the estimated loss of property, money, valuables, etc., was £1,200,000 sterling.

As I write, news from Damascus down to Thursday evening, the 12th inst., has reached Beyrout. The Bedoins and Arabs were pouring into the town to join in the pillage. The Franciscan friars, eight priests and two lay brothers, all Italians or Spaniards, had been butchered. Of Greek Catholics, Maronite and other Eastern sects, forty-five priests had been killed. The Sisters of Charity and the Lazarist priests were at Abdel Kader's, who had got bravely. Achmet Pacha was shut up in the castle, doing nothing at all. The fifteen hundred troops sent from Beyrout were not expected to arrive before the 17th, and by that time God knows what will have happened. Here the panic continues. Every steamer, every ship, every boat that can be hired, is filled with the most respectable of the native Christians, flying from the place, afraid that the fanaticism of the low Moslems will break out here as it did at Damascus, and that the Turkish authorities and the Turkish troops will betray them as they did their co-religionists at Deirel-Kamar, Hasbeyia, Reshevia, and elsewhere.

Marseilles, Aug. 1st. Advices from Damascus to the 12th, confirm the destruction of 6000 houses belonging to the Christians. The Jewish quarter was burnt. The Turkish houses in which Christian men and women found refuge were also burnt. The massacre lasted eighty hours. It was difficult to ascertain the number of victims. Two thousand Christians were still under Abdel Kader's protection suffering from hunger. Several consuls were at the residence of Abdel Kader, who gave refuge also to several Englishmen. The new Governor of Damascus had arrived with 1200 soldiers. The Impartiae de Smyrna, in confirming the above, doubts whether the Belgian Consul was killed. Several Christian sheiks refuse to sign the treaty of peace, considering it illusory. Some starving Christians had endeavored to return to the mountains.

Constantinople, July 28 (via Trieste.) News from Damascus to the 17th July announces that the massacres had ended. The Kurds and Bedouins had retired into the interior, but the Christians were still concealing themselves.

The Latest from Damascus. A letter from Beirut, of July 19th, says that "not a single house belonging to a Christian has been left in Damascus. Four thousand Christians there have been mercilessly butchered. Rev. Mr. Graham, an Irish missionary in Damascus, was among the number of the killed, together with all the Franciscan monks and thirty-six of the native clergy."—Boston Journal.

Editorial Notices.

The thirtieth anniversary of the pastoral labors of the Rev. Joshua V. Himes, in Boston, took place Sabbath, Aug. 19th, in the Advent Chapel, Hudson street, at three o'clock, P. M. An appropriate discourse was given by Mr. Himes, with other exercises, that were of much interest to the friends of the pastor. A large number of the old parishioners and friends of Mr. H., from the neighboring towns, were in attendance, and the occasion was one of very great interest.

Mr. Himes gave a history of his labors for the last thirty years, and placed himself in his true position before the public. We preached for Bro. H. in the evening, and had a good season. We wish him and his people prosperity.

☞ Bro. John Billings wishes us to say that he shall not be able to attend the campmeeting at Savoy, Mass.

Campmeeting.

The Lord willing, there will be a campmeeting at Lanesville, Conn., near the line of the Houstonic R. R., thirty-two miles north of Bridgeport, on the old ground, a few rods from the depot, commencing Monday, Sept. 3d., and continuing over the following Sunday. Arrangements for board and horse keeping will be made to accommodate all who may attend. All who can will please bring bedding for their convenience during the meeting. We expect those preachers present to preach the word, who feel sent of God for that purpose, and invite all who can, to come from valley and hill, and once more unite to worship the living God in Lanesville grove. Come one and all, ye tried and tempted ones, armed with the spirit and love of God.

Those who have tents will please bring them. Those who come by way of Bridgeport will call for trip tickets to Lanesville and return. The fare is reduced to $1.50 for both ways. Passenger trains leave Bridgeport daily at 10.30 A. M., and 5.30 P. M. Arrive at Lanesville at 11 50 A. M., and 6.50 P. M. From the north leave Pittsfield at 9.15 A. M., and 4.30 P. M. Arrive at Lanesville at 1, and 7.45 P. M.

D. Cogswell,
M. Gorson,
L. Mills,
Committee.

Notice.

The fare to the Westford campmeeting from Boston will be reduced one half. It will be one dollar there and back. Tickets will be had at the store of George T. Adams, 167 Hanover St. J. S. White.

I propose to publish soon a Tract on the Parable of the Rich man and Lazarus. It is known by some that I have taken a different view of this instruction of our Savior from any that has been published. Like others, I, of course, suppose that I have a correct view of it. It will be put into as small a compass as the subject will admit, so that it may have a more general circulation.

J. S. White.

Notice.

The Lord will, there will be a conference in Buchanan, Mich., to commence on the evening of the 19th of Sept. and continue over Lord's day. Bro. F. H. Berick will be present to preach the word. We trust our brethren will take advantage of this opportunity. In behalf of the church,

D. R. Mansfield.

English Bibles.

We would call the attention of our friends to the fine assortment of English Bibles which we have imported, ranging in price from $1.00 to $2.00, exclusive of postage. It is a rare chance for those in want of the precious book, to add for them new to this office, where they can have them in Morocco, Roan or colored calf binding, with marginal or reference notes to the verses. We shall have a goodly assortment at the Wilbraham campmeeting, if the Lord will.

Notice.

The Lord will, there will be a conference in Reading, Hillsdale Co., Mich., to commence the 5th of September, and continue over Lord's day. Bro. F. H. Berick will preach. He will also tarry in that section over two Lord's days, and preach as Bro. A. N. Seymore may arrange. Come, brethren, and sisters, lay aside your farms and merchandise for a few days, and listen to the word. In behalf of the Church.

D. R. Mansfield.

Savoy Campmeeting.

This meeting will commence Aug. 27th, and continue one week. The object of this meeting is to persuade men to accept of the gospel, and be saved in the kingdom of God. Then come, brethren and sisters, one and all, in the spirit of labor and love, and let us have a feast of fat things on the mountain top. Efficient laborers in the gospel will be present to preach the word of life. The committee wish to say, that no pains will be spared in trying to supply the wants of the brethren and public generally; and are confident from last year's experience that we can get them more acceptably. Board and horse keeping will be furnished on reasonable terms.

E. M'Culloch,
Rufus Starks,
J. E. Healy,
Committee.

Campmeeting.

Providence permitting, there will be a campmeeting in Levant, Me., commencing Sept. 17th and continue one week.

The cause of truth demands that the church should make an effort to give new impetus to the cause, by a general gathering of the brethren and sisters to comfort and strengthen one another with the words of truth. We expect this meeting will result in good to the church and exert a salutary influence upon community. The people want to hear the reasons of our hope. Let all come that can. Begin now to plan your business so that you can come. Begin to pray about it, talk about it, and get your tents ready for the camp. Above all, do not forget that you will need on the armor, so that you may be ready for the work as soon as you get on the field of battle. Brethren, make your business bend to this meeting. Get your Lamb, and come up to sacrifice to the Lord. If you have not a lamb, take a kid, or a pair of doves, only let your heart be in the work and God will bless you. J. Hemenway, for the brethren.

A Proposition.

To any one who will send us a new subscriber for one year, we will forward, post paid, a copy of our late discussion with Eld W. W. Clayton, on the conscious state of the spirit after death, and the destruction of the wicked. And for a new subscriber for six months, we will send a copy of the pamphlets on "Soul" and "Spirit." With a little effort, a thousand names may be added to our list. Let every reader try to aid in scattering the light and truth. Now is the time to work.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn. that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday Morning, as our paper goes to press about noon, otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

Providence permitting, I will preach in Fairhaven, Ct., the last Sabbath in August.
S. G. Mathewson.

Providence permitting, there will be preaching on the camp ground, near Unionville, Ct., on Bro. Johnson's land, Sept. 2d, by R. Williams. No meeting if stormy. Seth Woodruff.

Bro. D. M. Hanscome will preach in Beeman Hall, Hallowell, Sept. 2d. Samuel Swift.

I expect to preach at the following times and places:—

For the Crisis.

A Chronicle of Years, from Creation to the Present Time.

A great diversity of opinion has existed, since the era of the birth of Christ, on the subject of the age of the world at that time. The Hebrew version does not harmonize with the Septuagint—Greek—and each have their advocates, and thus the discord has been kept up; but each new chronology gives some new light; especially respecting the superiority of the inspired Hebrew over that of the Greek numbers; and though they all differ on some points, they all agree on others; and where the strongest Scriptural arguments are given, and the best historians cited, there, we think, is the safest ground for us to occupy. But there is a record in 1 Kings 6 : 1, which purports to be the four hundred and eightieth year after the Israelites left Egypt, being the fourth year of the reign of Solomon. The dates of the sacred volume cannot be harmonized with it. It does not appear to be a corruption, but a mistake; it is a dead passage, being on both sides pierced with a sword; on one side by the number of years given by inspiration in the book of Judges and Solomon; and on the other by Paul's declarations, Acts 13 : 18–22. No one can give a true chronology of the Bible who fixes his computations in accordance with it; nor did any one ever mend it, by assuming that it should read thus or so. The safest way is to leave it as a dead record, and take those that are in harmony with each other, that we may come to some conclusion what latitude we are in, as we are nearing the great crisis of the world.

There are a few facts relative to the darkest places in the chronology of the Old Testament, which I have not seen presented to the public, and which may be beneficial to be known; and as the age of the world is a subject of great interest, it is important that every thing bearing on the subject should be known; "for if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?" Hoping that it may not be useless to give a brief view of the chronology of the world, from the creation to the present time, I have come to the conclusion to adopt the Hebrew numbers, and the most reliable history, and give it in as concise a manner as possible.

I shall first present the inspired Hebrew numbers for more than two thousand years, with Scripture quotations and references.

Creation.—"In the beginning."	A. M.	Genesis 1 and 2.
To the five hundredth year of Noah's life,	1556	" 5 : 3–32.
Building of the Ark,	100	" 7 : 6.
To the Call of Abraham,	427	" 11 10–32.
Sojourn in Egypt,	430	Exod. 12 : 40, 41.
	2513

Here is the date of Paul's chronology, Acts 13:18; and here, also, Josephus begins a period of 592 years, which reaches to the Temple, but that of Paul, being inspiration, will be given first. "And about the time of forty years, suffered he their manners in the wilderness,"	40	Acts 13 18.
"And when he had destroyed seven nations, in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot." Paul gives no limit here, but it is proved by the age of Caleb to be six years,	6	" v. 19. Joshua 14 10.
"And after that he gave unto them judges, about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet,"	450	Acts 13 20.
Samuel judged Israel from year to year, and went in circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpeh, and Ramah, and when old made his sons judges. But Paul does not say how long he reigned before Saul. "And afterward they desired a king, and God gave unto them Saul, the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of forty years."	40	" v. 21.
"And when he had removed him, he raised up unto them David to be their king;" who reigned forty years.	40	" v. 22.
To the Temple, in the fourth year of the reign of Solomon,	4
	580
Now it is very evident that several years must have passed away in the time of Samuel, that are not given by Paul, and if we allow him twelve years,	12
the whole number would correspond with Josephus,	592

I will now give Josephus' view of the same period. In book 8, chap. 3, sec. 1, he says: "Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign . . . five hundred and ninety-two years after the Exodus out of Egypt." Though he has often been accused of contradicting himself, he has given all these years at the head of his books.

Books 3d and 4th give the forty years in the Wilderness,	40
Books 5th and 6th give five hundred and eight years from the death of Moses to the death of Saul,	508
Book 7th gives forty years from the death of Saul to the death of David,	40
And if we add four to Solomon,	4
we arrive at the five hundred and ninety second year from the time they left Egypt, to the time Solomon began to build the Temple	592

And of these years he gives twenty five to Joshua, and twelve to Samuel; and after deducting these, together with the given Scripture numbers, from the whole number, 592, we have a remainder of twenty for the time of the Elders that outlived Joshua, and the Anarchy which followed their death.

Thus, 592 —	Years.
Wilderness,	40
Joshua,	25
Elders and Anarchy,
Judges and servitudes, to the restoration of the Ark of God,	391
To the gathering at Mizpeh,	20
Samuel the Prophet,	12
Saul 40, David 40, Solomon 4,	84
	572

Take 572 from 592, and it leaves 20 years for Elders and Anarchy.

The time of the Elders and Anarchy is not definitely given in the Bible, nor in Josephus; but by the foregoing process we can determine, in accordance with Scripture and Josephus both, that it lasted twenty years.* There is no assumption here; all these numbers are recorded for the special benefit of those who have any taste for chronology; but lest some should not understand that these computations are in harmony with the numbers contained in the book of Judges, I will give another table, with Scripture references, of the years of the Judges; after their passage of forty years; and the division of their land by lot, which the age of Caleb proves to have been six years.—Josh. 14 : 10.

Taking six from Joshua's 25, and it leaves to Joshua nineteen years.	19
Elders and Anarchy,	20
Chusan,	8	Judges 3 8.
Othniel,	40	" " 11.
Eglon,	18	" " 14.
Ehud,	80	" " 30.
Shamgar,	1	" " 31.
Jabin,	20	" 4 3.
Barak,	40	" 5 31.
Midian,	7	" 6 1.
Gideon,	40	" 8 28.
Abimelech,	3	" 9 22.
Tola,	23	" 10 2.
Jair,	22	" " 3.
Philistines,	18	" 10 8.
Jepthah,	6	" 12 7.
Ibzan,	7	" " 9.
Elon,	10	" " 11.
Abdon,	8	" " 14.
Philistines,	40	" 13 1.
To the assembly at Mizpeh,	20	1 Samuel 7 2.
	450 years.

Here again are Paul's "four hundred and fifty years," reaching from the division of their land to Samuel the prophet, proved by the inspired text, which I think cannot now fail to be understood; and this 450 years from the division of land until Samuel, proves that Josephus was right in assigning twenty-five years to Joshua; and from it we learn that the time of Elders and Anarchy was just twenty years. This view ends the forty years of Philistine Servitude, with the end of the captivity of the ark of God; makes Samson cotemporary with Eli, in his last twenty years, or in some of his latter years.

That Samuel reigned twelve years, we have the authority of Josephus; and as we have proved, by the inspired text, that he rightly assigned twenty-five years to Joshua, we cannot doubt that he gave a true record of twelve to Samuel. Nothing is said of Samuel from the death of Eli, till he called them to turn to the Lord, and gather themselves together at Mizpeh, (1 Sam. 2 : 3,) and he would pray for them; which was "twenty years;" he was a prophet sometime before Eli died; but it is probable that he never had exercised the office of civil magistrate, or been a leader of their armies, till the gathering of the assembly at Mizpeh.

	Years.
